Christian Absurdities.

A hundred years ago every sick person must be either bled, blistered, or drenched. It was believed that patients would die if not thus treated. But life was prolonged when these practices were left off. Experience has shown that there is no relation between belief and facts. The Christian believes that there could be no moral standard but for his religion. The truth is, his morality no more depends on his religion than life depended on blistering and bloodletting a hundred years ago. Christianity does not promote morality. It makes no distinction between acts of cruelty and acts of disinterested benevolence. It commits a murder as conscientiously as it feeds a starving child, and many times the murder has been considered the more meritorious act. It could not see the cruelty of the Inquisition. It could not see the brutality of whipping women. It could not see that killing men and women for opinion's sake was murder. Evidence of Christianity is no evidence of morality. A case in point. Perhaps no man ever doubted that Stonewall Jaakson was a Christian. He had the habit of throwing up his hands in a very peculiar way. This habit was observed by many. In battle, at headquarters, and even at the table, his hand was seen to rise in a mysterious way. Some thought it a mere habit without purpose; but the few who had been admitted to the inner temple of his heart knew the significance of that uplifted hand, and it is thus explained: He regarded God as the giver of all good. He said that he never put a glass of water or a mouthful of food to his lips without thanks to God; that he had practiced it so long that it became a habit and second nature. He asked God to give council and help him at every step. If his own statements are to be credited, God was in his mind almost constantly. If he found that a letter had to travel on Sunday to reach its destination, he would not mail it until Monday.

Now, if Christianity is to be taken as the standard of morality, Stonewall Jackson ought to hav been a man of the clearest moral perceptions in the world. Let us see:

In the first place he chose the profession of a cutthroat. At the storming of Chipultepec, Jackson's battery commanded the main street of the city. Orders had been given that the town would be shelled in such a length of time unless it surrendered. When the time was up the street was packed with men, women, and children. The order was given and Jackson's cannon vomited their deadly fire upon those defenseless people. A lady hearing him recount the sad havoc that his guns had made among women and children, asked him, with a woman's heart, if he did not feel some compunction. "Not the least," he coolly replied, "I did my duty." Though Jackson never received a letter without thanking God, never sent one without imploring a blessing; though God was always present with him, God never told him that it was wrong to hold human beings as chattels. If it had not been for the advantages of a splendid education, Stonewall Jackson would have been a Christian lunatic. Thousands have been claimed as true Christians who could lay no claim to morality, while some of the most moral men whom the world ever knew were not Christians. Morality is not on outgrowth from Christianity; it is above and independent of Christianity, and older than Christianity.

We are no more indebted to Christianity for our morality than we are for our inventions and improvements. For hundreds of years Christianity produced scarcely a book that was of value to the world.

Neither could Christianity boast of orators, poets, or historians. Neither has Christianity wrought out any great inventions. The telescope, the successful application of steam as a motive power, the steam-engine, the printing-press, the railroad and telegraph, in short, all of the inventions of modern times which have proved to be of such great value to the race were in no sense Christian inventions. I do not mean to say that some professed Christians have not made some important discoveries, and wrought out some useful inventions; but I do mean to say that they did not have their origin in Christianity. It is no secret to the patient student of history that Christianity fought many inventions and discoveries of modern times with a desperation worthy of a better cause.

These inventions and discoveries have started the world on the high road of progress and civilization, while Christianity stands still. Show me a priest or minister who is not bound by the same creed which bound him at his ordination. All his preaching and teaching is in support of the old creed. Compare the inventions and improvements of to-day with what they were fifty years ago. In mechanics, in agriculture, in the schools, in scientific discoveries, in every department of learning and business, there are improvements which show that the career of man is onward and upward to a higher destiny. Now, go and examine the Christian creeds. No improvement there. They stand to-day as they stood fifty years ago. It is next to impossible to get a new truth into the mind of a Christian, or to get an old superstition out.

For impossibilities, absurdities, and obscenity, few books equal the Bible. Although the Bible was written many centuries ago, at the dawning of civilization, yet in the mind of the Christian no writers before or since have equaled Bible writers.

Notwithstanding the filth and nastiness of the Bible, notwithstanding the abominations which it not only sanctions but commands, even to eating of one's own children, yet the Christian believes it to be a model of pureness, and that even its nastiness has a tendency to elevate the race. Does not this border on lunacy? Can it be a good system which thus warps and muddles the minds of men? Should not the minds of the youth of the land be protected from such debauchery? It is a disgrace to the age that scarcely a person can die unless the funeral services are conducted by one of these elevated-road conductors, whose mind is about as near the normal condition as an old tin pan in a wagon-rut. Some of their funeral sermons are refreshing.

The next time you attend a funeral, just notice how the "awful solemnities of the occasion" lengthen out the preacher's countenance. Pay attention to the manner in which he uses his handkerchief, mark his nasal twang, and think what an awful thing it would be to die, and then have such a bogus specimen of humanity utter the last words over your dead body, as if to see how extremely ridiculous the last scene in the great drama could be rendered. Hear a pious ranter at the funeral of a dead baby: "Gaud in his infinite wisdom has seen fit to tear this beautiful bud from the parent stem, ah. I think I can see the hand of providence in it, ah. Gaud saw, ah, that it would become the idol of their hearts, ah, and Gaud removed this little jewel, ah, to let them know, ah, that nothing must be adored, ah, above their creator, ah. The Lord gave, ah, and the Lord taketh away, and blessed be the name of the Lord, ah."

Think what brutes Christianity makes of men. The human mind cannot conceive anything more brutal than killing a prattling babe to spite a loving mother. I would smite a God who would kill a child because I love it. What would become of the race if all mothers hated their offspring? "Oh, it is right to love your children, but not too much." Well, how much? Why, just as much as you can, and not have God get mad at you. And then, according to the Calvinistic creed, "Gaud in his infinite wisdom" takes nineteen-twentieths of these little prattlers away from their fond mothers, only to use them as kindling-wood in hell. Christian buncombe!

What love can a savior have for a Christian when the Christian tries to make him stand all his loathsome tricks? In olden times they used to pile all their sins onto an old billy-goat; now the Christian piles them onto his savior.

There is no man who has the soul of a man who does not regret every wrong which he has ever committed. And when a man has thus reasoned himself into this repentant mood, he is least liable to be guilty of further wrong. And further, he will be least inclined to shift the consequence of such wrongs on another individual or being. And still further, he knows that many wrongs can never be entirely atoned for.

Not so with the Christian. He has a different scheme. He can run up a criminal debt, and get out all right. "Jesus pays it all, all the debt I owe." Though his heart is black with crime, "Jesus can make it white as snow."

Is such a scheme well calculated to develop a noble manhood? If there is a true way to damn the race, it is to teach them, and to make them thoroughly believe, that they can commit all manner of crimes, even to the murder of wife and children, and come out without a stain upon their garments. Even heaven itself is not too pure for their reception. With my last breath will I condemn such teaching. Instead of a dozen crucified saviors, it would have been a thousand times better for the race if a savior had never been heard of. What blasphemous nonsense it is to talk to the Christian about other saviors! "Jesus Christ is the savior of the world." This has been sung in his ears until it is impossible to lodge a fact in his mind in regard to the dozen other saviors who or which have been crucified for the sins of the world.

The average Christian will give money to send missionaries to the heathen in India, when he is too stingy to provide decently for those of his own household. He knows that all the widows are burnt on the funeral pile with their husbands, because he has seen the ashes which a missionary brought back which had been gathered from the spot where a widow was burnt. And he knows that all the mothers throw their children to the crocodiles in the Ganges, because he has seen a little shoe which a missionary snatched from the foot of a child before it was thrown in.

But, oh, horror of horrors, when you tell the Christian that his cross and his savior and his whole plan of salvation were borrowed or stolen from these same heathens, he is astounded, not because you have told him the truth, but because his Great Spontagligasticus, the autocrat of the skies, does not summon you without a moment's warning to appear before the high court of heaven to answer a charge of slander against his "blessed redeemer."

But the Christian's savior is only a third or fourth rate article; it has not even the poor recommendation of being second hand. There had been so many saviors before Christ that he, as a redeemer, did not even possess the charm of novelty. Divine honors were were paid to Zoroaster, Christna, and Buddha as redeemers hundreds of years before the birth of Christ. If the Christian would go to India himself instead of trusting to dishonest missionaries, he would see thousands of devout Hindoos on their knees before the cross in adoration of the savior Christna, who was crucified for the sins of the world more than a thousand years before Christ.

A brief outline of the history of this wonderful man ought to satisfy every Christian that his whole scheme was borrowed from this original. But "with God all things are possible," and with the Christian "Great is the mystery of godliness." It is just as easy for the Hindoos to have stolen their system from the Christians as for the Christians to have stolen their system from the Hindoos. The little circumstance of their system being more than a thousand years older need not stand in the way in the least.

The Indian savior was born of a virgin mother. Vast multitudes followed him, declaring him to be the redeemer promised by their fathers. His miracles consisted in raising the dead, healing the sick, casting out devils, etc. He comforted the sorrowing, relieved the oppressed, and visited the poor and the suffering. The mother and child were visited by wise men, and angelic hosts. The mother and child had to flee on account of an edict of the tyrant Cansa, ordering the first-born to be slain. In short, the story of Christna is the story of Christ. From this source the warp and woof of the web of Christianity were taken.

JOHN PECK.

Our London Letter.

When the printing office of the Freethinker was burnt down the religious papers were loud in assertions that it was a judgment of the almighty, but I hav not seen any such statement following the reports of the destruction by fire of sundry churches and chapels during the past few weeks. It would be extremely satisfactory to know the cause of so many of these places being burnt down in so short a time, and also why there hav been several sudden deaths among the servants of the Lord, either while praying or preaching. In most cases the buildings hav been insured, which shows clearly that those who are fervent in prayer to their God don't care to trust him very far. Pious Christians also apply the same rule to themselvs as to their churches, only believing "Leave thy fatherless children, I will provide for them," in theory, and not in practice, whereby they show their common sense, but at the same time their gross hypocrisy. Probably it is the experience of most people who are not believers that there is no such accomplished hypocrit as your average Christian man of business, and no one can be surprised that such is the case, as it is absolutely impossible that anyone can do any description of work and really believe in the directions laid down for daily life by the putativ founder of Christianity. The common tramp and loafer is the true Christian, though in most cases he does not know it, while the professor, instead of encouraging such practical Christianity, makes laws to suppress it. I cannot understand why people should waste money and time in pretending to believe what they know they disbelieve, and can only conclude the game pays in some way or other.

The prosecution of the Socialist leaders has not repressed the movement in any way, and it appears to gain ground here as elsewhere. The coming debate between Mrs. Besant and G. W. Foote on the subject will, no doubt, be instructiv, as the question should be thoroughly thrashed out by such disputants, and all the arguments both for and against will be brought forward. Freethinkers are divided on the matter, but, being Freethinkers and not Christians, can differ without quarreling. Charles Bradlaugh disapproves strongly, recommending coöperation in its place, though, as I understand it, Socialism is coöperation on a more fully extended scale. Since Bradlaugh has sat in Parliament without opposition, his views on things in general appear to hav become greatly modified, and another few years may see him with strong Conservativ tendencies. Fortunately, his partial withdrawal from the cause will in nowise adversely affect it, as there are so many more able workers and leaders than there were twenty-five years ago, and the places of those who fell out of the ranks can be immediately filled with equally qualified helpers.

Charles Bradlaugh is doing a good political work, and his efforts on behalf of oppressed toilers hav had good results so far. He has made a decided mark in Parliament, and has gained a considerable

The Lick Observatory.

[The following letter upon the Lick Observatory, written from Mt Hamilton to the San Francisco Examiner, will be of interest to Freethinkers, as it concerns the princely donation to science of one of the sturdiest Infidels of the Pacific coast. The illustration was made specially for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL of last year from a photograph taken by one of the gentlemen connected with the observatory. It is the only picture of the buildings and grounds in print.—ED. T. S.]

Mount Hamilton is the home of the Lick Observatory, the location of the great telescope, which within a few months is to draw the moon from her sphere two hundred thousand miles away, and bring her within a hundred miles of optical criticism.

The astronomical and scientific world are looking with anxious eyes toward this Mecca, where they hope to hav their most enthusiastic expectations realized, and the wonders of the heavens revealed to their gaze. The years that hav been devoted to the labor of preparing and constructing this monument to a philanthropist's memory evidently hav not been wasted. The great improvements made upon this mountain, four thousand four hundred feet above the level of the sea, creating a barren, rocky peak into a home where science is to be fostered and the unknown mysteries of centuries revealed, is certainly a work which all alike can view with admiration and pleasure.

There are few San Franciscans who hav ever visited this point. The register shows that the majority of visitors are from distant cities or from the other side of the Atlantic. No doubt this fact is greatly due to lack of information obtainable in regard to the expense attached to the trip, the distance from the city, and the time occupied in reaching there. Certainly no such information was at my disposal when the trip was determined upon. Therefore the facts are given here.

It is seventy-six miles by rail and stage from San Francisco to this summit. Both the South Pacific Coast Railroad and Southern Pacific sell round-trip tickets for $7.50. If it is necessary, one can leave San Francisco at 4.30 P.M., and take the stage at San José on the following morning. It leaves only on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday mornings. If a party of four or more are going up they can be accommodated on any day by notifying the stage company. The round-trip stage tickets from San José are four dollars each. A pleasant way for a party of three or four to travel is to take the afternoon train, hire a vehicle in San José, and drive to Smith's Creek, twenty-five miles distant, where excellent accommodations can be had. The early morning ascent of the mountain in the clear, bracing air is the most delightful part of the trip, and one which once made will never be forgotten. The expense to a party of four will not be very much larger than going by stage, although great care is needed in the selection of horses and driver.

The road from San José to Smith's Creek is in most excellent condition, and the rapid change of scenery and repeated changes of climate, from a warm breeze to the cool zephyrs which meet one with a welcome as one crosses some little valley or stream running from the canyons on the right, are delightful. From Smith's Creek to the summit the distance is seven miles. The road has a very slight upgrade, which makes the riding neither tiresome nor disagreeable, and there are no ruts or rocks to jolt one into soreness and ruin one's evenness of temper. The road winds around and around, and over and over again the traveler sees familiar landmarks a few yards below that were passed a quarter of an hour before.

About half way up the mountain the view opens out a fine extent of country in the Santa Clara Valley. Of course, at this season of the year, the hills are brown, and in the distance dark and purple shades mingle and destroy the freshness and green of the verdure which adds so greatly to this part of the country when the rains render the ground moist and giv life to the trees and flowers.

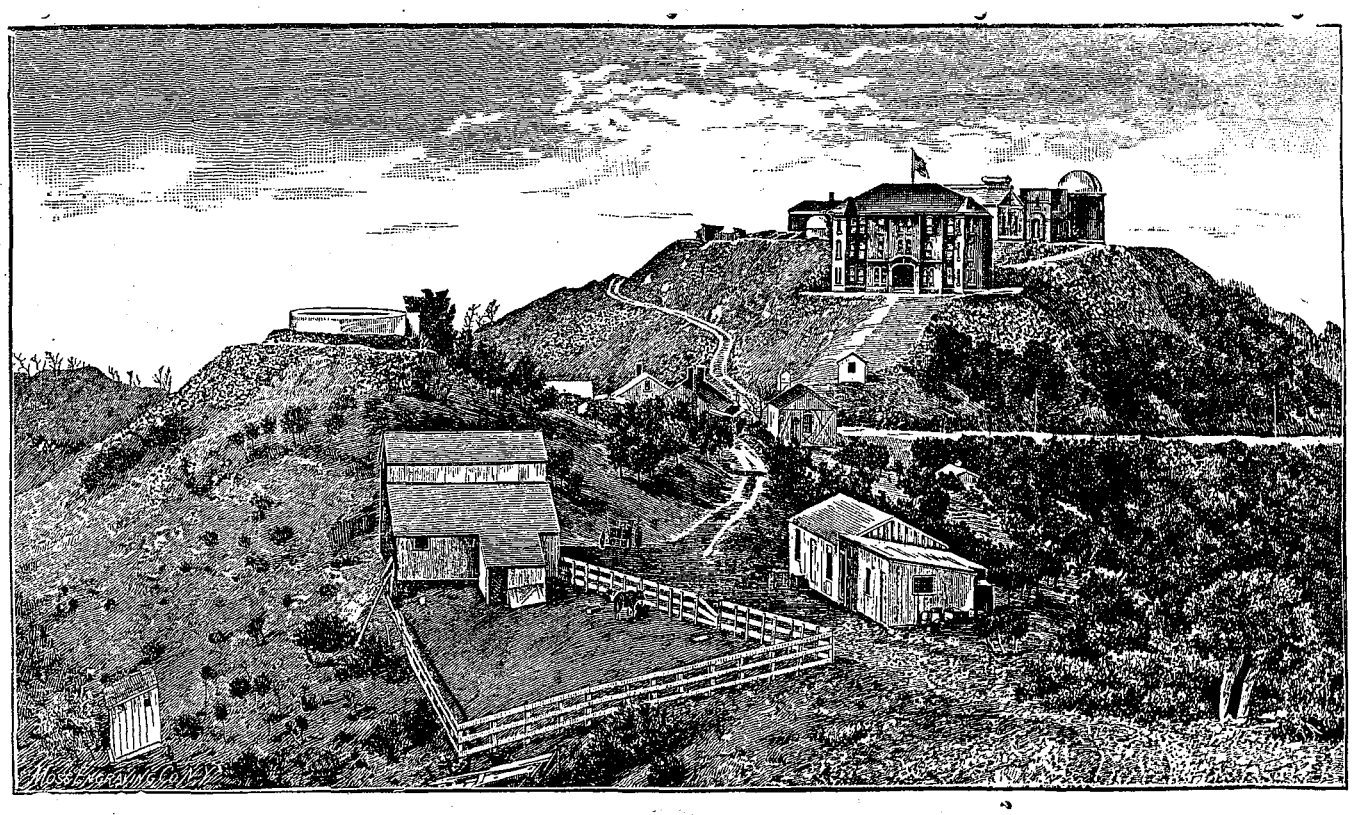
The first view of the brick structure, waiting to receive the great dome, that is obtained during the ascent, does not strike any responsiv chord of pleasure or satisfaction. It appears dwarfed and insignificant, and the rapid succession of views as the horses wind around the bends in the roadway do not dispel this feeling.

At last the summit is reached, and Capt. R. S. Floyd, the president of the Lick trust; Capt. Thomas E. Fraser, the superintendent, and Prof. J. E. Keeler, the assistant astronomer of the State University, come out to receive the party. They wear an air of surprise at the visit—pleasant surprise, however—but it is doubtful if they were not expecting it and had been watching the climb through their telescopes all the way up the mountain. Then one notices the presence of ladies, and, sure enough, it is not long before Mrs. Floyd, Mrs. Fraser, and Miss Matthews hospitably and kindly receive visiting friends in their charming home.

There are no accommodations on the summit for visitors. It cannot be expected that the three gentlemen named can giv their time to explaining to every visitor the nature of the instruments now in use. Neither can they well allow any one to wander aimlessly among the valuable machinery and paraphernalia which are located at various points on the mountain. It is not improbable that before the great telescope is completed, a hotel will be erected somewhere on the reservation, but at present the visitor must look out for his own provender as well as for the care of his horses. The water supply is scarce on the summit, but a notice about half way up the mountain warns the driver to water his horses at the spring at that point.

The foundation and walls of the brick dome, which will shelter the great telescope, are completed, and looking from where I am writing a dozen or more men can be seen busily engaged in placing in position the stone caps upon which the dome will rest, or rather revolve. This will be the largest revolving dome in the world when completed, which will be about the middle of March. Its inside diameter is seventy feet, and it will be seventy-five feet in hight. The bed upon which the great telescope will revolve, composed of concrete, iron, and granit, is now complete. The last slab was placed in position yesterday, immediately over the spot where rest the remains of the founder, James Lick.

But the great interest of all visitors centers in the lenses, about which so much has been written and published during the past seven years. They arrived safely a few days ago, and are now locked up in a fire-proof vault, guarded by double iron doors. Captain Floyd appeared to notice the impatience of my party, but he said nothing while coolly conducting the visitors from one point to another, all of interest, and giving interesting descriptions of the uses and wonders of the polished, delicate instruments which suddenly appeared in various places in most surprising ways. Finally the vault was reached and the doors opened with care, while every visitor involuntarily removed his hat. There they were. "I thought there were two glasses," mildly suggested one of the party.



"The two glasses are in that steel ring," said the captain, "bound in with iron bolts. There is a space of six and a half inches between them. You only see the rim of the steel ring. Wait and I'll move it around."

He did so. The face of the crown glass was exposed to view, and through it could be seen the flint glass and the wall behind through both. An American flag was hung up behind the lenses, and a photograph taken, with a foot-rule resting on top of the steel ring, so as to giv a better idea of the size of the glasses.

I was then allowed to enter the vault and closely inspect the lenses. In the center, or nearly in the center, of the crown glass, hardly a quarter of an inch apart, there are three small black specks, about the size of a pin's head, looking like the bubbles so common in glassware. They run in to a point, but how deep they are in the lens it was not possible to learn. It is possible that these specks were the cause of a recent statement that the glass was imperfect.

Captain Floyd appeared to pay no attention to the matter when he was questioned about it, further than to state that the glasses had been thoroughly tested by such experts as Professors Newcomb, of the Naval Observatory; Hastings, of Yale, and Burnham, of Chicago, and there could be no doubt that they are perfect. The specks noticed could not in any manner interfere with the usefulness of the telescope.

In alluding to the lenses he said: "Take down some figures now. Speaking with approximate exactness, the circumference of the clear aperture of the great Lick objectiv is equal to 9.4247779608—expressed in feet and decimals of a foot, while the diameter is 3.1415926535 in feet and decimals. Of course you know that the objectiv, or object glass of a refracting telescope, is composed of two lenses—one the crown glass and the other the flint glass. The space between them when mounted in the telescope will be six and one-half inches—the same as they are now located in that steel band."

THE LICK OBSERVATORY.

With this Captaia Floyd closed his little lecture, the doors of the vault were closed and locked, and the party walked out of the building into the open air.

But what a change in so short a time! Half an hour before the summit of the mountains and the canyon and the hillsides below were bathed in the warm sunlight. Now the lower world was shut out from view. The two lofty peaks above us are still reflecting back the sun's rays, but stretchibg out as far as the eye can reach are clouds of white, snow-like banks of fog, rolling over and over each other as if in play, and as they move and change their form, their edges catch up rays of the sinking sun, which giv them the loveliest of hues and most startling contrasts of color. It was a wondrous scene! Even the dwellers on the mount, to whom this kaleidoscope of nature is not new, gaze out upon it in silence. The visitors look on with admiration and delight expressed in every feature. It is a fairy transformation scene. As the sun sinks lower the clouds throw off their bright colors and become tinged with purple and yellow, and finally these changes also pass away and the beauty of a few minutes previous becomes dark and somber, and the laden dulness of the heavy banks of fog chills the air and the little group assembled so far above them.

amount of respect, his enemies decreasing continually in their efforts to injure him, and, if they hav no love for him, they certainly hold him in decided fear, and hav long since found he is the wrong man with whom to pick a quarrel. J. D.

Why Not?

The House of Representativs has passed an anti-Mormon bill which will probably become a law. It is substantially the same as proposed last year, the main difference being the omission of the clause appointing trustees to administer the property of the church. The bill repeals the charter of the Mormon church, and instructs the attorney-general to institute proceedings to recover all of the property of that corporation which was not acquired in accordance with the laws of the United States. Churches, grounds, churchyards, and property used for purposes of worship are not interfered with. It also revokes the charter of the Mormon Immigration Society, and devolves the property of both of the corporations to public school purposes. It leaves the election laws substantially as they are at present, except that it vests in the president the power to appoint probate judges subject to confirmation by the Senate. Polygamists are excluded from the registration lists. The concluding sections of the bill provide that all religious societies, sects, and congregations shall hav the right to hav and to hold, through trustees appointed by any court exercising probate powers in a territory, only on the nomination of the authorities of such society, sect, or congregation, so much real property for the erection or use of houses of worship, and for such parsonages and burial grounds as shall be necessary for the convenience and use of the several congregations of such religious society, sect, or congregation.

Now that the United States are fairly embarked on the religious business, why stop at Utah? Why not stop the immigration of Catholics? Thousands are arriving every year, and our jails are full of them. Why not take away all the property of all the churches save the church buildings, grounds, and churchyards? The churches own immense properties, centered in the hands of a few—the bishops of the Roman Catholic church holding in their own names millions and millions worth of lands—why not, if such holding is dangerous to the state, take this away, and devote it to building public schools? There is need of a score more schools right here in New York for the ignorant Catholic population. Why not take hold of these overgrown ecclesiastical corporations in the East as well as in the West?

It is true, the Christians of the East are not so thoroughly Biblical as the Christians of Utah, but they follow the example set by Solomon, as far as their means permit. It is hardly fair, because living is cheap in Utah, and the Western saints can afford a dozen or more wives, while the Eastern saint must be content with one and two or three mistresses, that the East should be excluded from the benefits of legislation! Why not, then, enlarge the scope of this bill and control all the churches?

With the exception of preventing the practice of polygamy as a religious rite in Utah, we fail to see what the United States hav to do with Mormonism. And the present universal law against bigamy is just as good as a special law against polygamy—except, perhaps, that it doesn't suit the Christians of the East, who ache to persecute their religious brethren in Utah. Moreover, if our virtuous legislators at Washington are determined to punish all violators of the seventh commandment, they need not travel as far as Utah to find them.

Frank Rivers.

Grief sincere and darkening will be felt by hundreds of Freethinkers when they learn that Frank Rivers was stricken with apoplexy on the morning of the 15th inst. at Buffalo, and lived but a few moments after the stroke.

Frank Rivers possessed a character all his own. Bluff and hearty in his bearing, as became a man of his avoirdupois, he was so gentle in his treatment of his fellows, and so enthusiastic in pushing good works, that every generous man loved him. He was the oldest living ex-showman in the world, and famous throughout the country for the number and variety of his amusement enterprises. He was born in Springfield, Mass., over sixty six years ago, and from the age of ten till about fourteen years ago was connected with traveling amusement companies. In 1849 he went to California. His first day's work paid him $27. Then he sold his claim for $5,000 and started for San Francisco, where he organized the first circus company in California, and afterward took seventeen shows thither from the East, among them three circuses and the first opera company ever seen on the Pacific coast. He went to Europe, and brought back Melett, the court jester, and took the famous Swiss bell ringers to California. He took the first circus to South America that ever visited that country, and managed the first circus that ever visited Australia, Japan, the Sandwich Islands, and the City of Mexico. He knew Dan Rice when the latter was a hostler. When the war broke out Rivers lived in Philadelphia, and paid taxes on $175,000 worth of property, he having brought with him $165,000 in gold from California. But his property deteriorated during the war, and reverses befell the veteran showman. In 1864 he traveled with an English opera company.

He afterward located in Boston, and was a medical bookseller when the founder of The Truth Seeker was set upon by that church scavenger, Anthony Comstock. Mr. Rivers's hearty and honest nature was thoroughly aroused by the outrage upon Mr. Bennett, and he worked untiringly for the editor's release. Through his efforts mass meetings were held in Boston, and by that means the voice of thousands of Boston's citizens was heard in the White House at Washington condemning the treatment of Mr. Bennett. Since Mr. Bennett's death, when speaking of the cowardly conduct of Hayes, tears of indignation would start in Frank Rivers's eyes. He hated a hypocrit with every drop of blood in his honest body.

At the time of his death Mr. Rivers was traveling for Charles Scribner's Sons, putting their magazines upon the counters of booksellers. He had been in Buffalo about twelve days, stopping at the Bensler House. The Sunday before his death he had suffered from a cold, but on Monday was feeling better, and was about the hotel all the evening. He retired late, and shortly after two o'clock his bell rang. The porter found him stricken by apoplexy, from which he could not rally. His wife livs in Newark.

Mr. Rivers was an educated, companionable man, with a deep knowledge of the world, and a full appreciation of the worthlessness of the current theology. He hated his enemies and loved his friends, and his friends loved him.

Not for Peace, but for Power.

A paper published in the western part of New York, slavishly devoted to the despot in Rome, has the effrontery to assure its readers that the recent order of Leo XIII. to the Catholics of Germany to support Bismarck in his demand of the Reichstag for a seven-years' war appropriation is purely and solely in the interests of peace. "His French children," says the concealer of the truth, "are just as dear to the pontiff's heart as his German children. Therefore he uses his influence for the passage of a measure which, in his judgment, will tend to insure that peace which the toiling masses of either country heartily desire."

This is all stuff! The pope orders the Germans to support those candidates for the Reichstag who wil vote for Bismarck's Septennate bill for the simple reason that Bismarck will in return giv the German Catholic bishops more power, and thereby improve the position of the papacy in Germany.

Some fifteen years ago Bismarck procured the passage of what are known as the May laws, which deprived the pope of the power to appoint bishops in Germany without first consulting the government, and in various ways hampered Rome. About a year ago the Prussian Chamber of Deputies passed an Ecclesiastical bill, allowing the church to settle without interference all questions pertaining to its own organization and disciplin. This was done in pursuance of a bargain with the pope to help Bismarck control the political Liberals of Germany; to secure the pope as an ally against France; and also to secure his aid in further consolidating the German empire. By the terms of this contract the pope was bound to help Bismarck whenever France showed her teeth. This Bismarck probably reckoned the pope would do willingly, because he hates the Atheists who are at the head of the French government, and who are depriving the church, one after another, of her state subsidies. But, precisely as we predicted at the time the contract was made, the pope has outwitted the prime minister. Before Dr. Windthorst, the leader of the Catholic party in the Reichstag, was ordered to support Bismarck, the pope exacted further concessions in the revision of the May laws. These hav been granted, and the church exultingly claims to hav forced Bismarck to concede her all her "essential" rights. That means she is free to plot with or against the government, as her interest may require. It argues well for Dr. Windthorst that he has refused to obey the pope, claiming with Dr. McGlynn of this city that Leo XIII. should not meddle with politics.

The "holy father's" solicitude for his French and German children is precisely as great as his desire to control them, and no greater. If he thought he could strengthen his hold by setting Germany and France at war with each other, he would do it if he could. Popes always hav fought when it was policy to fight, and no European wars hav been so bitter and bloody as the religious wars.

It is the sheerest nonsense to ascribe the pope's interference to any motiv but gain.

Here We Hav It!

Quoting last week the Catholic Review's opinion that there is no longer a school question for Catholics, we said:

"There is, however, a school question for the rest of the people, and that is to see that the school funds raised by taxation are never divided between the public and the parochial schools."

Even before that was written, the following bill had been introduced in the Senate of this state by Senator M. C. Murphy, and referred to the Committee on Literature, consisting of the Hon. Senators Charles L. Knapp, of Lewis county, Stephen M. Griswold, of Brooklyn, and Edward F. Fagan, of Queen's county:

AN ACT

To amend Chapter 218 of the Laws of 1875, entitled An Act to further amend Chapter 448 of the Laws of 1863, entitled An Act to incorporate the Society for the Protection of Destitute Roman Catholic Children in the City of New York.

The people of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

Section 1. The third section of said act is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

§ 3. The Court of Special Sessions of the Peace, in and for the City and County of New York, is hereby authorized and empowered to commit to the care of such corporation, children between seven and fourteen years of age, as idle, truant, vicious, or homeless children, in the same manner and under the same circumstances, as any magistrate in the City of New York is by said Act authorized and empowered to commit such children thereto, and all the provisions of said Act, in reference to the committal or discharge of such children by any magistrate in the City of New York, or the return of any child to the committing magistrate, are hereby made applicable to the said Court of Special Sessions of the Peace, in and for the City and County of New York, and the schools established and maintained by the New York Catholic Protectory shall participate in the distribution of the Common School Fund in the same manner and degree as the Common Schools of the City and County of New York.

Sec. 2. This Act shall take effect immediately.

We are indebted to James M. King, chairman of the Committee on Legislativ Action of the United States Evangelical Alliance, and our Methodist contemporary in the iron building around the corner for a knowledge of this demand of the Catholic church.

Mr. King, it is fair to say, denounces the bill vigorously. We presume, however, he objects to the bill for a reason analogous to that which moves a pig to crowd a companion away from a full trough. The Protestants hav got what they want in our public schools—Bible-reading, prayer, and religious songs—and do not propose to divide the money, which provides these Protestant religious exercises, with their old-time Romish enemy. But notwithstanding the Protestants are as deep in the mire as the Catholics would like to be in the mud, this bill must be opposed. If every Infidel in New York state will write to the Senate Committee on Literature, having the bill in charge, and to his senator, opposing the measure, the effect will be good. The Evangelical Alliance will work against the bill, and coöperation with them will in this case be fighting the devil with fire.

Our schools are bad enough as they are. Do not allow the great enemy of American liberty to make them worse, or to withdraw one cent from their support.

Sunday Laws in California.

When California adopted her new constitution she provided guarantees of religious freedom, enacted that no person could be deprived of his civil rights on account of his opinions upon matters of religious belief, and gave every person the right to affirm or take the oath according to his or her religious prejudices. About the sole relic of legal barbarism left intact was the useless formula of "So help me God" upon affirmations. And since the adoption of the constitution the legislature has found no time to violate the instrument by the enactment of blasphemy or Sunday laws, save one little statute of the latter class which prevents the legal employment of bakers on Sundays.

This condition of affairs is very displeasing to those bigots who think they hav the right to control the actions of others one-seventh of the time, and they hav been holding "mass meetings" to impress upon the public the necessity of Sunday laws. The most notorious gathering was held in the Assembly chamber, at Sacramento, which was called to order by a minister who introduced the speaker of the Assembly as the chairman of the evening. It is evident from the speaker's action in granting the use of the Assembly chamber, and his language when addressing the audience, that the I-am-my-brother's-keeper kind of folks hav caught one, at least, of California's lawmakers. The other assemblymen and senators, however, were conspicuous at the meeting only by their absence. "If the object of holding the meeting in the Capitol building," says the Sacramento Record-Union, "was to secure the attendance of the lawmakers of the state, it was a failure."

The pretense of the leading hypocrits who addressed the meeting was that Sunday laws are not a religious institution, but are asked for solely in the interest of the poor working man, God bless him! The shell of this cant was broken through right away by the religious zeal of the lesser oratorical lights. Some of their sentences are significant. After the Rev. Dr. Frost had secured order, and Mr. Speaker Jordon had stated the object of the meeting to be not religious, but to "secure the setting aside of one day out seven for a day of rest" (God bless the workingman!), an assemblyman from Los Angeles occupied the platform. He contradicted his speaker flatly, for "while California had so much to boast of, it had no day set apart for rest expressiv of religious sentiment, appropriate for Christian worship. With religious people, this is a religious question." Mr. Knox was followed by Senator Steele, who bore down upon the iniquity of compelling the workingman—God bless him!—to labor on the holy Sabbath day. But the learned senator forgot to say that Sunday in California is a legal holiday, and that no man can be forced to labor thereon.

Senator Steele was superseded by the Rev. E. R. Dille, chaplain of the Assembly, who should hav explained first where the Assembly obtained the constitutional authority to employ him, but who, instead, went on to say in substance that the workingman, God bless him! should hav one day out of seven upon which to rest, and the Christian should hav one day set apart sacredly for his use and behoof because "the government has recognized the Christian religion." Hurling a shot at the Germans and demanding the reënactment of the Sunday laws, the assembly chaplain gave way to the Rev. Dr. Frost. This gentleman is a furious upholder of Christianity. In regard to the Sabbath, he said it "was the law of creation. God set us the example himself. No man can lay claim to respectability unless he obeys the Ten Commandments." It pained him exceedingly, he said, to see five thousand Sacramento boys perch themselvs on the sharp points of a picket fence all the Sabbath day to watch a game of baseball. He was sorry that the boys didn't appear to be pained also, but they did not, although they would undoubtedly toss restlessly about on the cushions of a church pew. Dr. Frost added a lamentation that California and Nevada were the only two states sufficiently reckless as to their future to hav no Sunday laws upon their statute books, and closed with the time-worn story of the ship leaving Boston with the undue proportion of one hundred and fifty thousand gallons of rum to one missionary, and he a small one. The cause of Dr. Frost's grief over this unbalanced cargo is not stated, but is supposed to be because a small missionary could never hope to drink all that rum.

While these fanatical, one-sided, and wholly false statements of the California preachers hav no weight with sensible people, refuting themselvs to every well-read mind, they constitute, nevertheless, sufficient reason why the friends of liberty should be alert. Since the new constitution of California was adopted Sunday laws were placed upon the statute books by Republican legislators. When the Democrats swept the state, the laws were repealed. Assemblyman Knox, at this meeting, claimed that the Republican party was sure to pass a Sunday law within thirty days after it controled the state. Mr. Knox is, of course, a Republican, and his declaration was a bid for the church vote. It will be a detriment to California if Mr. Knox is a true prophet.

The Liberals of the Golden state must remember that unless they watch this movement of the clergy and thwart it, Sunday laws will soon hav a place in the Code, and the legislature will find some way to grant exemption from taxation to the churches and make money donations to their almost as worthless institutions.

Editorial Notes.

"THE TRUTH SEEKER, New York, says: '"God and His Book" is the heaviest iconoclastic broadside that has been fired at the Jewish God and the Bible by any modern Freethinker. Christians may get angry at it; but their system of religion cannot escape conviction under the powerful indictment drawn by Saladin."—London Secular Review. Saladin's copyist made a mistake. THE TRUTH SEEKER said, "by any recent English Freethinker." Some living American bookmakers hav drawn indictments equally powerful, though of different "counts." But Saladin is a mighty warrior!

"THE removal of the old Dutch Reformed church in Lafayette Place vacates another important territory for gospel preaching. There are some latter-day thinkers who will conclude it doesn't matter, as the Astor Library is so near. But all the reference books in the world will not lift up a soul alienated from God."—Christian at Work. Do not let your heart be troubled, Brother Hallock, concerning the means of spiritual grace in Lafayette Place. THE TRUTH SEEKER will move into the beautiful street just as soon as the weather permits the masons to finish the new building for our printing-office and editorial rooms.

MR. HARMAN visited his daughter and her husband at the jail in Oskaloosa on the 7th inst., and "heard the voices of the prisoners through the outside grating." Mr. and Mrs. Walker were in good bodily health, and of resolute mind, and commissioned Mr. Harman "to say to all their friends that while sincerely thanking them for their kind offers to furnish the money to pay costs of imprisonment, they most earnestly protest that they ought to be allowed to decide the question whether these costs shall be paid for them or not." We can not help thinking that this is an unwise decision, for unless the supreme court releases them, they are doomed to a life-long imprisonment. We do not see what good purpose is to be served by this self-inflicted incarceration.

THE Young Men's Institute of the Young Men's Christian Association of this city has refused to admit Wiltshire Payne to the privileges of its architectural class because he is a negro. Young Payne acquired what education he has at the Cooper Union, and his treatment by the two institutions illustrates the wide difference between orthodox Christianity and benevolent heterodoxy. Commenting upon this affair the Rev W. B. Derrick, a colored clergyman of this city, said: "The religious element in this country fails to carry out its professions. The Young Men's Christian Association draws its inspiration and support from the churches, and it acts as the churches themselvs desire it to act. Those men who would be the first to call a mass meeting to condemn intolerance in the South are the very ones to ostracize the colored man in the North. What can we expect from the South when such a spirit is manifested here? Not until the American church shall cease to discriminate against color can anything be hoped for from the state. It's a disgrace to the country, and some day, when the young colored men hav grown into a knowledge of their strength, they will show by their votes how they regard this treatment. This prejudice is not new. It has always existed in this association. I hav never known of a colored clergyman being invited to assist in the work or organization of the association, although the latter's ostensible purpose is to moralize and Christianize young men, either outside or inside the church, regardless of color."

WHAT kind of men do they hav down in Georgia for postmasters? In the issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 12th inst. we alluded to an incident said to hav occurred at Douglas, Ga. It was one of those crazy stories about an angry God paralyzing a blasphemer. William Burklett was the alleged victim. He is said to hav been a profane man, and on one occasion exclaimed, "I hope that God will paralyze me," when at once "his hands dropped to his side, his legs refused to move, and his eyes rolled wildly around. His prayer was answered, and he stood paralyzed on the spot where, but a few moments before, he was a magnificent type of physical manhood. He tried to speak, but his tongue would not move. Half a dozen men who were present were rendered motionless by the evident visitation of the hand of God." J. M. Harding, M.D., of Oil City, Pa., felt curious about the case, and wrote to the postmaster at Douglas. He received the following reply, which he publishes in the Detroit Evening Journal:

"DOUGLAS, GA., Jan. 21, 1887.

"MR. J. M. HARDING, Dear Sir: I answer yours of the 16th instant received, and will say I hav gathered all the information I could about it, and I will just say I think it is true.

"Very respectfully, B PETERSON,
"Postmaster, Douglas, Ga."

Mr. Peterson could not hav passed a civil service examination before obtaining his office, or else common sense is not sought for in postmasters. Mr. Peterson's thoughts are not very valuable as evidence.

THE Minneapolis, Minn., papers of the 13th inst. tell a story in which boundless superstition contends with insanity. It is of an attempt to bring back to life by the prayer of faith an only daughter who died some three months ago. Mrs. Anna Stickney is a widow lady residing in Northeast Minneapolis. Faith-healing meetings hav been held in that section of the city, and Mrs. Stickney was a regular attendant. She is a lady of more than ordinary intelligence, say the papers, and a church-member in good standing. During the illness of her daughter, last December, an alleged faith-cure by the Rev. R. A. Torrey made a deep impression upon her, and after her daughter's death the idea occurred to her to resurrect the child by prayer. Tuesday the corpse was brought from the receiving vault and laid upon a couch in the parlor. Bands of women from the faith-cure meetings gathered daily about the couch and prayed. On Sunday the mother's insane mind saw movements—she sent the women from the room—the lungs of the corpse became inflated—perspiration started—the agonized mother rubbed the corpse, when it became stiff and cold under her hands—all signs of life had disappeared. Such is the story she tells, and so limitless is her superstition that she regards the stiffening back into death as God's judgment upon her for interfering in his work by attempting to hasten the resurrection instead of waiting for prayer to accomplish the miracle. It is a weird and pitiable affair, and one's sympathy for the mother is uncontrolably mixed with indignation toward the system of religion which givs birth to such horrible impostures.

THE Boston Herald's correspondent in this city has found in the insane asylum asylum on Blackwell's Island a young woman whose condition excites feelings of pity and indignation. Through the long hours of the day she sits poring over a Bible, now and again raising her eyes from the page to ponder and weep. She is not violent or in any way dangerous to others or herself. She is the incarnation of sorrow, and will weep from now till death relieves her. She is the daughter of a member of an evangelical church, and was brought up to implicitly believe the Bible and trust the clergy. Some two years ago she married a man who was an Infidel, and the soul of honor, true to moral principle, and devoutly loving his wife. They had been married six months, when the husband fell a victim to pneumonia. His death came upon his wife almost as suddenly as if he had been brought home mangled by an accident. A source of grief to her was her fear because he had never been converted. The family physician watched her anxiously for a time after the funeral, for he could discern the seriousness of the trouble, but he soon concluded that she was in no danger. She seemed more than ever devoted to the church. One day she went to her pastor with a frightened mien to ask for consolation and light. With much trepidation and tendency to hysteria, she told him how she had dreamed that she had been granted a vision of hell. She had been praying incessantly since her husband's death that she might be informed as to his fate. She had begun to hope that her prayers might be efficient in bringing him divine favor, when the answer came in the shape of this vision. At all events, she feared that this dream was the answer, for as she had made her way through the burning lake she had seen her husband writhing in torment. Could her pastor offer any cheer? Could he assure her that the vision was a mere fancy—that it meant nothing? No, the pastor, rigid zealot of the old school, could see nothing less in it than an announcement of the judgment of providence upon the scoffer. With fanatic conscientiousness he told her his convictions. She listened in perfect belief, and went to her home a lunatic. It was not ascertained for a time, of course, that her mind was seriously affected; she began to spend her entire time reading the Bible. occasionally stopping to reason with herself, the conclusion of all her reasoning invariably being that there was a hell and that her husband must be therein. At first she argued the matter quietly, but with pathetic firmness, with those who were near her; then she relapsed into communing with herself alone. And that will be the end of her history.

Letters from Friends.

DODGE CITY, KAN., Feb. 9, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find check for fifteen dollars. Apply as directed. Mr. Putnam is going to be here in a few days. All arrangements are made where he will speak, and I leave it to him to write about this country and the friends of our cause. MORRIS COLLAR.

SEATTLE, WASH. TER., Jan. 16, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, for which please send THE TRUTH SEEKER another year. Heston is a brick. I get my money's worth from his pictures alone. Many a hearty laugh do I hav over them, and were it not for my giving them away to my neighbors, I would paste them all over the room, so I could feast my eyes on them continually.

F. H. HARKINS.

NEW YORK, Feb. 5, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav lately sent Mr. Hacker $1, for which I received from him one dozen of his lectures. I hav read them very carefully, and found that they were full of good, sound sense, and I would advise every person who claims to be a Liberal to send Mr. Hacker at least something to make his old age pleasant. I am sure that the reading they would receive in return would teach them a good deal.

BURTON DAVIS.

MERRIOK, L. I., Jan. 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The little pamphlet that you are selling, entitled "Personal Existence after Death Improbable," written by L. R. Smith, I think is the boss, the champion of light weights. It seems to me to be the conclusion of a thinking man, near his end, after a life of study and investigation. I hope that every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER will send for one or more; they are so cheap that they can afford to lend them out to their neighbors. Besides, it would be a charity to help Mr. Smith, for he has been sick for a long time, and not able to work; but I hope that he may get well again, so that he can teach school; he would be likely to scatter some more of the seeds of common sense into the children's heads.

F. H. MOLLINEAUX.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y., Feb. 5, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of Feb. 5th I notice an article from the Rev. J. W. Caldwell, Mapleton, Kan., in regard to the picture contained in your issue of Jan. 15th of the man who has maimed himself in accordance with Christ's injunction, "If thine eye offend thee, pluck it out," etc. The reverend gentleman says, "Not one among the millions who hav accepted his teachings, not the most silly, has ever so understood him." Now, I wish to state that I am personally acquainted with a man who did so interpret his meaning, to the degree that he unsexed himself, and I would add that, barring his religious fanaticism, he is by no means a fool. Neither has he ever been considered a lunatic, though the fact of his having maimed himself is no secret, being very generally known in the community in which he resides.

A READER.

BRISTOL, WIS., Jan. 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: You are sound on the indictment of the Chicago Anarchists. I read the testimony closely, and I could not see that a murder was proved against one of them. Had they been indicted for making speeches, inciting a riot, there might hav been some reason in it, but to indict men for murder, fail to prove it, and still hold them for murder, only shows what senseless public clamor will do. I hold that any party or sect that openly or secretly advocates the destruction of his neighbor's life or property for any reason whatever should hav the strong hand of the law laid upon him at once. Advocating destruction and death is not the way to cure the evils that we are enduring. Educating the people is what is needed. When this is brought about our evils will disappear like a frost before the rising sun. Inclosed find five dollars for two years' subscription. Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER prosperity, I remain, as ever,

A. D. CORNWELL.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Jan. 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith inclose you a postal note for $1.50 for six month's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER; will endeavor to send you the rest before the year's subscription runs out, which, I think, will be in April, 1887. There was a feeling on my part to giv up THE TRUTH SEEKER when you first got up the picture business; in fact, almost wrote you to stop it. But I found my head after a little thought, and came to the conclusion to let it come. Having recently taken a partner for life, and one who is a United Presbyterian, it would hav a tendency to raise a rumpus in the camp. But by letting it come it brought a new thought along, and I am glad to say in nine cases out of ten, when I come home, I find the wrapper torn off, and, in fact, if I ask if the paper came, I am told all about the pictures. Many a hearty laugh we had over the Adam and Eve business. Then I explain, in a gentle but not harsh way, the means and processes used to scare people to believe such nonsense, and I must say it has done good. Of course, to wipe all out it takes years of mental development, but with kind words and encouragement, and a little sacrifice, these things will come around all right. I think the greatest trouble with men is, they think women are not capable of understanding such things, and if a woman makes a mistake, or has a mistaken notion, they pounce down on her, and try to drive her along, which a majority of women will not stand, and the consequences are strong-headedness and loss of confidence in what one says. I hav tried with kind and gentle words to explain things of this kind, and found I made better headway, and in places where one would least expect to. So you see, even if I don't take so much interest in the union as a body, I am still with them at heart, and our cause moves on. Yours truly, J. S. J.

SEATTLE, WASH. TER., Feb. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The grand old TRUTH SEEKER still comes to hand every week, laden with gems of thought, which are highly appreciated by me, as I hav taken it ever since it was hatched out in a seed-garden in Illinois. The cartoons are grand, and I only wish THE TRUTH SEEKER could afford to add another sheet, so they could be cut out and put in an album, without hiding so much valuable reading matter. Our young city of about 12,000 is in a flourishing condition. We hav, I think, fourteen churches; last, but not least, we hav a flourishing Liberal association, somewhat like your Liberal Club, where we discuss all manner of subjects for the good of man here and now. We meet every Sunday evening. For the last three Sundays we hav been trying to keep God out of our constitution, and I tell you we hav given the old Jew God a pretty rough handling. Our Odd Fellow's Hall is well filled, and a deep interest is felt in the cause. Inclosed find $6, to renew our subscriptions. D. M. CRANE.

AUSTIN, TEX., Feb. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Being an occasional reader of your paper, and believing it to be the very best medium in the United States for the dissemination of every new fact touching the Christian religion, I inclose you a clipping from the Austin Daily Statesman of this morning. I send this simply to let you know that we in Texas are not behind Philadelphia and New York in Christian grace.

Yours very respectfully, M. R. SPRINGER.

THE EXTRACT.

ROUND ROCK, Feb. 7.—A Baptist preacher, who has been some days at Mr. Black's, in Old Round Rock, this afternoon is alleged to hav made some kind of insulting approach or proposition to Mr. Black's little twelve-year-old daughter. Her mother, Mrs. Black, learned the fact, sent to the store for her husband to come at once and bring his shot-gun. He did so. She met him at the gate and told him what had occurred. He returned to his store, got a black-snake horsewhip, leaving the gun in his wife's hands. The parson started to leave the premises, but Mr. Black went over and gave him a severe castigation. The parson ran, and at last accounts he was fleeing on foot in the direction of Manor.

BALLSTON, SPA., N. Y., Feb. 6, E.M. 287.

MR. EDITOR: Please send sample copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER to Mr. William H. Haigh and Charles Massey, both of Ballston Spa., N. Y. I hav been talking to them concerning their eternal salvation, and told them that if they ever expected to possess wings and a harp, and dwell with the lamb that was slain from the foundation of the world, they must subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and become members of the family of truth seekers, and then their calling and election would be sure. Brother Macdonald, I am almost through Volume II. of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and would like to see Volume III. (if the Lord will permit) before I open on Volume IV.

I hav just got fourteen photographs of prominent Infidels put into a gold-gilt frame, with two places for Mrs. Thorpe and myself, making sixteen, and it is something to be proud of. I wish every Infidel in the land could see it, with Brother Ingersoll in the center, and Mrs. Thorpe takes great pride in showing it to our Christian neighbors. Hoping the TRUTH SEEKER family are enjoying the blessings of good health and prosperity, we are, as ever, yours in the cause of humanity, MRS. AND MR. WILLIAM THORPE.

ALLIANCE, OHIO, Jan. 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $5, to be applied on my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I plead guilty to negligence in not remitting ere this. S. P. Putnam lectured in this place on the evening of the 13th inst. to an appreciativ audience. Parties came twenty miles to hear him, and felt doubly paid for their trip. Mr. Putnam is doing a good work, and he is "the right man in the right place." I think the idea C. Fannie Allyn advances concerning the getting up of some cheap story books for children a good one, and hope to see it succeed. She is also right in wanting all sides heard in our Liberal papers, including Spiritualism. THE TRUTH SEEKER, in my estimation, is a truly Liberal paper, and I rather think that Robert G. Ingersoll gave a very good description of it without naming it. Let Heston go on with his cartoons. I know of a great number who took but little interest in THE TRUTH SEEKER before it was illustrated, but now are greedy to devour it, and all because the pictures hav made them think, and now they want to read it. I read with great interest G. H. Dawes's first article, "Has Christianity Benefited Woman?" and hope he will continue the articles. The issue of January 15th is brim full of good thought, and is a copy that will be read by many with interest, regardless of their religious views.

Your for universal mental liberty, CARRIE E. WEIR.

COLFAX, Jan. 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, January 15th, is unusually full of good things. John Peck's article is well worth the subscription price of the paper. In fact, it is hard to tell, of all the good articles, which is the best.

Dr. Higbie's letter on the extravagant display becoming so common in putting away our loved ones, voices my sentiments exactly. Then Mr. Putnam's start on his new campaign; his "News and Notes" will be an interesting feature of the paper, as we follow him in his wanderings.

When the time comes to make arrangements for his appointments in this place, we want to be ready to receive him, for we are making calculations on both seeing and hearing him in Colfax. I read an article in THE TRUTH SEEKER several weeks past, describing a polling-place on election day in New York city, which was said to be a sample of all the rest. I thought several times as I was reading the proceedings of that miserable, demoralized, but highly important official group, Why don't they admit the women? When I came to the last of the article, behold, that was the remedy suggested! Let me tell you the remedy is good. We practice it in Colfax with excellent results.

Inclosed you will find twenty-five cents in stamps, for which please send to my address THE TRUTH SEEKER Annual as soon as published. KATE P. WOLFARD

BURLINGTON, KAN., Feb. 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find an account of a very sad accident which happened to our esteemed friend Mr. Borland. Mr. Borland is an old subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I thought that perhaps the readers of your paper would be glad to hear from him. I am glad to say that he is very much better now, and he thinks he will be able to go out again in a few more days.

I first became acquainted with Mr. Borland about eleven years ago. At that time I was a stanch supporter of the Methodist church, and thought to doubt God's word would send a man to hell before breakfast on an empty stomach. But since then I hav read a good deal of Freethought. Mr. Borland gave me some TRUTH SEEKERS to start with; then he loaned me "The Gods," and "Mistakes of Moses," and a host of others, of which he has a large assortment. Finally I became a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER myself, and now my wife and children are all Freethinkers.

There are over one hundred outspoken Infidels in this county now. If we were only organized we could do much better work; as it is, we giv the Christians some pretty tough punches in the ribs. I attended the Philomatheon Literary Society on Friday of last week, and read for their amusement "Uncle Pete's Religious Experience," which made some of the good sisters open their eyes pretty wide.

Yours for truth and reform, C. K. LEVERING.

AYER, MASS., Feb. 13, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: For sending me "The Fathers of our Republic" you hav my sincere thanks. You ask my thoughts on the lecture. The array of tangible facts are creditable alike to their authors and the renowned lecturer who has presented them. It is well for us and them that they left such clear evidences of their sentiments. The tree of liberty, or rather freedom, which these great and generous intellects planted, has grown to bear much good fruit, and, like the great banyan-tree, has dropped its branches and taken root in other hands. But the church, true to its instincts, is trying to fasten its insidious ivy of religious dogmas on its fair branches to poison its leaves which are for the healing of the nations.

The true heirs of such noble ancestry must exercise eternal vigilance to watch and repel this impudent and would-be despotic foe. Washington, Franklin, and Jefferson are, with a liberal clerical whitewashing, thought fit subjects for labeling them "Christians," while Paine, the unwitting teacher and educator, receives the honored label "Infidel." Franklin, Paine, and Jefferson were avowed, undisguised Deists—Infidels to a religion that has shed more blood than light—while Washington was reticent and noncommittal. Brother Remsburg just puts them all in one happy class, and resurrects them from the theological sands of hate, prejudice and slander. This is as it should be.

The force of truth is great,
It must and will prevail,
When false reports shall cease,
The slanderous tongue will fail.

But for the doubters, the Infidels, where would the world hav been to-day? The thing called religion has cost too much—too much precious life, too many temples and dungeons. The church has been consistent with its faith in blood. When the blood of Jesus failed, they killed the next best man. Will some one inform me if Infidels ever killed or persecuted? ELIJAH MYRICK.

MARION, N. Y., Feb. 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The issue of Jan. 29, 1887, has not yet arrived. I suspect some pious friend intends to reform me. It is a poor plan, however. For the special benefit of such disposed person I will refer them to Exodus xx. 8. Once before my paper came badly torn. Please forward me a copy of the above number. I wish to keep the numbers of this year unbroken. I am not blaming the company, because I am satisfied of promptness in the past. I borrowed Mr. Coggswell's paper for last week. I look for the paper with the same eagerness that I used to look for a letter each week from my "best girl." I think the advice to Mr. Walker and his wife is sound. 'Tis the same I gave friend C. B. Reynolds. Pay the fines by all means, put on the gloves, and strike from the shoulder. A jail is no place for business; isn't room enough to circulate in. I truly admire her grit, and would like to see them win; sorry I can't send them something besides sympathy. If there is any petition in circulation for the release of those seven men in Chicago I am willing my name should be put on. I am glad to see that so many of your readers are of the same opinion as myself. Hang the man that flung the bomb, if he can be found. It won't do to kill the wrong dog. I hav been through the East this winter and I know how the laboring men feel, and let me tell you there is trouble ahead if some of these monopolies are not regulated. The Knights hav many friends that will aid them outside of their own ranks when they put a ticket in the field. Let the local clubs nominate their men for assessors, and put a tax on these rich concerns, and if they don't like it, tell them—as the arrogant manufacturer told three hundred thousand mechanics in the winter of '73 in the New England and Middle states—that they are free to look up a more congenial location; and also add that they can take the Swedes, Italians, Canucks, French, Scotch, and the rest of their imported stock along with them. I protested at that time to flooding the country with such help and remarked that when the time came that this population got ready to cut their throats I should not feel under any obligation to render them assistance, and never would apply the strike plan. I put right out. As for stating your grievances to these princely manufacturers, that is useless. Just put your vote against them every time. When one endeavors to be fair with his men the rest of the same branch of brass, iron, steel, or cotton goods either force him to join the combination or ruin his trade. This I know to be a fact. Enough and more. JOSEPH E. COY.

KEOTA, IA., Jan. 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 11, 1886, you print a letter from "Schoolmaster," in Godstown, Out West. He laments over his chains that bind him to an intolerant community, leveling his more elevated thoughts to the dark ruts of ignorance, envying you for your liberty of expressing your sentiment. And yet there is no nobler calling than that of a teacher. He may, like old Samson, break his chains, and carry the gates of that intolerant, ignorant city upon the hill, and let the sun of reason shine on their streets. His lessons of geology, astronomy, physic, history, etc., will, like burning foxes, destroy the fields of superstition, the fountain of faith and miracle; and although his Philistines may dance above his head now, compelling him to harp as they demand, he may, like the aforesaid old gentleman, bring down that conglomerate of the dark ages, but the débris would soil his butter. His strength is not in, but under, his hair; so no Delilah will shear him. I envy him for his philanthropic opportunity to lead his scholars on to the new era of science. I envy his scholars, for their time will, at least, not be spent in miracle-planting. My own teacher was a very orthodox man. He was the father of that Professor Hochlman, in Leipsic, who, a few years ago, wrote a book, sustaining the Bible in its snake and ass talk. He dealt us big rations of religion, but very little of science, yet truth comes ever uppermost. I left my old sweet home in Saxony in 1853, twenty years of age, as a double-geared, Materialistic Atheist and Abolitionist. But those precious childhood years, troubled with Bible-history and faith lessons, are forever lost. Many people will never uproot these miracle-traps, and fall an easy prey to the priesthood. May the sparks under the hair of "Schoolmaster" grow quick and so abundant that he has to burst forth as a light in the ranks of Freethought. May you, Mr. Editor, and Mr. Heston continue to hit the right nail as usual, and the amplification of THE TRUTH SEEKER circle will follow.

NORTH SYDNEY, C. B., Jan. 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: It is not very often you hear from persons so far east as Cape Breton. In olden times we are told that wise men came from the East, but in these times of evolution there seems to hav been a "reversion," as a large proportion of your instructiv and entertaining correspondents, I observe, are from the land of the setting sun. What few persons of Liberal tendencies in religious matters there are on this island are so surrounded with the "dead calm of ignorance and faith" as to prevent their coöperation among themselvs, and shroud them from kindred spirits in the outside world. And when one of them recently, with a laudable desire to coöperate with his fellow-men for worthy objects, irrespectiv of creed, desired to join a lodge of I. O. G. T.'s, one of the members kindly intimated that a man who did not believe in God ought to be shot. Of course the Freethinker was blackballed. No toleration for heresy there. It is needless to add that rum and religion are the dominant elements in our population. In this town of about three thousand people, there are said to be over sixty rum shops of one kind or another, or one to every ten or eleven adults of the entire population. There are five churches in town, and one of the smallest of these took over $1,200 at a bazar the past summer. These few facts will enable your readers to form a faint conception of the difficulties and obstacles to be encountered by the man who has the courage to attempt the distribution of Freethought literature in such a community. A railroad has been surveyed to connect us with the continental system at the Strait of Canso, about eighty miles from here, and perhaps in another year, when that is completed, our charming natural scenery may beguile some of our nature-loving brethren from abroad to visit us. Especially would we enjoy a missionary visit from Brother Putnam, Reynolds, Remsburg, or Watts. The latter gentleman, I perceive, is one of the editors of that very promising new paper just started in Toronto, Secular Thought, which I am about to subscribe for, notwithstanding I already take two Liberal papers. This is the best recommendation I can giv it to your many readers. R. J. MOFFAT.

WAVERLY, W. T., Feb. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Is there no way that we can get the unpolished truth concerning missionaries and their works in what they call heathen lands? The Christian people of America seem to be ready to send their money to a distant land, with the idea that it will do more good than if the same amount was charitably expended in our own country.

Noticing your report in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Stanley's answer to question No. 7 givs me an idea that we should know what these men are doing that are sent to other countries with the full confidence of our people. The reports of their actions should be given to us by disinterested parties. We hav a right to know if there is any wrong-doing. Do we not see the pernicious works of the church in our own country, and the loose morals of some of the preachers? What guarantee hav we that the same rules and forms are not adopted in heathen countries, where intelligence is no barrier to missionary avarice and immorality? All reports that we get concerning missionaries are written by themselvs, and I fear they are not particular concerning the truth. If you hav any means of reaching the truth in these countries, I think you would confer a favor on all who hav such great faith in the saving power of Christianity. Could you not induce some correspondent in heathen countries to giv us facts that would be fair and reliable. If you cannot reach the truth in such a way, I would suggest that we send some able man to write up the doings and works of missionaries in Africa, China, or some other country. We know what they do here. Can we expect better because they are in a nation where ignorance is the greatest evil that they hav to contend against, and to the utmost of their power they will try to plunge the inhabitants into deeper ignorance, for that is how their bread comes. Look at Spain, look at Italy, and what do we see?—plenty of gospel-pounders, but very few of the common classes can read or write. The priest knows that education is a weapon that will strike his creed with a merciless blow. JOHN STEWART DICK.

BAKER'S CORNER, IND., Feb. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $10.25, to be applied as per inclosed list. We cannot well afford to be without your paper.

I want the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to know that there is a little band of healthy, robust Freethinkers in this vicinity. We, the outspoken ones, are not very strong as to numbers, but unwavering in what we conceive to be right, taking the lamp of science, reason, and good common sense for our guide. The waves of superstition and bigotry beat against our little bark to no avail. About seventeen years ago the Wesleyan Methodists organized in our neighborhood built a church, and hav ever since worked with all the energy and zeal imaginable to scare the devil out of the neighborhood, but they as yet seem to hav made no impression on his Satanic majesty; he still continues to flaunt his banner to the breeze defiantly, and we believe he ultimately will triumph. Understand me, reason and Freethought are the antagonists they are assailing. They are at this time holding a protracted meeting, going over the same program which has to be gone over every winter, reclaiming backsliders, driving, as it were, the lost sheep into the fold. They are very loud in their denunciations against pride and worldly-mindedness, but as to the former, I take notice that they hav an equal amount, if not a double portion, in comparison with those they term sinners and worldlings. I tell them I am unable to conceive how we could subsist on this earth and be divested of worldly-mindedness, as they are bound to admit "we are of earth earthy, and of the dust dusty."

I am well pleased with the pictures, and take pleasure in calling the attention of some of our Christian neighbors to them, as I think they speak so plain that they cannot fail to understand; and then some will look at pictures who would not take time to read a Freethought article. I am a great admirer of Mr. Peck's plain style of writing. I never fail to read his articles, and hope he will continue to speak through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER "Has Christianity Benefited Woman?" is excellent. Such articles do not fail to come under my observation. Belonging to the politically ostracized portion of the community, I take great pleasure in reading anything calculated to work for the advancement of woman's cause, which means advancement for the whole human family. Mr. Dawes, in his last article, speaks of woman clinging so tenaciously to the church. This I do not deny; but, speaking for myself, I hav not noticed much, if any, difference between the sexes with regard to this matter. One thing I will aver, without fear of successful contradiction, that by far the larger portion of the preachers are men, and this would include a goodly number, as they are indeed numerous. I want to say here that man has it in his power to giv woman the ballot, and thus open up the political field before her, placing her on an equality with himself. This, in my opinion, would be a great step towards educating her up to a condition above her present one. With regard to the church, there are many other things I would wish to say, in order that I may be distinctly understood on this matter; but as my letter has already grown too lengthy, I will discontinue for this time by saying that a friend has handed in a few names of persons whom he would be glad to hav receive sample copies of paper. I herewith inclose them. SARAH F. BAKER.

REPLY TO J. L. THOMAS.

MR. EDITOR: J. L. Thomas has written a somewhat severe criticism in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 22d of my views on the taxation of land. I am not sure that I should hav felt able to reply to his article had he not flattered me a little, and very nearly gave his sanction to my views on the money question.

I must say that I do enjoy such critics as Mr. Thomas. He states his objections clearly and boldly, and makes very little effort to say ugly things to his opponent. All this should be characteristic of Liberals. Let those who are trying to defend what they know is false fill pages with high-sounding emptiness, declamation, and mean epithets, but truth seekers should always treat their opponents with kindness and consideration.

Mr. Thomas's main question is, "How do people (that is, the public) expect to get possession of the lands of the United States?" Before answering this question, I would like to ask Mr. Thomas if he does not think that the people of the United States ought to hav possession of the lands of the country? If not, who should possess them? Again, I would like to ask him if he does not think that the natural things of the country should be enjoyed by all persons in an equal degree? If not, why should some be allowed a larger share of those things than others? Does Mr. Thomas think we should be allowed to enjoyed our natural rights, that is, the right to use natural things in proportion to the amount of money we hav to pay for them? or, does he think natural rights are inalienable and that they can never be justly bought or sold? Does Mr. Thomas think the present state of society, when about one person in ten is allowed any right to natural things, is a just state of society? If he does, I would like to hav him explain why one-tenth of the people should be allowed to enjoy all the natural things and the other nine-tenths none. If he does not uphold this system, if he believes all should be allowed equal opportunities, I would like him to explain how this could be done. I shall not insist on my way of doing it, but believe it should be done in some way.

I believe there is always a way to do what is right. If it is right that all should hav equal opportunities, then I believe we should see that all hav equal opportunities, and for all time to come. Will Mr. Thomas say Amen to this?

Mr. Thomas and many others speak of the views which I advocate on this subject as "theories," "theories," "theories," as though they were something that never had been and could not be put in practice. Yet I cannot see that there is any more theory about man's inalienable and equal right to land than about his natural right to liberty. Indeed, his right to the latter implies his right to the former; for no man can be said to hav his liberty in a country wholly owned by other people. Hence a freeholder is one who holds an estate in fee simple. One who does not so hold is not a freeholder, and is, therefore, not free.

Still, I do not blame Mr. Thomas for considering these views mere theories, for the air is full of it. Newspapers and public speakers constantly represent them as theories. But I claim the charge is false, and propose to prove that what is so often called a theory is a well established business principle.

Let us take a railway corporation for an illustration: It is proposed to build a railway through a certain country. A meeting is called and an estimate of the cost is laid before it. A company is formed and each member subscribes for so much stock. When the necessary funds are raised in this way the stockholders elect a board of managers. Each stockholder pays in a certain percentage of his stock, and the work commences. Finally the road is completed and owned by the stockholders. They do not divide the road up into little pieces and giv so much to each stockholder. The business managers operate the road and make it earn all they can. They pay all the expenses of operating it out of the earnings, and at the end of a certain time they declare a dividend in favor of the stockholders; that is, they pay to each stockholder so much for each share he owns. This dividend may be declared annually or semi-annually, and it is paid to each stockholder in proportion to the number of his shares. The expenses of constructing and operating the road are also borne by the stockholders in proportion to the number of their shares. Stockholders are not charged more or less in proportion to their wealth, or to the kind of houses they liv in, or the kind of clothes they wear, nor do they get dividends with relation to these things. The poorest stockholder must pay the same rate of expense of operating the road as the richest, and he gets the same dividend.

Now, society may be fairly considered a great corporation, and what we call the government may justly be called the board of managers. Each citizen, man, woman, and child, may be considered a stockholder, and since we hav long ago declared that we are all created equal, and hav certain inalienable rights, we can see nothing wrong in the proposition that each citizen shall take just one share of stock, and that that share shall be his equal share of the natural things of the country. Since they are already made, the board of managers hav only to proceed to operate them, and after paying the expenses of operating the national corporation, they should declare annually or semi-annually a dividend in favor of all stockholders, and this dividend should be equal. The earnings of the corporation operating the natural things of the country are the rent—the annual rent—of those things. It could be collected just as we collect taxes now. The difference would be that assessors would only hav to appraise the value of the land, but would not appraise the value of improvements.

There are thousands of corporations operated on these principles now, and they are a grand success, and are the chief characteristic of our boasted civilization. There would be no new principle involved in forming one more corporation, the grand national corporation, and operating it as I hav indicated above. There would be no more theory about it than about a railroad, or any other corporation.

Now, I want Mr. Thomas to understand that this would not be taking the land away from the people. On the contrary, it would be distributing it fairly and equally among the people. As we hav it now, the land is taken away from nine-tenths of the people, but under the proposed method of distribution all would be equal owners.

It has been supposed that the rent of the land of the United States would bring in a revenue of $5,000,000,000. We hav never yet used $1,000,000,000 in a year. This would leave an annual sum to declare in dividends of $4,000,000,000, or more than $66 to every man, woman, and child when the nation is 60,000,000. A family of five would then get $333 dividend every year. With this money they could pay the tax on a good farm, and liv free from taxation on everything else. I do not see that the richest man in the country would hav any right to complain of the operations of this law. It would do away with ninety-nine per cent of our tramps, and about the same percentage of our lawyers. It would make it easy for men to make an honest living, and hard for them to make it dishonestly. It might seem a little hard on the land speculators, but it would be for their good.

It seemed rather tough to take the slaves away from their masters, but there was nothing unjust about it. Natural rights are always more sacred than legal rights, though our lawyer-legislators try hard to reverse this order.

Mr. Thomas will observe that my plan of effecting the desired change is not by evicting present owners from their lands, but simply by changing the method of taxation.

Children's Pets.

As I am a great lover of dear children, and want to see them grow up to be noble men and women, I will tell you what I think is the kind of "pets" that will help you to be clean, cultured, and refined when young and old.

To be full-grown, noble men and women it is absolutely necessary to keep the choicest company. But children are not like old people and want pets, something to amuse and please, something to play with as pets. Among the truly lovely pets are the lamb, the calf, the colt, the dear little chicks, and the darling birds, though but little can be done with the birds in the way of making pets of them, for it is both cruel and wicked to ever imprison those dear little darlings, the birds. Their home is in the field and forest, and should never be in a cage.

First, look at the lovely, innocent lamb! What a dear, harmless look the lamb has that draws out every feeling of love and tenderness as you look into the lovely face. And what a warm, soft coat soon grows on the back of these dear creatures, the lambs, which I hope every child loves.

And next the "bossy," the pretty calf. How nice for the boys and girls to fondle and caress is a nice sleek calf, glossy and soft, almost, as silk. Look into the full, intelligent eye! What a noble specimen of the animal creation! Children should delight to play with, fondle, and feed these dear animals. By kindness and caressing them these attractiv young creatures can soon be made to feel you are their friend. When you go to their pens take something in your hands—a piece of bread, oats, or a potato—and they will soon become attached to you.

And the splendid colt. What a noble specimen of the animal creation is the colt! It can hardly be fondled as can the lamb and calf, but a colt is an animal to be admired by all lovers of a noble horse. The horse is the most intelligent of the domestic animals, and the most abused, because the fleetest. By training he will perform wonders.

Next, and in some respects the most interesting of all the pets for children, are the dear little chickens. See that flock of a d zen or more! Hear their sweet music and conversation! Yes, they can talk so that their fond mother can understand them. See how quick after they are out of their shells they will begin to scratch. Nature has provided them with the means to get their food while they are young by the help of their mother. See and hear them tease the old hen to hover them, so they may get warm. Throw down some crumbs, and see them start with it; or, if it is a worm, start and run by themselvs. Who does not love a dear little chick? And how busy they are all day to get their food, eating lots of worms!

But there are other animals I am pained to see children make pets of. I mean cats and dogs. All the others I hav told you of are very useful, lovely, and attractiv, but cats and dogs are not useful, and should never be made pets of. Cats are treacherous creatures. They destroy a great many dear, lovely birds, which are so useful to destroy bugs and worms. But cats are of no sort of use whatever, and decidedly unhealthy for children to play with. If these worthless creatures must be kept, they should always be in outhouses, but in the room with the family, never.

When the world becomes truly civilized, cats and dogs will disappear. Dogs, which are a decided nuisance, are the meanest and most worthless animals on the face of the earth. They cost millions of days' work of poor people to feed them, and they destroy hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of valuable sheep every year.

Children, never make a pet of a cat or a dog, and never fondle them, for they are unhealthy, and their society is demoralizing.

With an earnest desire to elevate the race, which can only be done by beginning with the children, do I send these loving lines to the Children's Corner.

Your friend, Seward Mitchell.
Newport, Me.

[Very few will agree with the views expressed above in regard to cats and dogs. Their keen instincts and intelligence, especially that of the dog, will long render these creatures favorits with men, women, and children.—Ed. C. C.]

Correspondence.

Roohelle, Ill., Feb. 6, 1887.

Dear Miss Wixon: I thought I would write you a letter. I will be nine years old in a few days. I go to the public school, and am in the second room, B class. Papa has taken The Truth Seeker ever since I can remember, and we all hav to laugh at the pictures. I hav two cats, and one of them is black, and the other is black-and-white.

I guess I hav written enough for this time.

Ever your friend, Sidney Hoadley.

Sand Lake, Mich., Feb. 7, 1887.

Dear Miss Wixon: This is my second letter to the Corner. I take pleasure in reading the letters in the Children's Corner. I received from J. Hacker his lecture. It is good. I would advise every young Freethinker to send for it. The Methodists are holding revival meetings here. They hav been in progress ten days; hav not got any converts yet; don't think they will. My father and myself went to the meeting last evening. The preacher did nothing but abuse Infidels. Father says the church is in its dying agony, and that is the cause of the preacher's wrath.

I am glad that my parents are Freethinkers. They never allowed any one to tell me any ghost stories or any yarns about the black man. I am not afraid of ghosts. I am not afraid in the dark. Some of my Christian neighbors' boys dare not step out in the dark for fear the black man will get them.

Yours, James J. Berridge.

Gloucester, Feb. 8, 1887.

Dear Miss Wixon: I hav seen so many children of my age writing to you and the Corner, I thought I would. I am twelve years old. My grandma has taken The Truth Seeker for a long time, and ever since the children hav been writing to you she has wanted me to write to you, and so has my father, but he does not know I am going to. This is going to be known to no one except my grandma and myself until they see it. My father, mother, two sisters, and four brothers, hav gone to Fernandina, Florida. Father has gone to keep a hotel called the Egmont. In the summer he keeps a hotel here, and that is called the Pavilion. I do not go with my father and the rest, but stay at home to go to school, because I do not like to stay in a class but one year. My studies consist of arithmetic, grammar, spelling, geography, reading, writing, and besides these I hav singing and drawing. I hope you will think this worth printing, because my grandma wishes to see my first letter in print, and I know my father will. This is all for my first time. Ever your true friend,

Lena R. Davis.

Dear Miss Wixon: Allow me a little space in the Corner to inform our young friends, Walter Penfield, and such others as may care to know, that our dear boy did not recover—Ralph Ellsworth Wey bright is dead. He suffered a long time. His vitality was very great. His ailing was of a cerebral nature— hat is, located in the lower back brain. He got a hard blow from a bat on the lower back part of his head while playing ball at school, and also fell several times, striking on his head and shoulders—the last fall being the hardest. From that time until his death he saw but few well days. We loved him. Of course we miss him. He was conscious to within a few hours of his death. He had no fear of death or a hell. A minister called to see him, but Ralph declined to see or hear him. Slowly but surely the end came, and he has gone.

I did not want to write this sorrowful news for the Corner, and might hav kept our loss to ourselvs, but for the sympathy expressed by our little friend, but, if we look at life and death from a natural standpoint, we need not distress ourselvs overmuch. It can do no good to the dead whom we loved, and it may do harm to the living. Freethinkers and their children ought to be more easily comforted than those who fear future punishment. We should study nature, ourselvs being a part of it, and accept the inevitable when brought face to face with it with as much reason as possible.

We are but a part of the great universe We cannot control it, nor do we know of any individual power that can. We need not scare ourselvs with some ideal monster, nor flatter ourselvs with an impossible heaven. If our children can free their minds from these useless thoughts, they can devote that time to something useful, practical. Suppose, for instance, that we get a good knowledge of the world we liv in, learn how to make ourselvs comfortable and happy, not by taking advantage of or wronging others, but in some way that the world will be better for our having lived a while in it, teach by attraction as much as we can, etc. But I must stop here. Yours until next time,

Uncle John.

[We sympathize with our friends in the loss of little Ralph. The children of our Corner are bright jewels, and we cannot part with one without sorrow. We can be glad that we had the light of his countenance and the joy of his presence for a little while, and the memory of his sweet, short life will always be a pleasure to recall. He is now beyond all pain and suffering, all sadness and sorrow. Let us think of his life as a pure, bright star, pointing ever to high and noble endeavors, to greater usefulness and worth to our fellow-creatures.—Ed. C. C.]

Our Katy-Did.

She did! She did! She did!
Katy did! Katy did! Katy did!

That is the song Katy did sing all night long to its mate. You hav heard it, of course you hav, many a time. But did you ever see the singer?

Yes; well, then, you know he is only a kind of grasshopper. His color is a lovely green, with wings and wing-covers of a darker shade.

It is not the female grasshoppers that do the singing, but the males, and what they say sounds like "Katy did." Nobody knows what she did but the one who keeps the same old plaint going from the setting till the rising sun.

The Katy-did grasshopper is an insect. How do we know that? Because he has six feet and rings on his body, as all insects hav. He belongs to the class called annulates, meaning rings, and is in three distinct parts.

Grasshoppers' babies are born without wings, and they pass through six changes before coming to be full-grown, perfect grasshoppers.

Katy-did's wing-covers are longer than the wings, and inclose the body like a pea-pod.

I suppose you think he says "Katy did" with his mouth, as you would say it, don't you?

Not at all. The sound, which is really and only a call to his mate, is made by the striking of the little taborets, or tiny drums, in the triangular part of the wing-coverings that overlap each other, and then, as the air escapes from the sacs of the body, when they are struck, snap, whack, it reverberates, and makes the sound of, "Katy did—she did! she did!" It can be heard a long distance.

The Indians call these insects grasshopper-birds. They get quantities of them and grind them into flour, and make cakes of them to eat. They regard Katy-did cakes as a very fine dish. The Katy-did is more common in the West than in the Atlantic and Southern States. S. H. W.

O. W. Holmes has sung, as below, of the Katy-did:

I love to hear thine earnest voice,
Wherever thou art hid,
Thou testy little dogmatist,
Thou pretty Katy-did!
Thou mindest me of gentle folks—
Old gentle folks are they—
Thou say'st an undisputed thing
In such a solemn way.

Thou art a female Katy-did!*
I know it by the trill
That quivers through thy piercing notes,
So petulant and shrill.
I think there is a knot of you
Beneath the hollow tree—
A knot of spinster Katy-dids—
Do Katy-dids drink tea?

Oh, tell me where did Katy liv,
And what did Katy do?
And was she very fair and young,
And yet so wicked, too?
Did Katy love a naughty man,
Or kiss more cheeks than one?
I warrant Katy did no more
Than many a Kate has done.

Dear me! I'll tell you all about
My fuss with little Jane,
And Ann, with whom I used to walk
So often down the lane,
And all that tore their locks of black,
Or wet their eyes of blue—
Pray tell me, sweetest Katy-did,
What did poor Katy do?

Ah no! the living oak shall crash,
That stood for ages still;
The rocks shall rend its mossy base,
And thunder down the hill,
Before the little Katy-did
Shall add one word, to tell
The mystic story of the maid
Whose name she knows so well.

Peace to the ever-murmuring race!
And when the latest one
Shall fold in death her feeble wings
Beneath the autumn sun,
Then shall she raise her fainting voice
And lift her drooping lid,
And then the child of future years
Shall hear what Katy did.

* This is a mistake, as the female Katy-dids do not sing.

Questions: What is a Katy-did? How do you know it is an insect? To what order or class does it belong? Why called annulate? How are grasshoppers' babies born? How many changes before they are perfect insects? How is the sound "Katy-did" made by the insect? What do the Indians call these insects? What do they do with them? Who can repeat the poem?

SPIRITUALISM Sustained By the Bible.

BY COL. JOHN R. KELSO.

CONTENTS:

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE BIBLE.
SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.
SPIRITUALISM A NECESSITY IN GOD'S GENERAL GOVERNMENT.
SPIRITUAL MEDIUMSHIP.
OBJECTIONS TO SPIRITUALISM ANSWERED

Like all THE TRUTH SEEKER'S publications, the mechanical execution of the work is all that could be desired. Good paper, clear type—in short, a neat little volume.

The primary object of the work, as its title indicates, is to sustain Spiritualism, but the absurdities of the Christian religion, and the abominations of the old Jew book, get a terrible shaking up. The book contains much to interest every intelligent reader. . . . Colonel Kelso has done much acceptable work in the cause of Freethought and Liberalism all over the land. Send for his new book—read it—put it into the hands of every Christian: it will teach him that the way of the fool is foolishness. Every Liberal who reads it will certainly find his "Spiritual" strength renewed.—John Peck.

WHAT'S TO BE DONE?

A NIHILISTIC ROMANCE.

By N. G. TCHERNYCHEWSKY. With a portrait of the Author. Translated by BENJ. R. TUCKER.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

"Shakspere" was Francis Bacon.

From the Phonographic World.

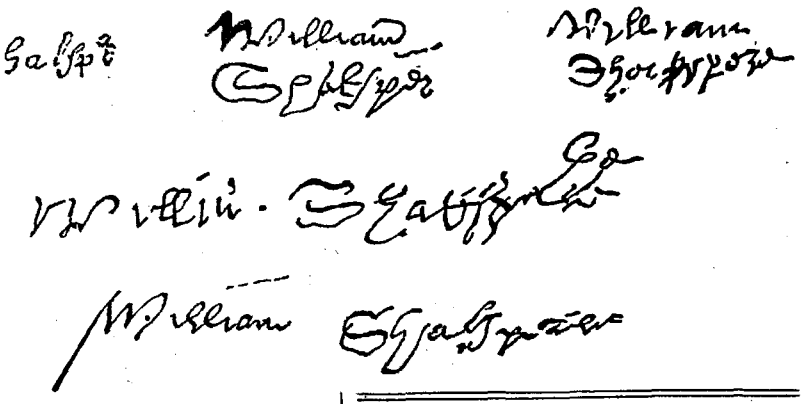
We hav just received from the hands of the author, William Henry Burr, of Washington, D. C., one of the oldest stenographers in this country, a most remarkable work (issued 1886), entitled "Proof that Shakspere Could Not Write," and setting forth the fact that the great poet was no other than Lord Francis Bacon, the famous English philosopher.

With the name of William Henry Burr, the older generation of phonographers are all familiar, though a short sketch concerning him will undoubtedly be of interest to our younger writers. Regarding him, Mrs. E. B. Burnz, answering our query, writes in a recent letter:

From what I can learn, William Henry Burr is about sixty-five years old. He is one of the oldest phonographic reporters in the country. He was one of the corps of phonographic reporters—the first formed in the United States—that went with Henry M. Parkhurst, in 1848, to report officially for the United States Senate. After a few years he took up miscellaneous, independent reporting, then returned to Washington, and was for several years an official reporter in the House of Representativs. By judicious investment he acquired considerable property, and has been for a number of years retired from reportorial business.



Upon receipt of the book, we addressed a letter to Mr. Burr, to which we received a very courteous reply, from which we clip as follows:

Since the publication of my pamphlet, I hav learned that one W. H. Smith, of London, has maintained for twenty years, or more, that Shakspere could neither write nor read. The conviction that he could not write came to me the moment I saw the engraved fac similes of those five autographs in Drake's "Shakspere and His Times." That was on the 16th of January, 1884.

We produce Mr. Burr's own autograph in our column of "Signatures," for this issue. Standing so prominent in the past history and practice of shorthand in this country, and now appearing as author of a work which is destined to overthrow the world's most cherished romance of her greatest playwriter, will surely render him an object of respectful regard by every shorthand writer in the universe.

The book itself, even though its authorship was unknown, or not known to us as emanating from the pen of a shorthand writer, is one of the literary curiosities of the day. The tale proceeds, deepening in intense interest at every added line, and with a constantly strengthening chain of evidence destroying all existing popular illusions concerning Shakspere, until it leaves us, at the close, with the world's greatest idol-poet not a poet; Shakspere not Shakspere. We are introduced to Francis Bacon, son of a lord keeper of England, educated at Trinity College, an adept in French, Italian, and Spanish, admitted to the bar at twenty-one, and elected to Parliament at twenty-three—a man of genius and learning, in every way capable of producing works of the highest order, and known author of "Bacon's Essays," ranking with the best literature of the day. At twenty-nine, Bacon "obtained his first show of favor from the court; he became queen's counsel extraordinary, but the office was without emolument. At this time plays for the theater were written and rewritten again and again to meet the demand." What more natural than that Bacon, with a high standing at court, which scarcely permitted his fathering the part of a common play-writer, and yet, without income from his high position, should hav turned his talent to practical account? or that, in preference to an unknown nom de plume, he should rather hav chosen them to hav been produced by one known as "William Shakspere," who, at that time, was part owner of a theater in London?

We are then introduced to Shakspere, son of an illiterate wool-stapler, uneducated, a beer-tippler and poacher, married at eighteen to a girl of twenty-six, and absconding from Stratford (his birthplace) to London, five years later. So the author continues, drawing parallel the two lives by successiv years, and proving, beyond a doubt, that Shakspere was in no manner the author of the works which bear his name. We are further told that "no handwriting of Shakspere has ever been discovered except five autographs. In March, 1613, when he was nearly forty-nine years old, he signed his name to a mortgage, and again to a deed relativ to the same transaction. Three years later he subscribed his name to three briefs, or sheets of his will. The five fac-similes are here reproduced:

They are all such signatures as an illiterate person, unaccustomed to write, would be likely to scrawl; they are so different that an acquaintance with one is little help to the recognition of another.

This book of fifty pages should be in the hands of every lover of "Shakspere." The author cites stanza after stanza, bearing directly upon the lives, conditions, and experiences of the two men, Bacon and Shakspere, proving his theory, which finally leaves the careful reader in no doubt as to the correctness of his deductions, and supporting his statement that Shakspere was no other than Francis Bacon.

The Meditations of a Truth Seeker.

FELLOW TRUTH SEEKERS: Some years ago, when my little son began to read history, I took his book and interlined here and there some paragraphs, a few of which I now lay before you for serious consideration, and I hope it may not fail to meet the eyes of a goodly number of poor deluded Christians or hypocrits.

A gentleman had a little son five years old, who had been taught by his parents to do right and shun evil; but in a thoughtless moment he stole a half-dollar from his father. The father whipped his hand with a little switch, saying to him, "There now, my son, if when you may hav grown older you steal, you may suffer much more than you now suffer from the effects of this little switch." Another man had a little son, three years old, who had not been taught so much as had the other boy, and who stole from his father a five cent piece. His father, when he became aware of it, was at work in his carpenter shop, and was very much enraged at his little son; so much so that he caught the little hand, laid it across the chopping-block and chopped it off with a hatchet. He then said to the poor little fellow, "Now, because you cry, and that you may never steal from me again, I'll just cut off this other hand." And he drew the other hand across the block and chopped it off also. This was a very barbarous, fiendish deed, and no doubt shocks your sensibilities; but I will now tell you of a father who acted as much more fiendishly than this as the sun shines more brightly than the moon. He had two children, a daughter and a son, who were so young that they did not know anything at all about right from wrong, good from evil. In this condition of stupidity, in which their father had purposely left them, they, in disobedience to his order, not knowing that it was evil to disobey, stole and ate an apple, for which act of disobedience he cast them into a lake of fire, there to writhe and burn throughout all eternity; and he did this not only to them, but also to their innocent posterity for all coming generations. Oh, had this fiend but chopped off their hands instead! Now, I hold that a person who believes this story to partake, in the least degree, of truth, and at the same time believes that that father is a just, merciful, benignant, or even an honest or decent father, is utterly incapable of rendering a fair and impartial verdict in accordance with the preponderance of testimony and the law; and I further hold that he is not capable of freely enjoying a single honest emotion. He and I hav very different notions in regards to that which constitutes veritable honesty. If the story of Adam and Eve, the apple, and heaven and hell does not shock your sensibilities, it is because it has been drummed into your mind from infancy, and that you hav not sufficient capacity to think yourself out of such a ridiculous condition of mind, such a fit of drunkenness, and you believe it just as the cannibal believes that it is right for him to kill and eat his fellow-man; and just as the Southern people in the United States thought it was right to buy and sell their own mulatto daughters and sons, and those of their neighbors, in slavery.

You don't know how depraved and low you are in the estimation of a veritable thinker. If there is a God, such as Dr. Thomas Paine fancied to exist, then, surely, the so-called holy Bible is a terrible blasphemy.

The little Christian children throughout the United States (Benighted States) are from their earliest infancy taught how to be liars and hypocrits. Their Christian mothers teach them that Santa Claus comes with a sleigh loaded with candies and toys, and drawn by reindeers over the tops of houses, and that he comes down the chimney on Christmas eve, and fills their little stockings with good things. Till having attained to the age of six or eight years, the little child believes this to be truth. But after that age it learns that its mother was a consummate liar. If the human mind is susceptible of being trained, and if from infancy it be trained in this manner, and in after-life it be not hypocritical, deceitful, and villainous, it must be because the germ of truth and honesty was so firmly set in the mind from the beginning that even such false training could not uproot it. In the United States (Benighted States) an honest mind is a great rarity, and is deserving of much praise. By such training the little children are taught how to brazenly practice the system of hypocrisy called Christianity. Were they not so taught from their earliest infancy, they could not, without smiling in each other's faces, pretend to believe the horrible absurdities that are taught by that particular system of humbug. Now, young men of America, those of you who are able to sit down and count over the ends of all your fingers, exclusiv of your thumbs, do let me prevail upon you to think a little. Dare to do right; dare to be true to manhood; dare to think for yourselvs, and to ward off all sophistry, all false doctrins, and all that has a tendency to debase the mind; and "do, for gracious sake, put down your clothes!" for the eyes of the world are upon you. Intelligence is one thing, while cultured stupidity and superstition are quite another. A fool may be educated to set the words of a language, or of several languages, up in straight harmonious rows according to grammatical precision and established usage, as is the case with many of our would-be statesman; but by veritable intelligence he must ever be recognized as a cultured fool, or, in vegetable parlance, as a cultivated weed. A mushroom, paint it in as many glowing colors as you will, can never be a rose; nor can a lie ever be truth, no matter how many gawkies may hav been induced to believe it so to be.

The Christian historian says: "As to the merits of Alexander the Great, I pretty much agree with a certain pirate, whom the Macedonian soldiers once took prisoner. Alexander demanded of this man by what right he committed his robberies. 'I am a robber by the same right that you are a conqueror; the only difference between us is that I hav but few men, and can do but little mischief, while you hav a large army, and can do a great deal.' It must be confessed that this is the chief difference between conquerors and robbers." To which I say, when the murdering, plundering, robbing, conquesting Christian Europeans first came to America, they were so ignorant as to the veritable geographical position of the country that they thought it to be a part of India, and therefore they called the veritable Americans Indians. They captured these noble Americans, falsely called Indians, and, having robbed them of their wives, their children, and their land, sold them into abject slavery, as they did, also, with Africans. Now, these Europeans and their descendants are holding the land thus plundered, conquered, from the Americans; and there is now more misery and suffering in America than there ever was before the Europeans came to this country. And so it will continue till the demon, Christianity, may hav been blotted out forever.

Christianity is an established system of hypocrisy and fraud, under which the few sharpers, thieves, gull and fleece the very many gawkies. If the American descendants of Europeans had been bred to veritable honesty, they would always hang their heads in shame when reflecting upon the fact that America belongs to them just as a stolen watch belongs to the descendants of the thief who stole it. But Christianity is enough to harden the cheek of anybody.

Had it not been for Lafayette, the Americans could not hav gained their independence. Hence, he was the veritable father of our independence. The Christians make light of him because he was not a Christian. When on his death-bed he said, "This life is like the flame of a lamp; when the oil is out, the light is extinguished and all is over." He was the greatest man who ever lived that had the wealth and opportunity to display veritable greatness. Had the independence of the United States of America, together with religious liberty, and especially the United States patent office, not been established, England would hav remained in the Christian darkness that prevailed throughout all Europe prior thereto. The advancement made under the United States government, founded by such Infidels as were Lafayette, Thomas Paine, Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, and others of their kind, has had the effect to pull Europe up along with it, in consequence of which, the world has advanced more in one century than it had done during all past ages. Mormonism and Spiritualism are advancements, because they hav set the people to thinking. And thus, step by step, the people are elevated from the bogs, fens, and quagmires of Christianity. The process is slow, but I hope it is sure.

Is there a God? The priest says yes. Did that God, almighty, make man? The preacher says yes. What did he make man for? The knave and his dupe say for God's own glory. Did God make man just as he desired him to be made? The knave and gawky say yes. We know that man is but a poor, frail creature of circumstances. All his physical and mental organs are developed according to the circumstances that hav surrounded him and his ancestors for many past generations. The organs of the head, such as amativness, combativness, caution, self-esteem, etc., and the consequent disposition, inclinations, and will of the man, are all the result of a chain of circumstances with which he has been surrounded, and over which he has had no control. Therefore, man is exactly what God, from the beginning, desired him to be, else that God is a botch, and not a good man-maker. If man is and always has been exactly what that God desired him to be, then that God is a fiend, else fiendishness is holiness. I tell you, my fellow truth-seekers, this god-idea is ridiculous. A million gods, pumping away for a million eternities, could not create from a million tons of nothing a single atom of matter. I hav often asked priests and preachers what my answer should be when asked if God is good and just. I hav asked them this question after having heard them tell me that I must not judge God; that no person, not even the pope, has a right to judge him; and they hav invariably told me that I should answer saying that God is good and just. I then say to them, Why, you hav just me that I must not judge him at all. Now, if I hav a right to judge him at all, surely I hav the right to render a decision that I think coincides with truth and justice. Ah, Mr. Priest, I see that you desire only to make a good priest-paying dupe of me! Your argument is nothing else than a mere tissue of stultifying sophistry.

If there were a God, such as the Jewish-Christians imagin that they are worshiping, and if man be permitted to exercise the faculties of reason and sound judgment, with which he is by nature endowed, seeing that all animated nature is teeming with murder, pain, horror, terror, and sadness, he must pronounce that God a fiend of utter fiendishness. The animals all murder and prey upon each other, and man seems to be the worst of them all. He does the same, and even worse. He preys upon the vitality, the labor, of his fellow-man while he is yet alive, and thus kills him by the inch. The rich, fiendish Christians and Jews hav the poor people chained, like Prometheus, to a rock, and prey upon their vitality, their labor, as the vultures preyed upon the vitals of Prometheus, which grew again, as does the labor, the vitality of the poor people, keeping them in continual torment, serfdom; and the rich are continually irritating this torment of the poor by flaunting in their faces the bitter sarcasm of fine coaches and horses, commodious palaces and parlors, fine silks, satins, and diamonds, all of which the poor people know were produced by their own hard labor; and that they hav been cheated out of them by the trickery of the non-producing rich who hold and enjoy them.

The Christian historian also says: "It has been affirmed that Cortez and his soldiers killed four millions of the Mexicans in completing the conquest of the country. He pretended that his only object was to convert the people to the Christian religion. But he and his soldiers acted like fiends, rather than Christians." To which I say they acted like veritable, consistent Christians, and that the most fiendish thing they did was to enslave the Mexican people to the false, fiendish, unrelenting system of humbug called Christianity. Hear their chief tyrant—this is what he said: "But those, mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay before me" (see Luke xix, 27). Oh, what a fiendish tyrant! His enemies are said to hav done by him as this shows he would hav done by them—served him right.

Brain may be compared to the sensitized plate which the photographer places in the camera obscura, and which, on being exposed to the light, let in through the lense, receives an impression of whatever object may at the same time be in front of the lense. So, through the five channels of evidence, called the five senses, it seems to me that impressions are made upon the brain; and thus the mind, the memory, and the judgment called conscience are formed. If the impressions upon the brain be very slight, they vanish; and to that extent, the brain forgets; and the same may be said of those made upon the sensitized plate, as aforesaid. When the plate, or the brain, is decomposed, the impressions vanish, and thus endeth the spirit, or soul.

Obituary.

S. L. Shaw, of Saranac, Mich., on the 29th of December, at his home, in his 73d year, passed away, leaving a faithful and devoted wife and four amiable and intelligent daughters to mourn the loss of a worthy husband and a tender and loving father. Brother Shaw has been one of the leading minds and efficient workers in the reform movements of Michigan for the last twenty-five years. His home was the home of the weary pilgrim toiling in the interest of these reforms. He never left it doubtful as to where he stood. In all suitable times and places he was not silent as to his conviction. He was not familiar with the term of cowardice—he was brave and willing that friend and foe might know what his views were. He never spoke in the terms of apology for his desertion of the old creed. He was willing to aid in every way possible the cause of Freethought and individual rights. To this end and for this purpose he paid out his money freely. While he was thus willing to do his best in the interest of the Liberal movements in this state, he was at the same time a rational and devout Spiritualist. In the fulness of this conviction he lived for many years, and in the rest which it brings, and in the full assurance of its truthfulness, he died. In him the Liberal cause and Spiritualism hav lost one of their best friends. While many among us do not share with him in the assurance of continued existence, yet we are with him heartily in all that relates to human progress and the interest of our common humanity. We mourn in this, that we hav lost a co-worker. In silence we stand at his tomb, and bring the tribute of our tears. J. H. BURNHAM.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

TRUTH SEEKER Office, 33 Clinton Place, New York.

News of the Week.

A BILL to provide the country with torpedo boats and floating batteries has passed the Senate.

MRS. DRUSE, the Herkimer county woman who murdered her husband and cut him up and cremated him, is to be hanged on the 28th inst.

THE coal handlers' strike, which was declared off last week, left a great many men out of work who would now be glad to go back at the old pay.

THE Boston baseball club will giv the Chicago club $10 000 for the sake of having catcher Kelly play with them. They will also pay Kelly $5,000 for the season.

THE Law and Order Committee at Union City, Tenn., called out the local preacher one night last week and gave him a whipping. It was charged that he had stolen a hog.

ALDERMAN JOHN CLEARY was known among his associates as "Honest John," but he is now on trial as a boodle alderman. Jacob Sharp, the briber, will be arraigned soon.

AN heir-at-law of Mrs. A. T. Stewart has brought suit against Stewart's heir, Judge Henry Hilton, to recover several millions which Hilton is charged with misappropriating.

GIBBONS, the American cardinal, is in Rome, and met the pope last week. He received a cordial welcome, and the meeting between the two distinguished humbugs lasted an hour.

THE Irish Revolutionary Brotherhood had a meeting last Sunday in this city. Captain O'Brien wrote from New Haven that with the help of God and a little dynamite he hoped to see Ireland one day free.

SAM JONES, the revivalist, lectured here last week for the benefit of a Methodist church. Jones is described as a tall, thin man, with a dark complexion, an artificial nasal drawl, and an affected bruskness.

"HAPPY BOB" VAN BRUNT, a member of the Salvation Army at Elmira, N. Y., has just been sentenced to be hanged April 15th, for murdering the brother of a girl with whom he had been consorting.

A TREMENDOUS wind-storm swept this section of the country last week Friday night, making great havoc with buildings, trains, and shipping. At Rochester, N. Y., a bridge was blown down with loss of life.

CAPTAIN UNGER, of this city, who killed his room-mate, cut up the body and shipped it to Baltimore in a trunk, has been sentenced to twenty years in the penitentiary. He saved his neck by pleading self-defense.

IT is reported that a prospector has just discovered some mummies in a mountain cavern in Dakota. They are five in number, evidently very old, having probably been imprisoned hundreds of years ago by a landslide.

THE funeral of Frank Rivers, the veteran book-seller and Freethinker, who died at Buffalo on the 15th, was held in Brooklyn last Sunday. Cornerstone Lodge of Masons attended the funeral and held Masonic services at the grave. The interment was in Cypress Hills Cemetery.

AT a recent meeting of the Congregational Club of San Francisco, it was said that in that city of 300,000 inhabitants the attendance at the Protestant churches was about 32 000, and at the Catholic churches about 18,000, making a total church attendance of about 50.000. Probably three-fourths of the population never attend church.

THERE was a small riot at Cambridge, Mass., last Sunday, growing out of the street-car strike. Boys and hoodlums attacked the non-union drivers, a crowd gathered, and there was a collision between the mob and the police. A half-dozen policemen were wounded. The police fired upon the mob, but it is not known to what extent their shots took effect.

THE New York Sun says: "For some months the Widow Richardson of Bloomington has been, apparently, a great invalid. Her physician advised her to hav an operation performed, but she put him off, and the next day, after a season of energetic prayer at her bedside by members of the Salvation Army, she arose from the bed, shouting, 'I'm cured! I'm cured!' The Salvation Army say that she was cured in answer to prayer; the doctors say that she has had nothing the matter with her at all."

A soft, sad stir is in the air,
Preluding gentle spring,
When base-ball umpires nest again,
And hens begin to sing.

BUMMER: "I've paid a great deal of attention to mind-reading. As an experiment ——" Sharp old gentleman: "I'm something of a mind-reader myself. Your intention is to strike me for a quarter, but you won't succeed."

A GOOD healthy mince pie for supper is cheaper than going to the menagerie, and you know all about the animals just the same, particularly when you awake in the middle of the night to shake the baby hippopotamus off your chest.

A CATHOLIC priest, named McGlynn,
Did not think it a terrible synn
To take a firm stand,
And say, "Free is the land;"
But Pope Leo replied, "It's too thyhn."

MRS. PARISHIONER: "Is it possible? And so your wife is a deaf mute?" American minister: "Yes, she was born so." "How terribly she must feel the affliction!" "On the contrary, she is the happiest minister's wife in the country." "Indeed!" "Yes, she never hears a word that the congregation say about her."

THERE was a great Doctor McGlynn,
Who regarded land-owning as sin;
Henry George's small taper
He thought quite the caper,
And found the millennium therein.

OSCAR BALDWIN, who four years ago was sentenced to fifteen years in the state prison for embezzling two hundred and fifty thousand dollars of the funds of the Mechanics' National bank of Newark, N. J., has been released on the ground that his imprisonment for more than five years was illegal. A man in New York was recently sent to jail for ten years for stealing seven dollars and a half. If it should be decided that more than five years of his sentence is not illegal, he will spend the remainder of his life in regretting that he didn't embezzle two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

STRANGER: "I'm taking subscriptions for a monument to Adam. Can I put you down for something?" Boston merchant: "Adam? I havn't seen his death in the paper lately." Stranger: "Oh, no, he died some time ago." Boston merchant: "And there hasn't been a monument raised to him yet? Shameful! You may put me down for fifty cents. What regiment was he in during the war?"

OMAHA sinner: "How do you like your new minister?" Omaha saint: "Don't like him at all. He is not cut out for a preacher; he ought to hav been a business man." "That's a fault, is it?" "Yes, sir, he has entirely too much business ability. Last Sunday he preached a roaring sermon on hypocrits, and at the close invited all hypocrits in the congregation to stand up. Of course, no one arose." "I suppose not; but what of that?" "Why, then he followed up his advantage by passing the contribution-box."

A KENTUCKIAN who had a claim against a railroad in that state for four hundred dollars for damages in a smash-up, was recently visited by one of the company's lawyers, who inquired, "What sort of injury did you sustain?" "Narvous injury, sir." "To what extent?" "To sich an extent that my old shot-gun now wobbles about so much that no longer ago than yesterday I shot at a rabbit and knocked over the best coon-dog in all Kentuck. I've riz on my claim to seven hundred dollars, and I'm goin' to push it until somebody hollers for mercy."

O BLACKSMITH!

O workman of the brawny arm
And the bronzed brow—Oh, say,
Out of he hissing and smitten steel,
What dost thou make to-day?

Dost thou use thine art in this time of peace
To fashion the thirsty sword
That shall cleave its course without remorse
In the battle-wrath abhorred?

Or dost thou forge, with force and fire,
The terrible bayonet,
That shall gleam at the front and bear the brunt
When the serried hosts hav met?

And the gray-haired workman paused in his task,
His heated brow to cool;
He shook his head, and, "Alas!" he said,
"I'm making a shoe for a mule."

Gems of Thought.

WHEN it is considered how religions hav been formulated in the past, how they hav in all cases been made up of pre-existing systems and traditions, the source of the Christian religion need not be a matter of much doubt.—D. M. Bennett.

MANKIND can hardly be too often reminded that there was once a man named Socrates, between whom and the legal authorities and public opinion of his time there took place a memorable collision. Born in an age and country abounding in individual greatness, this man has been handed down to us by those who best knew both him and the age as the most virtuous man in it: while we know him as the head and prototype of all subsequent teachers of virtue, the source equally of the lofty inspiration of Plato and the judicious utilitarianism of Aristotle—the two headsprings of all other philosophy. . . . Of the charges of impiety and immorality the tribunal, there is every reason for believing, honestly found him guilty, and condemned the man who probably of all then born had deserved best of mankind to be put to death as a criminal.—Mill's Liberty.

Not enjoyment, and not sorrow,
Is our destined end or way;
But to act, that each to-morrow
Find us farther than to-day.

In the world's broad field of battle,
In the bivouac of life,
Be not like dumb, driven cattle—
Be a hero in the strife!

Let us, then, be up and doing,
With a heart for any fate;
Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait.
—Longfellow's Psalm of Life.

STRANGE enough how creatures of the human kind shut their eyes to plainest facts; and by the mere inertia of oblivion and stupidity, liv at ease in the midst of wonders and terrors. But indeed man is and was always a blockhead and dullard; much readier to feed and digest than to think and consider. Prejudice, which he pretends to hate, is his absolute law-giver: mere use and want everywhere leads him by the nose.—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

THE solvency of great mercantil companies rests on the validity of the laws which hav been ascertained to govern the seeming irregularity of that human life which the moralist bewails as the most uncertain of things; plague, pestilence, and famin are admitted by all but fools to be the natural result of causes for the most part fully within human control, and not the unavoidable tortures inflicted by wrathful omnipotence upon his helpless handiwork.—Huxley.

IT is a contradiction in terms and ideas, to call anything a revelation that comes to us at second hand, either verbally or in writing. Revelation is necessarily limited to the first communication—after this, it is only an account of something which that person says was a revelation made to him; and though he may find himself obliged to believe it, it cannot be incumbent on me to believe it in the same manner; for it is not a revelation made to me, and I hav only his word for it that it was made to him.—Paine's Age of Reason.

SEEING that, by the confession of the most obstinate enemies of innovation, our race has hitherto been almost constantly advancing in knowledge, and not seeing any reason to believe that, precisely at the point of time at which we came into the world, a change took place in the faculties of the human mind, or in the mode of discerning truth, we are reformers: we are on the side of progress. From the great advances which European society has made, during the last four centuries, in every species of knowledge, we infer, not that there is no more room for improvement, but that in every science which deserves the name, immense improvement may be confidently expected. —Macaulay.

EPICURUS did not take any trouble to provide himself with those remedies which might hav enabled him to bear pain; such as firmness of mind or shame of doing anything base, exercise and the habit of patience, precepts of courage and manly hardiness; but he says that he supports himself on the single recollection of past pleasures, as if anyone, when the weather was so hot that he was scarcely able to bear it, should comfort himself by recollecting that he was once in my country, Arpinum, where he was surrounded on every side by cooling streams: for I do not apprehend how past pleasures can allay present evils.—Cicero.

Oh, who can hold a fire in his hand,
By thinking on the frosty Caucasus?
Or cloy the hungry edge of appetite,
By bare imagination of a feast?
Or wallow naked in December snow,
By thinking on fantastic summer's heat?
Oh, no, the apprehension of the good
Gives but the greater feeling to the worse:
Fell sorrow's tooth doth never rankle more,
Than when it bites but lanceth not the sore.
—Shakspere.

THAT the love of a special subject is a great spur to industry needs no proof, and it has never yet been shown that the mind is less exercised when it is exercised with pleasure. Every experienced student knows that the great secret of study is to read with appetite.—Goldwin Smith.

Good morrow to thee: welcome:
Thou look'st like him that knows a warlike charge:
To business that we love, we rise by time,
And go to't with delight. —Shakspere.

"ARE you sure that all which you take for good and godly is so in fact, my Virginia?" said Richard Fullerton to his daughter, holding her hand and looking steadfastly in her face. "Yes, papa," she answered, "the church is the voice of God on earth—oh, papa, if you would but hear it!" "I hear a better—the voice of science, and of that true humility and courage which can confess ignorance yet not be disturbed. But tell me, child, who has got hold of you," etc.—Mrs. Linton's Under Which Lord?

Notes and Clippings.

It is reported that Sam Jones received $19,000 for one month's work in Boston.

California has 4,000 wine-growers, and at least 160,000 acres are planted in vines. This represents an investment of $60,000,000, and givs employment or support to 150,000 persons.

"Why do the heathen rage?" asks a r elig ious paper. If they got a larger percentage of the money collected for them, perhaps they wouldn't rage so much. We merely offer this as a suggestion.

All signs point to an early spring in these parts. Not only was the ground-hog unable to see his shadow on the 2d of last month; not only hav robins and bluebirds appeared, but, best of all, wild geese hav begun flying northward. This is good news with coal at its present price.

It looks as if religious reform was making progress when the pulpit lets go of the ballet and jumps on the décolletté dresses. The ballet is an old institution that has never done any great amount of harm. But the décolletté style in a hard winter is most reprehensible. —St. Paul Globe.

Miss Mattie Smith, of West Laurens, was very ill, and Mrs. Edwards, who has a reputation as a faith healer, was called to pray over her. After the praying, Mrs. Edwards said that Miss Smith must go out for a ride. The invalid's friends objected, but she went, though suffering great pain. When she returned, she went back to her bed, and not long afterward died.

A Georgia negro went to a lawyer the other day, much disturbed in his mind because some white men had told him that he had not been legally baptized. The day of the ceremony was very cold, he said, and the preacher, who was not well, stood on the bank of the stream and repeated the words of the ceremony, while two deacons dipped the convert. This baptizing by deputy gave rise to the question of the validity of the ordinance, and he wanted legal advice.

Miss Kate Rapp, a young lady from Millwood, while visiting at the residence of Mrs. Terry, has experienced religion and was baptized at the Baptist church on Thursday night, February 3d. She was accompanied by Mrs. Ida Ryan, formerly Miss Ida Terry, and a number of the other young ladies. She was dressed in a white robe which made her appear very elegant. She was so overjoyed with happiness that she assended the long flight of stairs with a light heart and walked bravely into the pool and the following hymn was sang: "Come to Jesus."—Leavenworth Times.

A recent number of the Berlin Nation has a story illustrating the truth that the clergy are always on the side of the wealthy and strong. For several years after 1730 in Germany there were very good harvests, and very low prices for produce. Under these circumstances, many of the landed proprietors began to be annoyed and felt that they were damaged by the prayers offered up in church every Sunday for abundance, and they asked the priests and pastors to pray for short crops, which the clergy refused to do on the ground that it would be unchristian. The question was referred to the chancellor of the University of Halle, and he gave, in 1734, an opinion in favor of the landholders, which is to be found in vol. i, p. 973, of his great work, "Gelehrte Anzeigen."

The woman suffrage law which has been in force in Washington territory for three years no longer exists. By the decision of the supreme court, the suffrage is restricted to men. It is certain, however, that a vigorous effort will be made to secure a re-enactment of the law at the next session of the legislature. The defect, because of which it has been declared invalid, can easily be remedied, and as soon as the legislature assembles it will find itself besieged by the suffragists.—Seattle Intelligencer.

Another thing of good augury that the German election shows is the manly way in which a great body of the Catholic electors hav resented the interference of Rome. The more these German Catholics reflect upon the manner in which the papal authorities hav endeavored to sell them out to their persecutor, the man of blood and iron, in return for his proposed "mediation" in Italy, the clearer are they likely to see the danger of permitting foreign ecclesiastical interference in politics.—The Standard.

Professional humorists may be interested in these two jokes: "Mrs. W., walking on one of the wharves at New York, jocosely asked a sailor why a ship was always called she. 'Oh,' said the son of Neptune, 'because the rigging costs more than the hull.'" "A preacher who kept a huckster's shop was heard one day to say to his shopman: 'John, hav you watered the rum?' 'Yes.' 'Hav you sanded the brown sugar?' 'Yes.' 'Hav you wetted the tobacco?' 'Yes.' 'Then come in to prayers.'" The first was published in the "Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Hampshire, and Vermont Almanack" in 1799, and the second in "Benjamin West's Rhode Island Almanac," of 1805.

Jim Stevens, colored, was hanged at Princess Anne, Md., last week Friday, for an outrageous assault upon a white woman 80 years old. The account of the hanging states that he was engaged in silent prayer when the drop fell. His "spiritual adviser" said: "Into God's gracious mercy and protection we commit thee, the Lord bless and keep thee; make his face to shine upon thee and be gracious unto thee, lift up his countenance upon thee and giv thee peace now and forever."

Evidently Henry George's dislike of Archbishop Corrigan is opening his eyes to the political machinations of the Roman Catholic church. He says: "If there is a conspiracy to defeat the will of the people in the matter of a constitutional convention, there is every probability that, besides the corporations, there is in it the fine Roman hand of Archbishop Corrigan, and it may be that it is his influence with the managers of the corrupt democratic rings to which the inception of this bold attempt is due. That he did secretly exert himself to defeat at the polls the call for the convention we hav several times specifically charged, and this he has not ventured authoritativly to deny. It would be quite consistent with the character of the man and the methods of the school of clerical politicians to which he belongs that, having failed to defeat the constitutional convention before the people, he should now be schem ing to defeat it in the legislature."

Christian Absurdities.

Buddha was another known to have been crucified some six hundred years before Christ. He left paradise, and came down to earth, that he might take upon himself the sins of the world and relieve mankind of their suffering. His mother was a pure virgin, and was regarded as the queen of heaven.

His religion was of a very superior order. He taught the brotherhood of man and the equality of the human race. All mankind, according to his doctrine, formed one great family. Therefore he taught love, forbearance, patience, compassion, pity, and charity.

On account of his teachings and wonderful miracles it was declared that he was no mortal child, but an incarnation of deity. It is claimed that his moral code is the most perfect in the world. About one-third of the human family are converts to his religion. Thus the Christian may see that his savior has not the poor recommendation of being second-hand. If the Christian could see the worshipers of all the different systems of religion engaged in worship, he might be led to ask himself, "Which of all these different systems of religion is most acceptable to God?" or, if mankind is benefited by all this holy nonsense; or, if God would suffer any great inconvenience if this pious mumble should cease altogether.

Draper says, "It was not the importation of Greek skepticism which made Rome skeptical, but the excess of religion itself which sapped the foundation of its faith."

If the Christian could see all the bibles which have been written; could he know about all the saviors that have been crucified; could he see the adherents of all these various systems of religion engaged in worship—if not insane, he would see how silly these forms and ceremonies are. But I contend that Christianity tends to produce insanity.

When scientists, without an exception, teach that matter is indestructible, therefore without end, and that what cannot be destroyed cannot be created, and the Christian admits the soundness of the teaching and yet pretends to believe a book which says the whole universe was created in six days out of nothing, and gives as a reason that he "believes it because he can neither understand nor explain it," does he talk like a sane man? Would not such declarations be taken as evidence of insanity before any court?

When the Christian is told about the miracles of Simon Magus, Apollonius, Christna, Buddha, and many others—that the truth of these miracles rests upon as sound a historical basis as those of Jesus Christ—and he rejects all the evidence, but believes in the miracles of Christ, when he has no means of knowing who recorded them, is he under the sway of reason?

When a man declares that he believes that a father and son can be born at the same time, is it not safe to say that his mind is unbalanced?

When a man ignores the relations of numbers, and sets at defiance the plainest and simplest principles of arithmetic, he cannot be pronounced a man of sound mind. Now, I propose to test the Christian's sanity by putting his belief in regard to the trinity in arithmetical form:

1+1=3; 3=1; 1=3; 3—1=3; 3—2=3. Can figures be so placed as to involve a greater absurdity? And yet these figures express just what the Christian believes in regard to his God. I say the Christian is a lunatic!

If there is any new discovery in the field of science, the Christian immediately looks through the book of Genesis to find out if there is any heresy involved in it. If the new truth does not correspond with the statements in Genesis, then the Christian's pipe is out. The Copernican theory, the discovery of America, the facts of geology, and many other facts of science have been met by the Christian with his book of Genesis, and every time he has been driven to the wall. And yet, at every new discovery, he renews the fight with about as much consistency as a mad mule. All the facts of science may be sunk in the ignorance of barbarism, but to the Christian the snake story and the rib story and the six days of creation are of far greater importance. He is afraid that his Great Spontagligasticus will get mad at him if he does not on every occasion slap science in the face with these Munchausenisms.

If God wrote the book of Genesis, it shows plain enough that science is not his stronghold. The country of the Nile has been known for thousands of years. The soil, brought down by the current each year, causes the bed of the river slowly to rise; and every year more of this soil is deposited inland. The ruins of a city, once beyond the reach of this deposit, are now covered with mud. By measuring the depths of these deposits from year to year, and then measuring the aggregate depth, and by other very accurate experiments, scientists have ascertained, not the exact age of the world, but that the river Nile flowed just where it does now, thousands of years before the creation as laid down in Genesis, showing that the evidence was not all in when the Mosaic account was written.

There is the most undoubted evidence that there hav been great changes in both the animal and vegetable kingdoms. Remains of the most gigantic mammals and the most prodigious plants have been found. These have passed away and others have taken their places. Ages were required for the growth and development of these animals and plants. And yet one change has succeeded another, each change requiring a period of years which makes us dizzy to think of—all going to show that the author of Genesis had been off on a lark, and had not entirely sobered up when the account was written.

But all this weighs nothing with the Christian. He reads in Genesis, "In six days God created the heaven and the earth," and exclaims, "Let God be true and every man a liar!" When these facts in regard to geological changes were first promulgated, the Christian claimed that no such changes (as above described) had ever taken place during the history of man, therefore the animals and plants were brought into existence by a direct act of creation. But science answered, "Neither has man witnessed a direct act of creation," and that the "natural or spontaneous growth of animals and plants was far more reasonable than that they were produced by a sudden act of creation out of nothing and without a progenitor."

Moreover, there are stars so far removed from the earth that it takes light millions of years to traverse the intervening space. The most powerful telescopes reveal such stars to human vision. Where were those stars when God "created the heaven and the earth" about six thousand years ago? How do the pious sticklebacks meet these hard facts of science? "Man can be mistaken, but God is perfect." When a man denies the relation of numbers, when he ignores the facts of history, when a man denies the demonstrations of science, it is safe to say he is not of sound mind. The fact cannot be doubted that sincere Christians are lunatics, and ecclesiastics are mainly responsible. This state of lunacy gives them lives of ease and keeps them fat and sleek.

The truth is, the scheme of redemption without the fall of man is like a bird with one wing; take away the "six days of creation" and you might as well pull out the tail-feathers, for the snake story is not worth a cent; if you damage the snake story, you might as well cut off the head of the bird entirely. It is all linked together and must all be gulped down together. Well, the Christian is a man of "unbounded stomach." He has faith to believe that the whale swallowed Jonah, and with a little more faith he will soon be able to swallow the whale.

When the evidence is all in it will be found that man did not commence his career in a garden in a state of innocence. The first signs which have been found of man show him to have been a savage. He probably roamed at large without any permanent home or habitation. A hollow tree, a hole dug in a bank, or a cave, was his only shelter. His body was nearly covered with hair, and his first attempt at a "fig-leaf" was probably a patch of hide from some animal which he could kill. His food was wild fruits, roots, grubs, bugs, and snails. His weapons were mainly such as nature afforded him—his fists, rough stones, and perhaps such clubs as he could break from the limbs of trees.

The career of man can be traced with a good degree of accuracy from the age of the rough-chipped flint up through the age of polished stone, and through the age of bone and horn, to the bronze age. Through all these steps of progress the course of man can be traced, but the steps have been so slow that millions of years intervened while each step was being taken.

It is well known from fossil remains that there were plants before animals—shells, reptiles, and fishes before mammals. Although the length of the period required to produce "its kind" cannot be accurately ascertained, yet one period is never mistaken for another.

The implements found with the remains of man afford a history of his advancement which can be traced almost as unerringly as American history.

Rude stone hammers show when man had progressed far enough to have mechanical operations which required pounding or driving. Stone axes and knives show when he had something to split, hew, or cut. The arrow-head shows the invention of the bow, scraping and skinning knives show the tanning of hides, and rude bodkins and needles show when the manufacture of garments commenced.

Thus, briefly, the progress of man is traced from the savage state up to the historic age, and shows that the old story of the creation and the fall of man, as recorded in the book of Genesis, instead of being the word of God, is not worth a beggar's notice.

There never has been a time when man was pure, innocent, and happy. It has been taught that the fall brought sin into the world. Sin was never brought into the world by eating an apple. Sin is the child of ignorance, and will only be banished from the world when ignorance is banished. Intelligence is the parent of pure thoughts and noble deeds. It is insanity to teach that sin brought death into the world. It has been observed that throughout all time, and throughout the vast field of nature, there is a building up and pulling down—evening and morning, life and death. Wherever there is life there is death. It is as natural to die as it is to be born. There will be the same happenings after death that there were before birth. We were unconscious before birth, we shall be unconscious after death.

Nearly all astute thinkers regard death as a natural law, applicable to man as well as to animals and plants. Did the eating of an apple cause the death of animals and plants, known to have existed millions of years before the advent of man, or is death a universal law?

Moreover, if Christian teaching is true, if man had not partaken of the forbidden fruit, he would have lived forever. If he had been chopped into a mince-meat it would not have killed him. Even if he had been devoured by a tiger, somehow he would have kept right on living. A bolt of lightning would not have affected him any more than a puff of smoke.

Such monstrous absurdities man has believed for thousands of years, because he has been taught by a designing priesthood to put his faith in an old book which they claim was written by the finger of God. The further this subject is pursued, the more the signs of insanity increase. I assert, without equivocation, that all sincere Christians are crazy. Where there is a lack of sincerity on the part of professed Christians, there must be a corresponding lack of honesty.

The Christian seems to regard those who do not believe in such things with an eye of pity. He will tell you that you were born in sin; that the spiritual light has not yet dawned upon you; that you see with the "natural" eye, while he sees with a "spiritual" eye, and that that makes a difference which you, in your benighted condition, cannot understand; that the "mystery of godliness" is very great, which none can understand but those who have received light from on high; that some day the "scales" will drop from your eyes, and then the light will be revealed to you as it is in Christ Jesus. The most ignorant Christian will confront the most astute scientist with such pious palaver. The less he knows the better Christian he is. The better Christian he is, the less he is aware of his insanity. The more you try to convince him of his insanity, the more you are in danger of hell. Every test which can be applied to a Christian shows him to be insane. When one believes that a man can die and come to life again, that he can vanish and appear at pleasure, that men can come to life even after they are dead and stink, that the air is full of ghosts and demons, that a man can live in the belly of a fish, that snakes can talk, that a man can control the motion of the planets; that he can be taken up away from the earth bodily, that a child can be as old as his father, that a father and his child can be born at the same birth, that whether you add, subtract, multiply, or divide, one is the same as three, and three the same as one—Great Scott! is he not mad, crazy? There is nothing but the plea of Christianity that could keep a man with a mind thus wrecked out of an insane asylum. Otto, the wife-murderer, was "jerked to Jesus." He left Erie county for his celestial abode May 21st, at 10:30 o'clock. Too vile for earth, the authorities sent him home to Jesus. How many sneaks and snobs, how many dudes and dead-beats, how many thieves and rapscallions, robbers, adulterers, and murderers Jesus must have hugged and welcomed since A.D. 33!

No matter how much good Otto's wife may have done—no matter about her intellectual or moral worth—if she did not believe in Jesus, she, the innocent wife, is in hell, while the murderer is lounging around in the cozy nooks of the New Jerusalem. The last words of Otto were, "Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit."

According to Sam. Jones, his chance was a great deal better than Ingersoll's. With the Christian, belief outweighs every other consideration. Belief is like an old hat, put on or laid off at pleasure, brushed up and made to look well when needed; but woe, woe, to the man who does not have it on when death comes, for "Old Splitfoot" will dandle him on a red-hot pitchfork, sure.

JOHN PECK.

Familiarity With Great Persons.

A correspondent in Mexico writes of a little six-year-old Mexican girl who, dinner being late one day, said in Spanish, with perfect innocence and no thought of irreverence, "Jesus, but I'm hungry." The writer says that the little children, in moments of sudden fright or pain, cross themselvs and murmur, "Protect me, God," as devoutly as their elders do.

A Result of Early Training.

A Lewiston newspaper says that the little daughter of a well-known clergyman was heard talking as she lay in her crib the other night. She said: "Dear Lord, this afternoon I saw out upon the cold sidewalk a poor little girl, and she had no shoes or stockings on—and—and"—hesitating as though staggered by the problem—"it's none of our business, is it, God?"

Mrs. Colman's Reminiscences.

I next applied for a place in a public school, and obtained one by taking the place of a man and doing his work, for which I was paid $350 a year. The man who preceded me received $800 per year.

I had an object in view in taking that school other than earning my living. There had been for many years in Rochester a school called "The Colored School," to which all children having colored blood, who accepted public instruction from the city, were required to attend.

The school-room was the basement of the African church, situated in a low part of the city, both in respect to it geographically and morally, but, no matter what the distance from the home, or what the age of the child, this was the school. I presume it was because of my known Abolitionism that I was offered the place as teacher, though the difference in the salary paid was one item in the city's favor. I took the situation, determining in my own mind that I would be the last teacher, and that the colored school should die. The death was accomplished in just one year. I persuaded the parents to send the more advanced children to the schools in their own districts, suggesting that they always see to it that they were particularly clean in person and dress, and also that they impress upon such children that his or her behavior be faultless as far as possible. I then advised the trustees of the church to refuse the use of the room for school purposes. When the time came for the commencement of the school for the new year, there were neither scholars nor school-room. The death was not violent; no mention was made of it in the papers, and I presume not ten persons outside of the colored people knew of its decease, or, if they had known, would hav cared that the disgrace was abolished. I was given another school for perhaps no more laudable reason than I obtained the other, but this time it was not to save money.

If I were not writing an autobiography, I should feel that there was a good deal of egotism in many of my anecdotes; but I was in them, and my experience is what I am writing. At this time Miss Susan B. Anthony was recognized as a teacher, and at the annual meeting of the State Convention of teachers of New York (held the previous year) had, by great adroitness or skill, gotten a lady teacher appointed to read an essay at the next meeting of the institute. The lady appointed was rather of the milk-and-water kind, and what she would hav said had she not lost her courage for the attempt I cannot tell. I know that she would not hav said anything against the Bible as God's word, or the use of it in the public schools. When Miss Anthony found the lady would fail her, she came to me, saying she worked very hard to get the appointment for one of our sex, asking me to prepare something, and take the place as substitute—a place I never like. I said they would probably not hear me, but rejoice that one woman had failed to meet her engagement, and so they would only hav to listen to Miss Anthony, as she held an appointment for the same meeting. I at last yielded to the persuasion, and agreed to read an essay if permitted. In the weekly or monthly meetings of the teachers in Rochester I had advocated the abolishment of corporal punishment, but had not succeeded in converting any of the teachers (save one); all were sure there could be no order without the whip. I thought, if I could be given the opportunity, I would at least say why my opinion was against whipping children, and accordingly prepared an essay which would take about twenty minutes to read. After writing it, I took it to the city superintendent, asking him to do me the kindness to read it and criticise it—not the argument, but the style. He read it, and said: "You use the personal pronoun I; it would be more elegant to say we" (you see, my friend, I began a long time ago to be egotistical). I said: "How can I say we, when I know I am alone; no one agrees with me." "Well, then, it's all right; but I warn you you will raise a hornets' nest about your ears."

The prophecy proved true. I was not known to the convention, and in the discussion upon the pro's and con's of the propriety of allowing a substitute self-appointed to take the place of a regularly-appointed essayist, I kept entirely still. I felt sure that some of the Rochester teachers had whispered the words, "Infidel-Abolitionist," and I did not care to be known, unless accepted. A teacher sitting by me said: "What is there about that Mrs. Colman, that they object so much to hearing her? They hav already taken the entire time of one session discussing whether or not they will hear her. Do you know the lady?" I said, "A little," but was not disposed to introduce myself. At last the vote was announced as favoring the reading of the essay. I was greatly embarrassed when I began the reading of that very simple paper; but when, in answer to the question, "What will you do with the words of Solomon, the wisest man who ever lived—Spare the rod, and spoil the child?"—I answered: "Just what I would do with the example of Solomon, if a Mormon were to say to me 'Solomon had seven hundred wives. Why may I not hav seven or seventy?' I would say the civilization of the nineteenth century has outgrown Solomon and his wives," the storm of hisses, and the words, "She's an Infidel," took the fright all away. I am not made of the material that can be frightened by opposition, or thrown from my position by insult. In answer to the mournful assertion, "She has taken away my Bible," I said, "If your Bible is an argument for the degradation of woman, and the abuse by whipping of little children, I advise you to put it away, and use your common sense instead." This was forty years ago. I do not know another woman who, standing in my place at that time, would hav risked her reputation by saying thus much of the Bible.

The session of the institute was continued till long after the hour of adjournment, and when the evening session came Mrs. Colman and her Infidelity was the theme. I suggested to the chairman that, in my opinion, it would be more profitable to the meeting to discuss the subject matter of the essay rather than the religious opinions of the writer. It was a hot discussion, lasting until eleven o'clock at night. Miss Anthony's essay was hardly noticed (education jointly of the sexes was the subject), as she in those days, nearly forty years ago, did not trample upon the holy scriptures. Whether she does to-day I do not know. I'm glad, however, to know that her life-long associate and friend, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, has allowed herself to be advertised as a speaker at a Freethinkers' Convention.

Now what was the penalty put upon Mrs. Colman in Rochester for that Infidel essay? I was appointed teacher at School No. 1, at that time confessedly the most difficult school to govern in the entire city, made up of all nationalities, over-large for the size of the room, with two assistants, young girls, each with a whip in her hand. The state superintendent, who was at the convention where I had declared against the rod, did me the honor to say I had convinced him that the legislature should abolish corporal punishment, and he should ask them to do so that coming winter, and so by his advice I took the whip from the young ladies, told them I was senior teacher, and would from that time do the whipping. Suffice it to say, I had no trouble in managing the school without blows, though one day a mother came to the school, bringing with her a rawhide, and asked me to whip her boy. I said, "Madam, I'm not half paid for teaching your boy; do you expect me to whip him also?" The look she gave me always brings a smile when I think of it.

"Why don't you whip him yourself?" I asked.

She said, "I hav whipped him a great deal; he doesn't care for my whipping. I thought he would care if you whipped him."

Poor human nature! We take upon ourselvs motherhood and fatherhood, and try to govern our children when we hav not the knowledge to govern ourselvs. But the legislature did not abolish the rod.

In Syracuse, where I now reside, the Rev. Samuel J. May, an old Abolitionist, when chairman of the board of education, advised the prohibiting of corporal punishment, and it was done, and that rule is in force to-day. Mr. May was a reformer in the true sense of the word; not only did he work for the freedom of the slave of the South, but he was an open advocate of suffrage for women, an anti-gallows man, the workingman's friend, and, indeed, in our effort for mental liberty, he was ever our friend. He was particularly emphatic in the demand for one code of morals for both sexes. Mr. May's memory is revered and monuments are erected to his memory, but his work has not been carried out, and to-day no occupant of any pulpit, so far as I am informed, finds his duty in speaking for the outcast—perhaps I should exempt the Universalists from this reproach. I did not remain teacher long in Rochester; the small salary and the wide difference made in the wages paid to men and women for the same work was a bitterness I could not easily bear, and then I was not popular among the teachers. I always insisted that the schools were for the benefit of the scholars, and that is not allowable. Dickens's "nurses" are not the only officials, by any means, whose comfort is the principal thing to be thought of. Everywhere the rule holds good that the governors are the ones to be benefited, not the persons governed. The exception proves the rule.

I had been feeling for a long time that I must speak for the slave, but how or where to begin was the problem. The death of my eldest sister, with whom my father and mother lived (my aunt was now my mother), made a change for them imperativ, and it seemed best that they should come to me. I could now leave home for a time, as my mother could care for my child and keep the home. I had one friend in Rochester who thoroughly believed in me, and she has kept that belief in all these years—Amy Post. We hav been more like dear sisters for forty years than like anything in relationship more remote. She declared herself ready to plan a campaign and to accompany me as escort. She therefore said, "Get ready, write out two lectures, so that you may be prepared to speak twice in one place if desirable, and I shall soon make an appointment." Mrs. Post had been a life-long friend, prominent with her husband in the monthly and yearly meetings of that society, and had only left them because they were false to freedom in the person of the slave. She, of course, knew people in every quarter of the state where there were friends, and in many places there were very many who had left, like herself, the society.

LUCY N. COLMAN.

The Sinaloa Colony.

A dispatch to the New York Times from Portland, Me., givs the substance of a letter received in that city by the brother of H. M. Chase, one of the Portland contingent of the Sinaloa colony. It was written January 9th. Mr. Chase says that when the party reached Guaymas on their outward journey the steamer promised by the Credit Foncier Company was not there, and the colonists, after purchasing three months' provisions, chartered a French ship at a cost of $9 a person to carry them to their destination. The colony at Sinaloa is situated on a low ridge of hills, and there are lots of rocks and cactus trees scattered about, and but little else. Mr. Chase goes on to say:

> Water is our greatest bugbear. We get plenty to drink and cook with, but are not allowed to wash with it. We use salt water altogether for that purpose. The water we hav is good and cool, not very far behind the Sebago. We get it from an island seven miles away. It is said that in the rainy season the high tides flow into it and make it brackish. That is why we shall hav to go to the river to locate. The company hav some property there. The weather in the middle of the day is like June. At night it is like November. There are very heavy dews, which wet the tents like rain. I think the situation is hardly what it is represented. It will take years and years to build a city here. We cannot get water from the river, as it is too far away. They hav a road cut, and it is fifty miles by that road. The only thing to be done is to locate on the river and try and support ourselvs until the company can get things to enable us to build on the city site. There are no tools or anything here now. I shall not be able to write as often as I expected. Stamps are scarce, and money a sight scarcer. We chipped in all we had at Guaymas to buy provisions, and it is a pretty scarce article in this camp at present.

This justifies Mr. Owen's order for no more colonists to go to Sinaloa expecting the company to help them.

The Anarchists.

In response to an appeal from me to aid in the effort to hav the sentence of Mrs. Druse commuted into imprisonment for life instead of hanging, a friend says:

> I hav no sympathy for her simply because she is a woman. . . . You would not hav lifted your voice to save a man who had chopped his wife to pieces. You do not say a word when seven innocent men are condemned to death—seven men who do not deserve to be hung any more than you do, and who are proven guilty of nothing worse than the expression of their opinions in words none too plain. You are as dumb as an oyster at this outrage.

Until I had received this sharp rebuke I was totally unaware that I had been publicly silent on a subject for the defense of which my private writings had brought me many a letter of protest and condemnation.

While I am not an Anarchist in the full sense of the word, and believe in law and order save under extreme wrong, tyranny, and oppression, yet I grant to every man, woman, and child the right to speak fully and freely on any and every subject they deem of importance to themselvs or to the community (of course choosing proper times and opportunities).

We must be free to speak for all sides, as it is only by hearing all sides that a right judgment can be formed. I don't think these "seven condemned men" are proven guilty of anything more than free speaking, which, under our laws, is every freeman's right. I no more believe in hanging a man than a woman, though as a woman is a subject and a slave to man under her present condition as a non-voter, as well as a wife, we are compelled to show her special favors until she wins her birthright of political and practical equality. But I plead that we hav no right to commit one murder to atone for another.

Hanging is barbarism. It is demoralizing to all who participate in it as well as to all who even hear of it. Our civilization is too far in advance of it for it to be much longer tolerated.

I do not intend to make a long plea for the Anarchists, simply because all that can be said regarding their probable innocence and the injustice of their sentence has been said by wiser pens than mine, but I do desire to do my duty by putting on record in this public way my protest against hanging these men for doing what they deemed a grand and noble work for humanity, and doing it, so far as evidence proves, within the bounds of law.

Jesus as a Railroad Official.

A Mannsville, N. Y., preacher, who recently received a half-fare pass on the Ontario and Western Railway, wrote back to the passenger agent: "Your favor of the 17th inst. is received containing clerical pass 98, for 1887. Many thanks for so useful a card. When it will be yours to board the train to journey into the world of the unseen, may the general passenger agent of the Earth and Heaven Air Line, Jesus Christ, grant you a free pass check subscribed with his own hands. Gratefully yours."

News and Notes.

Thursday I left the pleasant home of A. R. Mott, of Bavaria, who is one of the most thoughtful of our Freethinkers, and hospitality was mingled with intellectual enjoyment. The day, however, was fiercely blustering. Nature was thoroughly orthodox. Not for years had such a blizzard swept the plains. The oldest settlers were unaccustomed to such continuous blasts, and sweeping clouds of dust. I was to take the freight train, and it was four hours late. Waiting for the train, and the wind blowing sixty miles an hour, was not a comfortable experience. To add to my vexation, just as I sat down to eat a good dinner at my friend Terry's, trusting that the train would still be fifteen minutes behind time, it came thundering along a little bit too soon, and I was obliged to leave the loaded table like a cannon-ball, and for the space of a quarter of a mile, in order that I might put myself safely in the car, and reach my destination—cyclones to the contrary notwithstanding. I begin to think that the Secular path is almost as hard to travel as the old-time Jordan. I did want that dinner in order to help keep that railroad car from blowing off the track. I arrived at New Cambria, where I was to lecture that evening, and amid somewhat of a lull in the hurricane, crossed the fenceless prairies to the home of my friend, J. W. Abbott. His brother, George Abbott, and Judge Osborne were there, and with a good fire and plentiful supper we defied the storm. Evening came on cloudy and cold, and it blew great guns, and it was simply dangerous to be out with a team. One could not see a rod in advance. It was useless to make any attempt to reach the hall, so we had our Liberal convention around the fireside. Mrs. Abbott is one of our bright women. She has stirred the community up considerably with lectures on woman's rights, Infidelity, etc. She holds her own with wit and argument, and is achieving quite a victory for Liberalism, and I hav no doubt she will be one of our foremost champions on the lecture platform, for she has the courage of her convictions, and has plenty of life, and progressiv thought, and ability for speech. Mr. Abbott is also a clear-headed worker whose contributions to THE TRUTH SEEKER show that he understands what to do and how to do it. So I had a pleasant time in their prairie home, while the heavens were black without.

Friday morning we were up at three o'clock, preparatory to a land voyage to Salina to catch the early train. Fortunately the wind went down, the clouds rolled off, and the moon and stars appeared. The breath of night was icy still, however, and so I wrapped myself in the hay at the bottom of the wagon, while my friend Abbott, brave charioteer, in the lofty seat above met the brunt of the night that did its best to disturb our equanimity before it fled from the conquering day. Sleepily I watched the advance of the brilliant dawn. One by one the stars sank into the faint luminous glory of the unseen orb. Far along the horizon flashed the crimson banners, and trees and houses, and the bare telegraph poles, were bathed in a soft color wondrously enchanting. I seemed advancing into a magnificent temple, as the glowing beams multiplied on every hand, and the god of day came marching up the glittering corridors of the sky. That was a beautiful journey indeed, from darkness into blithesome morning. The winds had made everything clean and bright, almost like polished gold and glorious azure, and shining fields encompassed my rattling journey to McPherson and Windom. At Windom I found a royal pioneer indeed, who for years has kept up the battle for Freethought with unabating courage—Lester Marks, who has been in every part of the Union, taking land journeys from Kansas to New York, and Texas to Kansas, and keeping alive when the doctors thought he ought to be dead—a man of unbounded perseverance and commanding energy, in spite of disease. I went to his home, three miles in the country, where I spent a pleasant day. He has four children, Frank and Ford, Avis and Jessie, all bright young Liberals. Ford was the first baby born in Ford county, Kansas, and so got his name. Mrs. Marks has three brothers who are Baptist clergymen—sound in the faith, while Mrs. Marks is both wise and otherwise, and this shows that in some cases woman has more sense than man—three to one. I gave the first Freethought lecture in Windom, a new village of about six hundred inhabitants, and the hall was crowded to its utmost capacity, about half the audience being obliged to stand. The most respectful attention was paid to my declaration of the principles of "Universal Mental Liberty." It was quite a surprise to many that Liberals could make such a showing as they did, and create such an interest and receive such a welcome. Mr. Marks's outspoken advocacy has made many allies of our cause—Mr. Wm. Gilpin, James Gilpin, I. L. Rury, I. D. Kaufman, Mr. Young, Dr. Richardson, Jake Willhelm, John Lloyd, James Adams, A. J. Petz, James Derbin, M. Conley, Will M. McKean, A. W. Sylvester, James Tuckhope, A. M. Smith, William McLaughlin, C. S. Sherman, and others, and they will hold the fort, I believe. Windom expects to grow. It is said that two more railroads are coming here. The country about is excellent, especially for cattle and hog raising, and this, at present, is the chief industry. There is a wonderful tide of immigration to Kansas this year, and its western portion is a booming land indeed. Real estate is doubling in sixty days in some quarters.

I arrive at Dodge City in the midst of a big snowstorm, the first of the season here. The plains are white, and if they only had sleigh-bells here, how they would jingle! But they hav no bells, and all the runners they hav are extemporized wooden ones.

What a picture strikes my eye of change and growth as I look upon this bustling Western city! Where two years ago only low frame buildings were seen are now palatial brick blocks, and the population has advanced from two thousand to six thousand, and this frontier town begins to hav the elegance of an Eastern metropolis. The country is being rapidly settled up, and farms are taking the place of stock-ranges. This promises to be one of the finest fruit lands in the world, besides being adapted to wheat, corn, etc. Rains are now plentiful, and there is but little need of irrigation. Thousands of cattle from Texas and the Southwest are shipped from this place. Dodge City was once a rough place, with its multitude of cowboys and the wild element of frontier life, but now it is a pleasant place, with social order, elegance, and the advantages of the most enlightened communities.

I was quite pleased to meet my old friends, Clarence Petty, Morris Collar, J. Collar, and others, all enthusiastic for the cause, together with new allies—Isaac Raines, G. A. Workman, J. D. Goodman, H. B. Karch, Esky Peterson, Wm. Dean, Chas. Hall, Dr. T. J. Wright, Gen. H. B. Van Vorhees, D. M. Frost, Mr. Lauber, Wm. Spencer, Henry Garris, Mr. and Mrs. Harrison Berry, J. H. Colburn, etc. Some of these came five, ten, fifteen, and eighteen miles to attend the lectures, in spite of the snows that made the roads difficult for travel. I had good audiences, both afternoon and evening, Sunday, February 20th, in Kelly's Opera House—one of the finest in the state, and which seats several hundred. This is a good Liberal community, and I hav no doubt our organization here will flourish. I hope to return when skies are clear. This is a point of great promis. The churches don't grow much. Western life does not favor ecclesiastical authority.

I must confess to something of astonishment to find Garden City, to which I came on Sunday night, a rapidly growing place of about six thousand inhabitants. Two years ago it was only a bit of a village; now it is rushing along like a railroad train, with flags a-flying, and the noise and excitement of a boom of the first order. This is one of the finest cities of the plains. The land office is established here, and settlers are flocking in. Superb brick blocks, hotels, dwellings, houses, etc., make it seem as if you were in a part of New York itself. There is a vim about this place that is quite enchanting, and I enjoyed it from the very moment I struck it, especially when I shook hands with the Chess Brothers, who were the first ones to fling our flag to the breeze—and a splendid company they soon found, although the churches are here in full phalanx—G. A. Kimball, J. A. Garver, H. C. St. John, Grant Stanley, Chas. M. McGill, and others. I hav not found any more inspiring comradeship.

I lectured last evening at the Opera House. The attendance was large. I was introduced by H. C. St. John, a son of ex-Governor St. John, who has the fire of Liberal thought as well as reform, and believes in humanity and this world, and not in God. I lecture again on Wednesday evening at the Opera House, when I hope for a still larger attendance. Meanwhile I am resting at the home of W. A. Chess, where I find a cordial Liberal element, baby and all, and the recreation is delightful. Mrs. Chess and her sister and mother hav been for years in the atmosphere of a generous Secular life. Mr. Lewis D. Smith, the husband and father, was a noble-hearted Freethinker—one of the leading and veteran editors of Michigan at the time of his death, and always an outspoken advocate of our cause—and whose last request was that no clergyman should preach over his dead body. All he desired was the voice of affection, the presence of loved ones—wife, children, and friends—and thus to pass into the bosom of eternal Nature. So I find in this Western home the remembrance of a heroic life, and with it incentiv to the broadening work of the future and hope for the triumph of justice.

I look forward to friendly greetings in Colorado at Greeley, Feb. 27th; Denver, March 6th and 13th. I am obliged to giv up going to Prescott, Arizona, and shall be at San Diego, Cal., March 17th and 18th; Los Angeles, 20th and 27th; Santa Ana, 21st, 22d, and 23d; Norwalk, 24th and 25th; Tulare, 29th and 30th; Visalia, 31st and April 1st; San Francisco, 3d and 10th; San José, 17th and 24th, and other places in California up to June 1st. I shall be in Oregon during June, in Washington territory during July, and return Eastward in August.

The Liberal Club.

The writer has now attended the Manhattan Liberal Club with more or less constancy since the autumn of 1875, and during that time a good many graceful persons hav occupied its platform, but he does not remember having heard a more agreeable speaker than Mrs. Fay Pearce, of Boston, who talked about "Coöperativ Housekeeping" at the 437th regular meeting of that body.

The evening of Friday, Feb. 25th, was a pleasant one as to weather, and the writer loitered somewhat on his way to the club, so it was near a quarter past 8 o'clock when he reached the corner of Fourteenth street and Third avenue. Here he was about to accelerate his steps, fearing to miss a portion of the exercises, when he perceived one of the most distinguished and learned members of the club descending the steps of the elevated railroad station. Underneath the steps an Italian merchant keeps a fruit-stand, and here the member halted and purchased two apples, one of which he proceeded to eat as he walked along, and the other he placed reflectivly in a small satchel. The man with the badge-pin was greatly impressed by the dignified simplicity of the act. It is well for the young and worldly to occasionally meet in their walks examples of that obliviousness to mere outward appearance which comes to those whose minds are made the storehouse of philosophy and the abiding-place of great thoughts. It was therefore in a spirit of humility that the writer pursued his way, arriving at the hall just as the secretary had finished reading the minutes of the previous meeting.

The Chair introduced the lady speaker of the evening in a way that did great credit to its gallantry, in which it is never wanting on such occasions, and Mrs. Pearce began her lecture. Mrs. Pearce is an engaging little lady. As is said to be the custom in Boston, she used eye-glasses which it was necessary to support with one hand while reading through them. The speaker began by saying that the first great fact in society is the existence of the two sexes. The stronger sex is organized and is running the world, while the other is unorganized and is doing nothing. The great characters of the world hav been men. Women hav made very little mark in the world's history. Men are like the land, and individuals are the mountains and rocks that endure, while women are the ocean, one being merged and lost in the others like the waves of the sea. Men hav managed everything, women stay at home. Mrs. Pearce believed that women, being the buyers of groceries for the family, should take it in hand to organize coöperativ stores and abolish the middlemen. The speaker gave a history of Robert Owen's attempt to institute union stores in England. The reason those stores failed was because the men in charge of them were too smart and kept all the profits, or were incapable and lost all that was invested. Retail distribution should be a part of housework. The great leak in the household is the grocery store, and when women combine and buy goods together this leak will be stopped. At present housekeeping is so expensiv that the young man can't afford to marry and support a wife, and the girls are driven into industrial pursuits as his competitors. Mrs. Pearce's system had been tried in Cambridge, and failed. The ladies interested in the enterprise just gave it a little money to start with, but seemed to forget that their patronage was necessary to keep it going. Each kept trading with her old grocer so as not to hurt his feeling by dropping him. Besides, the husbands of the lady coöperators laughed at them, and regarded the affair as a great joke, which killed the enterprise quite dead. In spite of that failure the speaker still believed in coöperativ housekeeping as the one step that will save society. Other methods hav their good features and are well meant, but they are defectiv, lacking this great principle.

Mrs. Pearce spoke for less than an hour, but owing to her facility of speech she said as much as a man would be expected to in half a day.

Mr. Sutherland expressed himself as much pleased with the lecture, but did not agree with it. If cooperativ stores are established, other stores must close, thus throwing many persons out of employment, and there are enough idle people at present without increasing the number.

Mr. Leavitt told the audience that this was an old story with him. He published the first article in America about the Rochdale stores in England and the Familistiere at Guise, in France, and had been a Fourierite for forty years or more. In his opinion, Mrs. Pearce's scheme would not amount to much.

Mrs. Hallock said she was afraid Mrs. Pearce would never come to the club again if she was to be criticised so sharply. Men should remember that women are individuals, and could liv more than one day if the men were all dead. Men discuss the rights of women as though they were the women's keepers. What hav men got to do with the question, anyway? If men say women should not vote, women may say men should not vote, and one statement has as much weight as the other. Mrs. Hallock gave Mr. Leavitt several sharp digs.

Lawyer Searing very gallantly declined to regard women in the purely material light in which she had been discussed by the others. Woman was greatest in the domain of the heart. In concluding, Mr. Searing beamed sweetly upon the little Boston lady, and said he hoped she would come to the club again. It is but kind to hope that Mr. Searing's winning smile was not shed in vain.

Dr. Weeks, as a solution of the labor problem, proposed to shorten the hours of labor until everybody worked the same length of time. In the struggle for female rights, women are women's worst enemies. They must learn to stand by each other. There are twenty men who will defend women's rights where there is one woman brave enough to do so.

Herr Oppenheimer didn't think the scheme was feasible. You can't save much out of the wages of a man who isn't working, no matter how much he cooperates.

Mrs. Pearce reminded her critics that the subject of the evening was coöperativ housekeeping, which they had scarcely touched. She could not discuss coöperation in general, as she did not propose to reform the universe. She desired that women should be given a chance to show what they could do.

At the next meeting the subject of temperance is on the program, and prohibition, high license, low license, and free rum will be discussed by able students of these various aspects of the question. So doth the noble work go on of throwing light on error's ways, for which the speakers, every one, deserve mankind's unmingled praise. And though the torch of Liberty be from the hand that holds it hurled, a noble symbol still we see—a Club Enlightening the World.

Following this report will be found an absurd article by Seward Mitchell. Mr. Mitchell is evidently one of those important persons in the world's economy who keep one foot held back stiff ready for a kick. The lecture on a flower gave him a chance to unlimber. Everybody who has read THE TRUTH SEEKER knows that about nine out of ten of the lectures at the Liberal Club are devoted to industrial and social questions. Mr. Mitchell's growling has, therefore, the appearance of pure maliciousness. He probably speaks without thinking; some people hav to do that way or keep still, which may be his case. The kicker hath "all seasons for his own."

Gentle Criticism of the Liberal Club.

Tithing, mint, anise, and cummin, and omitting the weightier matters of the law—the labor question! A hundred thousand men and women in the city of New York struggling for an existence, and the Liberal Club discussing the nonsense of a "flower."

The wealth producers of the world in the throes of death, and an intelligent body of men and women fiddling on a subject that has not merit enough in it to go across the street to hear! Probably not a person in the audience who owned the house he livs in, yet discussing matters of not the slightest importance to the producers! A million-dollar yacht in your harbor, every dollar of the cost of it was stolen, yet no one in all that big city has manliness enough to go and sink her and hang the thief who controls it! Better a damned sight—more to the credit of the Manhattan Liberal Club—to adjourn to the wharf of that pirate and scuttle her than to talk about the nonsense they talked about. It needs patience to deal with children!

When the club was discussing their nonsense, didn't they know that a girl less than seventeen years old was kidnapped and in prison for the crime?

It would be far more to their credit to discuss the right of organized pirates, called a government, than thus spend their time in talking on subjects not worth a hill of corn to any one. Fifty thousand men in New York on a strike, and the Infidels dumb!

And now that the Senate of the United States has passed a vote to steal $21,000,000 of the people's money for the useless purpose of war, it remains to be seen if the club has principle enough to pass a resolution denouncing the outrage.

As it is but a few hours' ride from New York to Washington, the better way would be to raise an army in New York, proceed to Washington, and drive out that "den of thieves," the United States Senate. I shall look with deep interest to see if THE TRUTH SEEKER givs a report of the Cincinnati Conference on the 22d of this month.

SEWARD MITCHELL.

Moses and George Harman Arrested.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: M. Harman and son, George, editors and publishers of Lucifer, were arrested last night and taken to Topeka by the U. S. marshal, on a charge of having used the U. S. mails for the circulation of obscene literature, printed some time last June in Lucifer. The article fixed upon in complaint was headed, "An Awful Letter." It appears that the charge is based wholly on the use of one word, viz., the name of the male organ of generation.

Moses was daily expecting to hear from the supreme court in the case of Walker and Lillian, who hav been in jail during the last five months, but no news comes in regard to them.

But now comes a dispatch from Topeka, asking me to sign an appearance bond of $500 for Moses and George. So I suppose they hav had their preliminary examination, and been bound over for appearance before the U. S. court, time not known.

I hav sent dispatch required, and hav friends there who will accept my promis. So they will be here to work, we hope, this evening. N. H. HARMAN.

Mr. Reynolds in Pennsylvania.

At Pittsburgh, Pa., I found Prof. Wm. Seymour, of Philadelphia, holding the fort and gaining golden opinions (and lots of silver dollars for charts) from all sorts of people by lecturing, under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Liberal Society, on Phrenology and Mesmerism. I was made happy by meeting Roman Staley, president of the Pittsburgh Liberal Society. When in the ministry I always found that the members partook of the spirit of the elder and leader, and the Pittsburgh Liberals seem to faithfully emulate Roman Staley, and so are zealous, stanch, and true.

A lecture was arranged for me at Wilson's Hall, Allegheny City, on Sunday evening, the 13th inst.; subject: "Life's Duties." Quite a goodly number attended, a good delegation coming from Pittsburgh. I sold quite a large number of pamphlets.

We had a most delightful visit with Dr. E. A. Wood, president of the Medical Society of Pennsylvania, who has done such efficient work in winning the most intelligent residents of the south side to Liberalism. His pamphlet on "Heredity and Education" is a masterly production. I would the New York Freethinkers' Association was financially able to purchase 50,000 copies for gratuitous distribution; for until "Heredity and Education, and their relation to each other and to the human race," are more fully understood, the great conflict between capital and labor, and the increase of crime, poverty, and misery, can never be stayed.

On Sunday evening, the 30th, I delivered my lecture, "The Bible—Whence It Came and What It Really Teaches," at the Opera House, Bradford, Pa., to a large and appreciativ audience, the leading paper giving me a flattering notice and a column and a half synopsis of the lecture. As the sure criterion of the influence of the lecture, I sold fifteen dollars' worth of pamphlets, quite a number of TRUTH SEEKERS, and obtained some new subscribers, and the promis of many more. O. H. Wheeler, J. Curtis, and Mr. Birney make a trinity of Freethought that to commune with fills the heart with joy, hope, and courage. Long may they liv to lead the Liberal host in oildom!

I am now at Kent, Ohio, advertised for a course of four lectures, the 26th, 27th, and 28th. From here I go to Akron, Ohio, March 2d; Cleveland, Ohio, March 6th; Painsville, March 7th and 8th; Bowling Green, 9th and 10th. Will friends in vicinity of Kalamazoo and Chicago please write me?

The delay in organizing and incorporating the Liberal Mutual Aid is not because of lack of interest on the part of Liberals, or because of any doubt of its proving a great success, but some modifications of the original plan hav been suggested, and it is deemed advisable that every detail receive the most careful consideration, and that every possible precaution be taken to insure its embracing all the best features, while avoiding the mistakes of similar organizations, and to secure the greatest possible advantages at the lowest possible cost to the members.

It is proposed to obtain five hundred bona fide applications for membership before applying for incorporation. We shall doubtless hav more than this before the 1st of May. Please address applications to me care of Charles Eckhard, 28 Lafayette Place, New York.

A Short Visit to Mrs. D. M. Bennett.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am quite sure that many of your readers will enjoy a description of a short visit which I made while in New York, in the early winter, to Mrs. Bennett, as I know how interested they were in her as a woman, and how much they admired and loved her for the loving tenderness and constant wifely attentions to the now departed hero.

I found Mrs. Bennett in the same room where Mr. Bennett died, living in the same way as she lived with him, taking her meals out at the same place as when the husband lived. Mrs. Bennett seemed very well, and looked even more beautiful than when I saw her last. She had what is called, or what is known as, a "spiritual expression," and when she told me of the feeling (though she does not claim to be a Spiritualist) that possessed her that he, Mr. Bennett, was with her, and so she cared little about going out or mingling much with people, she charmed me with her fidelity to the one love of her heart—"He was the love of my girlhood, the dear husband of my matured womanhood, and that he was murdered, just as we were nearing age, 'tis so hard to think of; and that professed Liberals helped to make his death martyrdom is the worst of all to bear."

Mrs. Bennett is comfortable as to the means of life, and in her room, exquisitly neat, has many beautiful things which Mr. Bennett brought her from India and other places in his travels. I am often asked of Mrs. Bennett, and she will pardon me that I hav written this, as it is for the eyes of dear friends.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. F. JAMIESON will deliver second courses of lectures on his return trip to Colorado, in the following-named places in Nebraska: Waverly, Feb. 25th, 26th, 29th; Osceola, March 1st, 2d, 3d; Stromsburg, 4th, 5th, 6th. Also in Central City, Newark, Minden, and first lecture in Lowell; probably in Burnett and Milford. Address at Central City, Neb.

MRS. H. S. LAKE speaks for the Spiritual Society of Portland, Me., Feb. 27th; at the First Spiritual Temple, Boston, March 6th, 13th, and 20th; at Bridgeport, Conn., March 27th, April 3d, 10th, and 17th; at the Cassadaga Spiritual Camp-meeting, Aug. 17th, 19th, 21st, and 23d. Societies desiring her services will address her: 123 West Concord st., Boston, Mass.

J. E. REMSBURG is lecturing to crowded houses in Illinois. Gen. Richard Rowett, the hero of Allatoona, and one of the most popular orators of Illinois, presided at his meetings in Carlinville, and declared them to be among the happiest occasions of his life. "The lecturer," he said, "presented more facts in ten minutes than the average clergyman did in ten years."

IN Portland, Oregon, the latest organization of Infidelity is the "Social Order of United Liberals." This order, says a local journal, has taken up the unoccupied ground in society never before preëmpted. Its missions are the promotion of society in every respect and the advancement of education and civilization, the enforcement of the law, the maintenance of purity, virtue, and respectability in general. The society is one that should be received and encouraged by the people of Portland.

T. B. WAKEMAN is delivering a course of religio-philosophical lectures before the Philosophical Association of Brooklyn, which meets Sunday afternoons at Phenix Hall, South Eighth street, near Bedford avenue, Williamsburgh. Last Sunday his discourse was upon the scientific conception of God; March 13th, 27th, and April 10th, he will speak, in the order given, of the scientific conception of Christ, the Holy Virgin, and the Holy Ghost. April 24th, at the same place, he will debate with Rev. S. Miller Hageman upon "Which is Best for the World, Christianity or Science?"

A True Estimate of Anthony Comstock.

From the New York Sun.

Anthony Comstock is at work to procure legislation to stop the advertising of medicins. Governor Hill has already vetoed one of his measures.

Comstock is a nuisance, and if a bill were passed to stop him, it would not be a bad thing.

He Descended into Hell.

"Who but an Infidel," says St. Augustine, "will deny that Christ was in hell?"

And the annotator of the English translation of the Latin Vulgate adds:

Calvin, then, you see, with all his followers, are [sic] Infidels, who, instead of this descending of Christ in soul after his death, hav invented another desperate kind of Christ's being in hell, when he was yet alive on the cross (Note on 1 Peter iii, 19).

St. Augustine is not quite sure what apartment in hell those prisoners occupied to whom Christ preached, but Catholic authorities all now agree that it was purgatory.

"He preached to the spirits in prison (en phulake)," says the Greek text. But Dr. Murdock translates the Syriac text thus: "He preached to those souls detained in hades." And in the margin he givs as the equivalent of hades the Syriac word sheol. Indeed, sheol is generally the same as hades. It occurs in Matt. xi, 23; xvi, 18; Luke x, 15; xvi, 24; Acts ii, 27, 31; Rev. i, 18; vi, 8; xx, 13, 14. In Acts ii, 24, the Greek version has thanatos "death," for sheol.

In Revelation we read that death and sheol (hades) delivered up the dead that were in them, and that death and sheol (hades) were cast into the lake of fire. And in Luke we are told that the rich man lifted up his eyes in sheol (hades) being tormented in the flame.

Some Christians are striving to amend the Apostle's creed by substituting for, "He descended into hell," "he ascended to paradise." But others are taking a more heretical view of the case. Thus the Rev. Dr. Domer, a Lutheran, of Washington, D. C., has boldly come out with a rational interpretation of the text, "He went and preached to the spirits in prison." Dr. Domer not only accepts the Catholic doctrin of purgatory, but maintains that all souls will, after having expiated their sins in hell, become repentant and ascend to heaven.

The descent of Christ into hell is fully narrated in Part II. of the "Acts of Pilate," in substance as follows: Joseph of Arimathea, to show that Jesus had raised others from the dead, invited some of the chief priests to go and see for themselvs. They went to Arimathea (supposed to mean Ramah, the reputed birth-place of Samuel, about four miles northwest of Jerusalem), and not only saw the empty tombs of old Simeon and his two sons, but found the risen men and brought them back to Jerusalem, where, at the request of the priests, the three men wrote an account of their experience in hades, in substance as follows:

At midnight a light equal to the sun shone into those dark regions. The patriarchs and prophets were filled with joy, saying that this light was from the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. John the Baptist narrated what he knew about Jesus. Seth, at the request of his father Adam, told a story of what occurred at the death of his father, thus: Adam wanted to escape death; so he sent Seth to the gate of paradise to entreat God to send an angel to point out a certain tree which yielded oil wherewith the son might anoint his father and save his life. An angel came and told Seth the tree was no longer to be found, but after 5,500 years from the creation the son of God would come into the world, when he would anoint Adam and others with this same oil and raise them up from the dead. At this good news the patriarchs and prophets rejoiced.

Then came Satan and talked with Hades. Satan wanted to secure Jesus, who, by the coöperation of himself and the Jews, had been crucified. Jesus had called himself the son of God, had healed many, had restored the dead to life, and done many other evils to Satan and his servants. Hades suggested that if Jesus was so powerful it might be hazardous to hav anything to do with him. Satan said he wasn't afraid, and Hades ought not to be afraid either, of their common enemy. But Hades could not be persuaded to take a hand in the undertaking, giving as a reason some late experience he had had with Lazarus, who, after coming down there, had been taken back by force, flying away like an eagle. "So don't bring Jesus here," said Hades, "lest he raise all the dead, and not one will be left to me." In other words, Hades was afraid Jesus would raise hell.

While thus wrangling, a voice like thunder announced the coming of the king of glory. Hades directed his demons to secure strongly the gates of brass and bars of iron, and stand guard while Satan went forth to repel the coming king. The patriarchs clamored for him to be let in, and there came a voice saying, "Lift up, ye gates." "Who is this king of glory?" inquired Hades. "The Lord, strong and mighty," cried the angels; "the Lord, mighty in battle." At these words the gates were shattered, the bars were broken, and in came the king of glory in the form of a man, lighting up the dark places, and liberating all the dead.

Hades gave up all for lost. The king seized and bound Satan hand and foot, and delivered him over to Hades to keep till the second appearing. Hades received the prisoner as Beelzebub, the arch-devil, the root of all evil, who had caused the king of glory to be crucified, with the further sinister purpose of depriving Hades of his power.

The savior then brought Adam and the rest of the old saints out of Hades, blessing them, and making the sign of the cross on their foreheads. Taking Adam by the hand, he led him and all the rest into Paradise. At the heavenly door they met two old men, Enoch and Elias, who were to liv till the end of the world, and then be slain by Antichrist. Then came along a lowly man, bearing a cross. The holy fathers inquired, "Who art thou?" He answered that he was a thief who had been crucified along with Jesus. He said he had just met the archangel Michael, who told him to stand aside till the forefathers of the race came in. Then the saints welcomed the repentant robber, and all went into Paradise together.

Confiscating Mormon Property.

The following is a synopsis of the anti-Mormon bill, as it is known, which has passed both houses of Congress, and is now before the president for his signature:

The first six sections of the bill apply to prosecutions for bigamy, adultery, etc., and make the wife or husband a competent witness, but not to be compelled to testify.

The seventh and eighth sections apply to the powers of court commisioners, and of the marshall and deputy marshalls. The ninth and tenth sections apply to the marriage ceremony. They require a certificate, properly authenticated, to be recorded in the office of the probate court. The eleventh section disapproves and annuls all territorial laws recognizing the capacity of illegitimate children to inherit or be entitled to any distributiv share in the estate of the father. The twelfth section disapproves and annuls territorial laws conferring jurisdiction upon probate courts, with certain exceptions.

The thirteenth section makes it the duty of the attorney general of the United States to institute proceedings to escheat to the United States the property of corporations obtained or held in violation of section three of the act of July, 1862, the proceeds of such escheat to be applied to the use and benefit of common schools in the territory.

The fourteenth section regulates proceedings in such cases. The fifteenth section disapproves and annuls all laws of the legislativ assembly creating or continuing the Perpetual Emigrating Fund Company, and dissolves that corporation. The sixteenth section directs proceedings for the disposition of the property, and assets of the Emigrating Fund Company.

All such property, in excess of debts and lawful claims, is to escheat to the United States for the benefit of common schools in the territory. The seventeenth section disapproves and annuls the acts of the legislativ assembly incorporating or providing for the church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints and dissolves that corporation. It makes it the duty of the attorney-general of the United States to institute legal proceedings to wind up the affairs of the corporation. The eighteenth section makes provision as to the endowment of widows, who are to hav one-third of the income of the estate as their dower.

Section nineteen givs to the president the appointment of a probate judge in each county.

Section twenty makes it unlawful for any woman to vote in any election, and annuls acts of the legislativ assembly which permit female suffrage.

The four next sections make provisions as to elections, and require of voters an oath or affirmation to support the Constitution, and obey the laws, especially the anti-polygamy act of March 22, 1882, and this act.

Section twenty-five abolishes the office of territorial superintendent of district schools, and makes it the duty of the Supreme Court of the territory to appoint a commissioner of schools. Section twenty-six givs to all religious societies, sects, and congregations the right to hold, through trustees appointed by a probate court, real property for houses of worship and parsonages.

The twenty-seventh and last section annuls all territorial laws for the organization of the militia, or for the creation of the Nauvoo Legion, and givs the legislativ assembly of Utah power to pass laws for organizing the militia, subject to the approval of Congress. General officers of the militia are to be appointed by the governor of the territory with the advice and consent of the council.

In the Senate, when debate was had upon the bill, Senator Vest said that as a matter of course the bill would become a law, but he could not vote for it. He was very well aware what the public sentiment of the country was, but no amount of criticism would affect the performance of his duties as a legislator. He could not vote for it, because, in his judgment, it violated the principle of the Constitution as to rights of property. The provision as to the Perpetual Emigrating Fund Company was naked, simple, bold confiscation, and nothing else. It took money subscribed by individuals and applied it to an object (public schools) not contemplated by the corporation. The same thing might be done in regard to any other religious corporation in the country. It was no answer to say that it applied only to the Mormon church. He recollected a time when in this country a storm of popular madness threatened to destroy the Roman Catholic church with all its rights of property; and when it was preached from the pulpit and hustings that that church was opposed to a republican form of government; that it taught treason, and that it should be abolished; and when it was openly proclaimed that the property of that church should be confiscated to the treasury of the United States.

Senator Call opposed the bill. He characterized it as a disgrace to the statute book, and as a second step toward the establishment of religious persecution and intolerance. As to the provision depriving illegitimate children of a share in the property of their fathers he declared that the Spanish Inquisition has never done anything more cruel or inhuman.

Senator Butler said he should be very glad to vote for any measure that would result in exterminating the evil and crime of polygamy, but in doing so he could not violate what he believed to be the best principles of the Constitution. He thought that the bill did violate those principles. The provisions pointed out by the Senators from Missouri and Florida (Vest and Call) were so clearly in violation of the principles of the Constitution, of the rights of religious opinion, and of the rights of property, that he could not sustain it.

The bill passed by a vote of thirty-seven to thirteen.

Mormonism Itself.

The origin of the Sabbath, or the setting apart, as a day of rest, every seventh day—that is, the 7th, 14th, 21st, and 28th, is unknown. But it was a day sacred to rest at a period long anterior to the time assigned to Moses, among the Assyrians, who were planet-worshipers, and was so rigidly observed that even the king could not ride in his chariot on that day. After the conquest of Babylon by Persia, and the substitution of the monotheism of Persia for the worship of the heavenly bodies, the priests, Ezra and Nehemiah, who conducted the emigration from Babylon to Palestine under military protection from the Persian government, established monotheism and the observance of the Sabbath among the nativs, but not without great difficulty, in consequence of their opposition, for the emigrants intermarried with them, adopting to such an extent the ancient faith that Ezra, in his rage, tore his own hair out, while Nehemiah, equally enraged but more sensible, tore out the hair of the backsliders. There is a reference to these matters in Ezekiel viii, 14–16, where the prophet tells us that, in the Lord's house, "there sat women weeping for Tammuze," that is, for the departure of the sun in the fall of the year. And he saw a greater abomination, for, "at the door of the temple of the Lord, between the porch and the altar, were about five and twenty men with their backs toward the temple of the Lord, and their faces toward the east, and they worshiped the sun toward the east."

Here this people became known as Hebrews, or people from beyond the Euphrates. I do not know that there is any evidence that polygamy existed among them. But little is known of them till two centuries or three before our era, when there were some one or two hundred thousand of them in Alexandria, showing that there must hav been a stream of emigration for a long period from the neighborhood of the Tigris and Euphrates, as there had been, at an earlier time, of the dark, not the negro, race, remains of which exist to this day in southwestern Europe.

At the request of Ptolemy Philadelphus, a collection of their literature was made some three centuries before our era, of which everything relating to them, from Abraham, including Moses, to Solomon, is fabulous, no such persons having lived. The names of a few sheiks recorded upon Assyrian monuments, who were taken by the kings of Assyria in their raids into the region of Palestine for slaves, enabled the priestly authors to giv a semblance of history to a period of a few centuries before the emigration to Palestine. All the fabulous stories concerning those imaginary polygamists from Abraham to David and Solomon are accepted as historical by Mormons and Christians, and the barbarous deity they are represented as worshiping is adopted as God by both of them. But the Mormons are consistent; they worship the God and accept his institution, polygamy. The Christians are inconsistent; they worship the God and insult him by rejecting the institution, and making its observance a crime. And what is strange, in defiance of his command that they shall worship no other God, they accept and worship, as God, a purely imaginary man, who never married. And what is still more strange, capping the climax of inconsistency and absurdity, they adopt the religion of a man, Paul, who not only did not marry, or recommend marriage, but put himself squarely on the record against it.

Now, our government, which Christians say is a Christian government, and should recognize this polygamous God in its Constitution, proposes to confiscate the property of the Mormon church for its faithful adherence to its institution. This it has no constitutional right to do. But let us giv this subject a little thought. Why should any church be established, or if established, allowed to exist a moment? Solely for the benefit of the people. Why has government protected the church, and why has church property not been taxed? Because the people supposed that what was claimed for churches was true, viz., that they would benefit the people. For this is, in theory at least, a government of the people, by the people, for the people, and not for the glory of any God, or vicar of God; or for the creation of a priestly class that livs in comparativ idleness and luxury, by selling to ignorance the old Asiatic lies and superstitions on which the church was founded that shrouded Europe in the night of the Dark Ages, murdering the thinker and his thoughts, and now, when it cannot murder the man, murders every thought that would elevate the race, as do all the sects that are based on the same absurdities and infamies. The question is whether the condition of the people is improved by any church, and that is a question of fact to be learned by observation. And if any church is not a benefit, its property should be confiscated for the use and improvement of the people for whom it was given, and who hav, besides, an equitable claim upon it, in consideration of the taxes which, through false representations, they hav remitted for its support.

Thus this question of Mormonism, or polygamy, should be decided on its own merits, after comparing the Mormons with other religionists, whose creeds and conduct are based upon the Bible, here and now, and not with what may be supposed to hav happened in Asia thousands of years ago. And it is well to remember when we are told that there are many unhappy and degraded women in Utah, that they hav been recruited largely from Europe, and what are the natural fruit of sixteen centuries of Christian supremacy and Christian moral and religious teachings, and that the Mormon women enter into the marriage relation as voluntarily as do women where polygamy is unknown, and if maltreated, a Mormon woman should hav the same redress as though she were the sole wife.

Of course the suffering of a first wife may be intense when a second is taken. But when a third is taken, she must enjoy the punishment of her rival. All this she must hav considered before entering into the relation. And she understands the nature of the attraction of her rival, and that her triumph must be temporary. But she is not turned out of doors. She has her house and her children, and is provided for. She is not driven into the streets, like a discarded mistress, to lead a degraded life which she can escape only by suicide.

From all that I can learn of the condition of Mormon women—and I hav read the report of many of Miss Kate Field's lectures—I am surprised that women in Eastern cities hav any tears left to shed over their condition, when they cannot walk a block without seeing evidence of the greater degradation and suffering of women in their own neighborhoods; nor take up a paper that does not contain heart-rending accounts of the pitiful condition of women who work sixteen hours a day, earning only fifty cents, in tenements unfit for a human being, with rent to pay and sometimes children to support, exposed to summer's heat and winter's cold, and able to buy only the poorest food, for which they pay the highest prices. Read this suggestiv item from a Brooklyn paper. An unknown girl committed suicide. A newspaper notice brought a hundred women to see if it was the missing daughter of either of them.

But I do not consider Kate Field an unbiased witness. And her example tells as strongly against monogamy as do her words against polygamy. Were she married, her married friends would confide to her griefs as heartrending as anything she heard in Utah. Her grandmother I knew well, and hav passed many pleasant evenings at her house. She had been an actress, and must hav been very attractiv when young. But she was not a convert to St. Paul's nonsense, as I suppose Kate is—that "the unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, but she that is married careth for the things of this world"—for she was the mother of a large family. Hence Miss Kate, who appeals in behalf of Mormon women, though herself a "lone, lorn creetur," finds attentiv hearers. And here I submit that if Paul's mother could hav known how he would turn out, she would not hav raised him. But I shed no tears over the present aspect of the Mormon question. It is the entering wedge of the great question of the confiscation of all church property, which must some day come before the country; and I rejoice at hearing the ringing blows of the party leaders driving it home. For the largest church in the Union exists, not for the benefit of the people, but for exalting a foreign potentate, who claims their spiritual and temporal allegiance, and in his last encyclical requires their obedience to the priests, who are his servants. And the title of the large block of real estate which the city governments, exceeding their power, hav given to this church is not in the people from whom it was stolen, but in the bishops whom he appoints, and the money yearly given under various pretenses is not to educate their people in republicanism, who hav no conception of what it means, but to increase the number of his subjects. When the press, conscious of its power and its consequent responsibility, shall devote itself to enlightening the people as to their rights and duties—for the press is an educator, and upon it depends the future of our country—instead of wasting time, ink, and paper in advocating the claims of lawyers—who, if the best judges of the forms of legislation, are the worst possible judges of its spirit—to legislatures, governorships, and presidencies, the people will confiscate the property of all useless churches, converting their buildings into halls of science. For scientists are the reformers of our day. Then we shall liv, not under a government of the people by lawyers, for the benefit of lawyers, but under a government of the people, by the people, for the people, and may it never perish from the earth.

McArthur to the Rev. L. A. Lambert.

DEAR SIR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 5th, ult., I addressed an article to you, and up to date hav not been favored with an answer, unless I am to consider the following editorial, which appeared in the Catholic Union and Times, of Buffalo, February 10th, to be your rejoinder:

WHO IS HE?

Who is this "McArthur," anyway, who fills an entire page of the current TRUTH SEEKER, trying to bring himself forward as an Infidel champion vs. Father Lambert?

Does he come forth as an accredited representativ of Infidelity? Are the unbelieving scoffers willing to confide their cause to him, and to accept the result of a public discussion with this gentleman, so that in his defeat they will acknowledge theirs? Or is he, rather, some obscure little blasphemer whose vanity thus seeks notoriety, and whose defeat would be altogether ignored by the rest of the gang? It appears that during the past two years McArthur has been continually annoyed by hearing of the "Notes." At last, he tells us, "I bought the book, determined that when it had carried conviction to my heart," etc.

Thou little Infidel blockhead! Conviction is not carried to the heart. It belongs to the head. The intellect is convinced; the heart is persuaded. Conviction is produced by reasoning; persuasion by appeals to the passions.

If this be a specimen of McArthur's precision of expression, we warn him, in all charity, to hav nothing whatever to do with Father Lambert.

Am I to consider this your answer, or is it only another effusion from the Rev. Patrick Cronin? Hav you placed your case in his hands? Surely the author of "Thesaurus Biblicus," "a mountain of scholarly research and patient toil," might hav secured a more able defender.

I am asked if I come forward "as an accredited representativ of Infidelity," etc. There was no demand of this kind in your challenge. You state that you hold yourself responsible to any Infidel who may come forward. So Pat Cronin has been as injudicious in this editorial as he was in his preface to your "Notes," where, by placing you on a pedestal, he made you a butt.

What is a representativ Infidel? Does Pat know what Infidelity means? Does he know it is simply a geographical question, and if it were possible to take a correct census of the real opinions of the inhabitants of this country, it is very possible that Catholicism might be called Infidelity? Suppose every Infidel in the world agreed on any given person as their champion, what would it amount to? Who would be able to come forward to meet him as a representativ Catholic? Surely neither yourself nor Pat, for this is the particular domain of Mr. Pecci, residing in Rome, Italy, and he is very jealous of his assumed rights. His co-religionists do not represent either themselvs or even a single idea without Mr. Pecci's permission.

One Dr. McGlynn, of New York—possibly Pat may hav heard of him—gave his private opinion, the other day, on a land question, and Mr. Pecci quietly squelched him. So if Pat had good sense he would not hav asked that question.

Pat says: "Conviction is not carried to the heart. It belongs to the head." Physiologically speaking he is correct, but from a Catholic standpoint he is wrong. Pat should brush up his theology and study the fundamentals of your latest form of worship, the Sacred Heart, which was revealed by Jesus Christ to Saint Marguerite Marie A-la-Coque. Don't look in your French dictionary for the meaning of the term. At what theological seminary did Pat study that he should display such ignorance? He ought to know that this whole country has been dedicated to the Sacred Heart, and I therefore used it in a purely Catholic sense.

"But," says he, "the intellect is convinced." Show me a Catholic who has been convinced in this manner! Do Catholics think? I opine not. If Father Pat were able to write an original article, and were to astonish his readers by printing it, Mr. Pecci would interfere at once, and Pat would be bounced.

Catholicism is founded on faith, and that alone, and Butler's Catechism defines it as "a divine virtue by which we firmly believe what God has taught."

"How do you know with certainty what God has taught?"

"By the authority of his church, which is the pillar and ground of truth."

It is related of St. Denis, of France, that he suffered martyrdom by decapitation and as his head rolled off, the body followed it, and, stooping, the hands gathered it to the breast, and the legs quietly walked off a distance of two miles. For this he was canonized, and a would-be convert, studying this peculiar and unusual phenomenon, was urged by the reverend exhorter to say if she believed it. "Father," she answered, "I pray God night and morning to grant me grace to believe that the legs took the first step."

So the original question resolves itself back to convincing Mr. Pecci, and then Pat will immediately fall into line and claim he was convinced through his "intellect."

I thank him kindly for his charitable warning. History is full of examples of Catholic charity toward Infidels, and I always question the inner motivs of a priest when he bases his advice on that virtue. Timeo Danaos et dona ferentis. No pun intended.

So much for Father Pat. Requiescat in pace.

Now, my dear Father Lambert, as you are the objectiv point, let us to business. Your challenge was open to all, and was accepted by me. It is true I threw ridicule on your "Notes," for I did not then and do not now understand them.

When you stated that the Mississippi carried its waters up "a perpendicular distance of five miles," I merely objected to the phraseology, not the alleged fact; for that loose way of putting it might be productiv of mischief, as I could see Pat Cronin, after the term "perpendicular" had been explained, writing an editorial and claiming that the Mississippi was nothing more nor less than an inverted Niagara Falls on a grander scale, and giving you as his authority.

My objection to your quoting Orestes A. Brownson's opinion was, that if it should be handed down to posterity, the reincarnationist of the future would quote it as incontestable evidence that Tertullian had revisited this earth.

And thus I might go on through the entire "Notes." So, if you occupy an unenviable position, you can only thank Pat, for you allowed an irresponsible party to write a glowing eulogy, and being fully persuaded by him that your "Notes" would never fall into the hands of any one who would take the trouble to seriously consider them, you added a challenge which, if the publishers' statement be correct, has been repeated 125,000 times.

I accepted the challenge, and you shield yourself behind your friend, and answer in an editorial filled with low, coarse, vulgar terms.

So, as there is a disinclination to meet me, as per your own proposition, I will make you another offer.

Mr. J. E. Remsburg, an Infidel lecturer, will meet you in Buffalo, and argue in public the merits of your system. An expert and reliable stenographer will be selected by disinterested parties to report the arguments verbatim et literatim, and the Truth Seeker Company will publish them in pamphlet. In order that there may be no question as to my sincerity, immediately on your acceptance, I will place in the hands of the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER a sum of money sufficient to cover all contingent expenses, such as hiring the hall and stenographer, paying advertising, etc., etc., and will make any other equitable arrangements you may suggest, and if you will agree to meet Mr. Remsburg for five evenings, I will forward to the committee of arrangements a certified check for one hundred dollars, to be paid you at the completion of the contract.

I hav been impelled to this because I hav been assured by some of your personal friends that on several occasions you hav expressed yourself as more than anxious to meet an Infidel. I hav before me a letter from one of them, with same initials as your own, in which Infidelity is sneered at, and Infidels described as fleeing before "an obscure country pastor."

I hav tried in vain to satisfy the writers that you will not argue these questions, for I know from experience that gentlemen of your cloth never come to the front unless their adversary be handicapped.

So it will be my business to see that these admirers of yours receive a copy of this letter; and in event of no answer, it will remain for you to giv them good and sufficient reasons for your backdown.

I tell you plainly, you must either meet Mr. Remsburg, or withdraw the challenge from the "Notes;" else you will be stripped of the lion's skin in which you hav been masquerading for the past two years.

Awaiting an answer at your earliest convenience, I am,

Yours truly,

MCARTHUR.

Evolution's Perfect Work.

Irreligion is the goal toward which we are all hastening. And, after all, why should not humanity be able to do without dogmas? Speculation would replace religion. With the more advanced among the peoples dogmas are now displaced by the working of the intelligence, which breaks and disperses these incrustations of the mind. In France we are already irreligious for the most part; the workingman believes little more than the savant; he has his little stock of ideas of his own, more or less profound and ingenuous, upon which he livs, without feeling the want of the priest's assistance. In Germany the work of the decomposition of dogmas is also much advanced. In England it is beginning; but it proceeds quickly. Christianity seems to be everywhere making way naturally for Freethought. Buddhism and Hindooism likewise. In India a large proportion of the intelligent are Freethinkers; in China there is no state religion. Yes, it will be long; but religion is doomed. For Europe one can even now imagin the time when it will hav disappeared. . . . There is certainly one black point, which is Islam. Oh, those Turks! what narrow minds! Rebellious to open argument, enemies of all that is not the perfect equilibrium of the literal faith! How can such people be made to understand reason? . . . After all, if they will not follow us, one can do without them. Yes, I believe one will be obliged to do without them.—M. Ernest Renan.

REMOVAL.

THE TRUTH SEEKER Bookstore is now at 28 Lafayette Place, three doors below the Astor Library. Lafayette Place runs parallel with, and one block east of Broadway, between the latter street and the Bowery. Lafayette Place begins at Great Jones street, and continues northward to Astor Place. For a week or ten days longer the Editor will be found at 33 Clinton Place.

Our new quarters are most commodious, consisting of a large store and basement, and a new building in the rear for a printing-office and editorial rooms. The old place has long since been too small for the transaction of our rapidly growing book trade, and though moving is a task of difficulty, we were forced to find more room. The Truth Seeker Company has secured a long lease of the premises in Lafayette Place, where we hope to meet all our old friends and many new ones.

The neighborhood is very religious and literary, but we hope to survive the former fault and add to the latter good quality. At the corner of Great Jones street is St. Joseph's Union and the Mission of the Immaculate Virgin. A little nearer us are the Christian Union and the Church Press. North of us is the Churchman, while just opposit our place the Episcopalians are fitting up a house for clergymen who hav become disabled through undue attendance to their ministerial duties. The street is full of religion, but with the aid of the Astor Library and Watson Heston's pictures we hope to be able to reform it.

Come and see us.

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL.

This elegant yearly publication is now being scattered over the country by the hundred. It would hav been scattered before, in response to the very generous orders received, could we hav prevailed upon the mechanics employed in its preparation to make a little haste.

However, the ALMANAC is well worth waiting for. Aside from the regular resumés of the Freethought year, we hav had compiled for this issue of the ANNUAL a complete collection of the Sunday, Oath, and Blasphemy Laws of all the states and territories of the United States. This is a most important work, and has been performed by a competent lawyer of this city. Freethinkers can by it see at once under what disabilities they rest, and we predict that they will be astounded at the mass of religious legislation upon the statute books of the various states. Some curious and infamous laws hav been unearthed by the researches of our lawyer. How many know, for instance, that in Connecticut's Code of 1642 blasphemy was punishable by death, and was so punishable even after the Revolutionary war—till 1784—when the penalty was changed to whipping on the naked body, not exceeding forty stripes, and sitting in the pillory one hour? At present—since 1821—the penalty is a fine of one hundred dollars, imprisonment for not more than a year, and the heretic may also be compelled to giv bonds that he will not again so offend the kind-hearted Christians. Dakota describes blasphemy as "casting contumelious reproach or profane ridicule upon God, Jesus Christ, the Holy Ghost, the holy scriptures, or the Christian religion," and it is a misdemeanor unless it shall appear beyond question that such language is used in serious discussion. Delaware puts religion into her constitution, has strict Sunday and blasphemy laws, and ignores the federal Constitution and tramples upon right by compelling every county to pay to each Sunday-school fifty cents annually for each white scholar in the school. The negroes may pay their own Sunday-school bills. Maine has two years' imprisonment for the bold man who shall deny that God created, governs, and will finally judge the world. Anyone who profanely speaks of the trinity in Maryland may be placed in jail for six months. Massachusetts has a blasphemy law very nearly like New Jersey's, with which the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are well acquainted. Other states hav equally unjust legal discrimination against Freethinkers, and the Sunday legislation is enormous. The compilation occupies forty-five of the large ANNUAL pages, in small type.

Other contents of the ANNUAL are a story by Si Slokum entitled "The Parson," an article on the right to testify by Frederic May Holland, a poem by D. Louis Bodge, and a plentiful selection of choice pictures from D. M. Bennett's account of his trip around the world and Miss Wixon's "Story Hour."

Missionary Misrepresentation.

One of the ways by which the Christian historians, missionaries, and theologians deceive the common people is well shown by the following. It is from a daily paper, condensed from a religious organ:

"The Rev. Jonathan Crossett, who for seventeen years has been a missionary in China, says that one section of China is still untouched by the missionaries—the Mongols living to the north and west. The Mongols go down to Lassa in Tibet as to a Mecca, and (1) evidence can be found among them of the teachings of the early Christians. They are the most tenacious as to their religion of any people whom he had ever met. Their deity is called Borhan, or "light," and their belief—Lamaism—(2) is founded upon tenets held by all Christians. They observe (3) one day in every seven, and although they (4) worship idols, they hav (5) Ten Commandments similar to the Biblical commandments, and (6) their system of morals is very high."

1. Lamaism is founded upon Buddhism, and is the political expression of that religion. Lamaism is a few hundred years older than Christianity.

2. Lamaism is founded upon tenets held by Christians only so far as Christians hav borrowed from Buddhism. Buddha was born six hundred and twenty-four years before Christ was.

3. The keeping of one day in seven is not peculiarly Jewish or Christian. The practice is older than either historical Judaism or Christianity.

4. The "worship" of idols is the same in China as among Catholics—that is, the idols represent the deities as a statue of the Virgin Mary represents the supposed mother of Christ, and are "worshiped" with the same feelings.

5. The commandments of the Mongols are from Buddha, not from Moses, and are not copied. It is by no means certain that the scribes who "restored" the Pentateuch did not borrow from Buddha.

6. The idea that morals are founded upon Christianity is one of the most baseless in the world. The morals of Eastern countries (before the missionaries get there) are superior to the morals of the Western countries. No people hav been so immoral as those of Christian countries—England, France, and Italy. The gilded vices of the Roman empire were virtue itself compared with the saturnalia of Europe when the Catholic church was supreme. For beastliness nothing could excel the revels of the popes, archbishops, and priests, and kings and courtiers of the Middle Ages. When Columbus returned to Spain from the West Indies, his sailors brought a dreadful venereal disease, contracted from the nativ women of a hot climate. Previous to that it had never been known in Europe. Within a few years it was the pestilence of Europe, and afflicted almost the entire population, from king and pope to beggar and priest. If Christianity is practical morality, then there were no Christians when Christianity ruled the world, and the religion has spread very little since—among Christians. Morality is the common property of all people, and not the exclusiv possession of any sect. Morality does not proceed from religious tenets, but from the experience of the race. And the Christian system certainly did not originate it. As Professor Huxley says, "If the Stoics and the Jews revoked their bequest, the moral property of Christianity would realize very little." For the ministers of a system of religion that is borrowed in every essential dogma, from the creation to the resurrection, to express surprise at finding morality outside of their creed, is a mountainous exhibition of assurance.

But it will never do—neither do we expect it—for those whose living depends upon keeping up the huge imposture of "our particular superstition" to tell the truth about neighboring older religions. Though the grave-clothes of Eastern superstitions were the swaddling-wraps of Christianity, the people must not know it, or the collection boxes and pews of all the churches would soon be empty.

Private Societies.

The viciously irrepressible agent of the soapboiler of John street is at work in Albany upon the legislature. The bill he is endeavoring to hav passed is substantially the same as the one vetoed by Governor Hill last winter, and is leveled at those who make, sell, and advertise proprietary medicins, the publishers and sellers of such books as Dr. Foote's "Plain Home Talk," Prof. Burt Wilder's "What Young Folks Should Know," Mrs. Shepherd's "For Girls," and publishers of newspapers or magazines containing accounts of "deeds of bloodshed, or crime," or "disgusting" matter.

The bill is as vicious as the agent, and should never become a law. The books it aims to suppress are, many of them, of the highest physiological value, such as Dr. Foote's volume; and the law would be intolerable in its bearing upon newspapers. The Sun, the World, the Times, would all be at the mercy of a stupid jury—and New York juries are about the stupidest in the world, the Tribune, the most conservativ paper in the city, could never publish its London dispatches when some divorce suit is giving to New York society a full account of the marital misdeeds of that English aristocracy it so slavishly and nauseatingly imitates. Should the bill become a law, no daily newspaper in the state would be safe from prosecution—medical publishers would be at the mercy of the soapboiler's agent, and any publisher could be put in jail who printed what the agent and a jury think "disgusting."

It is time for these private societies to hav their charters taken away. They are not needed in the administration of law, and they almost invariably serve the private ends of their agents and officers. The Society for the Suppression of Vice is the worst of the lot, because its president is the most bigoted, its treasurer the stupidest, its agent the most unprincipled. But all of them—Crosby's Society for the Prevention of Crime, Gerry's Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, even Henry Bergh's Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals—are maliciously used by the agents for private ends. A good case in point is the arrest last week of the officer of the Charity Organization of the City of New York—an organization that of all others should do noble work. But on Wednesday of last week its agent—a man formerly employed by Gerry's society—was proven to hav caused the imprisonment of an honest woman, then to hav secured her discharge, which he kept in his pocket till her friends raised twenty-five dollars for himself. This, it has now been found, is not his first crime. He has long been practicing the same game. He would arrest poor persons ignorant of the law, it is said, and hav them imprisoned on some trivial complaint. Then he would negotiate with them or their friends for their release, and, as charged, in the event of satisfactory terms being made, he would prevail upon the commissioners to commute the sentence of his victims. This agent has also been arrested for stealing an overcoat, and for a long time his photograph disgraced the Rogue's Gallery at police headquarters.

The underhand, sneaking work of these societies compels the employment of men of unscrupulous character, coarse-grained, brutal, and dishonest. No gentleman would accept the position of agent of one of these societies, though the salaries are large. The work is too dirty and mean. So it happens that the men who do accept the position are the very worst possible ones to perform the delicate and discriminating task of prosecuting the right people. "Clothed with a little brief authority," they become despots over the ignorant ones with whom they come in contact, and a meritorious action by one of these agents is an exception so rare as not to affect the rule.

The rightful legal machinery of New York is extensiv enough to punish all real criminals, and care for all cases of genuin distress. These societies create crimes by special laws for the sake of punishing them. Their work is not only supererogatory but cruel, and the motivs of the societies are generally religiously puritanical fanaticism. Individual members of the societies may possibly mean well, but they are deceived by the agents whose bread and butter depend upon the existence of the society. It is safe to say that not one of the private societies of this city is necessary to morality, charity, or kindness to either animals or children. Every one of them should be killed, and the work performed by the proper officers chosen by the people.

But if there is one over another of these societies that is the incarnation of reckless tyranny, it is the soapboiler's of John street.

Clerical Paupers.

In the Interstate Commerce bill passed by the present Congress there is a prohibition of reduced fares. Railroad managers are not allowed to cut rates for drummers, theatrical troupes, nor for other classes of travelers who usually obtain favorable rates of transportation. The attorney-general has decided also that passes are prohibited. The single exception is in favor of "ministers of religion."

Of course everyone knows that Congress cannot legally giv money to ministers from the public treasury. Why should it put its pious hands into the pockets of the railroads and take out cash? Ministers everywhere obtain half-fare rates over railroads, through the "courtesy" of general ticket-agents, but why should Congress make the custom a law?

We are told that ministers of the gospel are usually underpaid, and that their small salaries in country places will not stand the drain of railroad travel. Very well; then let them stay at home, or seek some profession that pays better. But the reason is not a good one. If everyone of small means should be given half-fare rates, the cars would be crowded with semi-deadheads. And should not the honest, hardworking mechanic be treated with as much "courtesy" as the "pastoral-call" making minister? A mechanic's labors are of infinitly more value to the community than the labors of the clergy, and there is no good reason why he should not be recognized. The average wage of the clergy, taking the country by and large, is about $600 per annum, supplemented by presents of food and fuel, which help along wonderfully. The average wage of the laborer is much less, about $400 per annum, and he has to buy his food and fuel. For Congress to giv one class half-fare rates and compel the other to pay full rates is an outrage.

The custom is a survival from the time when church and state were united—when the minister was thought by the community to amount to something. That time having gone by, ancient customs should be dropped.

The Sham of "Jeffersonian Democracy."

The Young Men's Democratic Club of Brooklyn celebrated the anniversary of Washington's birth with a dinner complete in itself and happy in its effects upon the eaters. The great Democrats of the state were there, but the Mugwumps and Republicans were absent.

After the dinner came the speeches as usual. The orator of the evening was David B. Hill, governor of the state, and the next morning Democratic daily papers reported his speech in full, because it was crowded with "Jeffersonian doctrin." This Jeffersonian doctrin is the conjuring-phrase of the Democrats of this part of the country, and they twist it around to mean anything they want, from removing officials of opposit political faith to marking out a policy for the party. Jefferson, according to Mr. Hill, was the embodiment of all wisdom, all patriotism, all statesmanship; and to the sage of Monticello was given the honor of originating and organizing the Democratic party.

All this praise is deserved. Jefferson, without doubt, was the ablest of the early presidents—a man of clear sight and logical mind. It is not to criticise Governor Hill for his estimate of the character and qualifications of Jefferson that we mention this meeting, but to call to mind the truth that while Democrats so loudly praise Jefferson, and pretend to follow his lead, they really are, at least in this state, violating his most cherished principles.

Thomas Jefferson believed that church and state should be kept separate. He did not believe that religion should be supported from the public treasury. He made religion an entirely private affair. Along with his wine bill he jotted down in his accounts the money given to the gospel, and he gave this, as he bought the wine, for the use and dignity of the president. Personally he was a Materialist, and completely repudiated the doctrins of the Christian church. During the eight years he was president, not a single religious proclamation did he issue. Explaining this omission, he said: "I know it will giv great offense to the clergy, but the advocate of religious freedom is to expect neither peace nor forgivness from them." Of priests he wrote: "In every country and in every age the priest has been hostil to liberty; he is always in alliance with the despot, abetting his abuses in return for protection to his own." Jefferson's opinion of the clergy was that they are a bad and useless lot; but whether they are good or ill, he held that the state can hav no call to support them.

It is to these principles that we wish to call the attention of the Democratic panegyrists of Jefferson, and particularly the attention of the Tammany Hall party of this city, of which Governor Hill is one. That party is the loudest in sounding the praises of Jefferson, and its orators are rivals in announcing their adherence to the "good old Jeffersonian doctrins." Yet Tammany Hall would be sat down upon very hard by Thomas Jefferson, were he alive to-day. The Hall is run in the interests of Catholicism, and the Romish archbishop of the diocese has a thousand times more influence in electing Democratic city officials than hav the principles of Thomas Jefferson.

And how is it at Albany, where Governor Hill controls his party? Millions of dollars a year are given the clergy, under one pretense or another—donations to religion manufactories, called charitable institutions; exemptions from public burdens, and round fees for long-faced prayers! What would Thomas Jefferson say of the two millions annually given to the churches of New York city, and of the millions given to the other churches of the state? What would he say of the Freedom of Worship bill, which would turn state institutions into hot-beds of Roman Catholic superstition? What would he say of the bill now before the New York legislature dividing the school money of the state—raised by impartial taxation—between the public schools and the schools of the church? He would denounce them, one and all, as cunning schemes of "the hierophants of our particular superstition for molding the minds of the people as wax in the hollow of their hands."

But did we hear a word of this from the lips of Governor Hill at the dinner of the Young Men's Democratic Club? Not one. There were epithets hurled at "iron-clad, rockbibbed Republican Rhode Island," lamentations that the two Republican senators from Nevada should prevent the Democrats from having a majority in our "house of lords," plenty of spread-eagle buncombe on all subjects, but not a word upon matters in the adjustment of which true statesmanship is demanded. The truth is, there is no principle in the dominant political parties of today. Their platforms are traps to catch votes; their orators speak honeyed words to win votes; their law-making is all for votes. The legislature of this state this week hung a woman for votes. Two weeks ago Congress passed an interstate commerce bill for votes, only one of the provisions of which congressmen seem to be interested in—the provision about free passes.

We confess to a feeling of disappointment in Governor Hill's speech. He did such admirable service last winter in vetoing one of Comstock's schemes that we expected better things from him than from the average politician, who is chiefly a compound of self-assurance and ignorance. Jeffersonian Democrats of the present day use Jefferson's name as a shibboleth, without knowing much about Jefferson's ideas.

Editorial Notes.

THE articles in the Forum bearing the title, "How I Was Educated," are to be followed by a series entitled, "Books That Hav Helped Me." The first paper will be by Edward Everett Hale, and will appear in March.

"ANTICHRIST," in this week's TRUTH SEEKER, tells how Christ descended into hell, and what he did there. But the whole story is apocryphal, and a more rational answer to the question, "What did Christ do in hell?" would be, "He played poker with the devil."

SAM JONES preached a sermon in Toronto week before last of which a synopsis only filled two and a quarter columns of the weekly Globe. There were just six ideas in the whole of it, and five of the six were foolish. Jones's sermons are peculiarly well fitted for a Canadian Christian audience.

THE editor of the Clyde Democrat, published at Clyde, N. Y., is hereby informed that the story he prints, purporting to be a conversation between Col. R. G. Ingersoll and H. W. Beecher upon religion, is a lie from top to bottom. Mr. Ingersoll and Mr. Beecher never conversed upon religious matters. We state this upon the authority of the Rev. Henry W. Beecher.

WATSON HESTON requests us to print a notice like this: "All who are interested in THE TRUTH SEEKER cartoons will confer a favor on the undersigned if they will send portraits, newspaper cuts, engravings, or photos of prominent churchmen and other queer and crooked characters to Watson Heston, Carthage, Mo."

WE are gratified to hear that the National Labor Union at its recent congress in Cincinnati listened patiently and appreciativly to THE TRUTH SEEKER'S vigorous and engaging correspondent, Dr. Juliet H. Severance, of Milwaukee. Dr. Severance is one of the ablest of the woman-suffragists, and a most earnest labor reformer.

MR. LENNON, a New Jersey legislator, has introduced a bill in the legislature of his state which "provides that hereafter no day in the week or in the year shall be set apart or designated wherein it shall be unlawful for the citizens or inhabitants of this state to carry on their legitimate business." There is small danger that so sensible a bill will become a law in a state where a man is indicted for blasphemy for defending the Christian deity.

THE Rev. Mr. Agnew, Roman Catholic priest, of Chicago, has announced that no child of his parish will be allowed to make the first communion unless an attendant of the parochial school. The order is intended to force all children of Catholic parents to attend the priest's school, because at public schools the children do not develop a religious and spiritual life, while at parochial schools this development is first attended to. Parents may judge by this of the relativ value of the two schools.

IT is reported of Mr. Huxley that while recently talking to a circle of personal friends, some one suggested to him that there might possibly be a heaven where compensation would be made for the sufferings of people while on this earth. And now the religious press is scandalized by this reply: "Oh, this idea of being sent up to heaven to sit on a damp cloud and sing hymns—what sort of a compensation is that? Does it make amends to me for the suffering I hav endured here, and the suffering I hav been obliged to entail on my children?"

A MR. DE LISLE, Roman Catholic, has blocked the bill in the English Parliament giving Atheists the right to affirm when taking a seat in the House of Commons. Mr. Bradlaugh delicately suggests that perhaps some of Mr. de Lisle's constituents will "remind him that it is only a few years ago that a Roman Catholic was excluded by statute from Parliament, and that it is only very lately that the spirit of prejudice has been sufficiently broken to permit English Roman Catholics to obtain suffrages sufficient to return them to the House of Commons."

A FEW weeks since we found this paragraph in the New York Sun:

"Harry Edwards, of Wilkesbarre, was a member of the Salvation Army, but he fell from grace, and went back to his wicked ways. The other night he went to a meeting of the Army and scoffed, and some say blasphemed. Then suddenly he said: "I cannot see! I cannot see!" and he has been blind since. Many think he has been visited with divine wrath."

Wilkesbarre, Pa., must hav been meant, as there is only one town of that name in the country, and as we happen to be acquainted with one of the prominent manufacturers of the place, Mr. J. R. Perry, the paragraph was sent to him. He writes: "There is not a word of truth in that paragraph. I hav made inquiry, and can find of no such person or circumstance. If such an occurrence had taken place, it would hav been in all our city papers, but I hav not noticed anything, nor any comment, which would hav been made by them. Well, you may set it down as a salvation lie, but notwithstanding that, it will no doubt travel through all the public sheets devoted to such superstition, to the ends of the earth, and its falsity will scarcely overtake it, because journalism is becoming rather loose in moral principles. All that we can do is to deny it for the benefit of those who can appreciate it, and who will the more detest such methods of proselyting through appeals to cautiousness."

HON. J. W. AKERS, state superintendent of public instruction of Iowa, has given this opinion for the guidance of teachers on the question of religious exercises in the public schools in that state. He says: "The teaching of the catechism or the tenets of any religious denomination by a public school-teacher, in a school-house erected, equipped, and maintained by public taxation, is contrary to the letter and spirit of our constitution and laws. The exercises of a public school should not, and cannot, be legally increased or diminished nor in any manner influenced by religious teaching. The presumption is, and we think the courts would hold, that when a teacher is required to giv such instruction, either before the regular exercises of his school begin, or after they are concluded, his labors hav thereby been increased, for which added service he is compensated from the public funds. This is clearly unauthorized and illegal. The electors of a school district may permit their school-houses to be opened and used for religious meetings and literary societies, provided they are of such a nature, so conducted, and held at such times as not to conflict with the primary object for which the houses are intended. But the teaching of catechisms and the peculiar doctrins of a religious denomination, by a public school-teacher in a public school-house, either preceding or following the exercises of the public school, tends strongly to convert our common schools into sectarian and religious schools, and should therefore be prohibited."

Letters from Friends.

MECHANICSVILLE, Feb. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $7—$5 of which, according to your generous offer, will pay for my subscription to March 17, 1888. The other $2 in addition you can use where you think it will do the most good. GILES CHASE.

MONTGOMERY, Feb. 11, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to convey to you in as few words as possible my almost entire satisfaction in the way you hav of conducting your paper. There is once in a while a picture, if I were its editor, I believe I would not put in. Some of them are grand, such as the "Mockery of Faith." Oh, what stunning blows they do strike! Do not stop my paper.

W. T. GALLOWAY.

Jan. 17, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Permit me to say I congratulate you for your just and humane course regarding those in bonds in Chicago. THE TRUTH SEEKER is and ought to be the laboring man's defender against all "mad-dog" stigmas and cries of "Anarchists," "Mollie Maguires," and "Infidels." Christians should be hedged against in attempts to exterminate "bad men" by the wholesale. S. GLEASON.

PRINCETON, KY., Feb. 5, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER of this date that Mr. Reynolds's trial is postponed. I desire to contribute my mite to the fund for his defense, and in case the authorities never try the case the fund thus raised can be kept in reserve for similar cases when they arise. I inclose $1. I am anxious to hear a Liberal lecture, but believe to hav one here would do no good, unless disguised by another name, and of very mild tone. Wishing you much success, I am,

Yours truly, O. P. ELDRED.

BALDWINSVILLE, N. Y., Feb. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like it very much, but the very thing you call "valuable" is, to me, the only thing to dislike, and that with a will. Your reasons for using the illustrations are good; I am only sorry that people need such things. Mr. Heston does occasionally make a good point; for instance, Beecher on the rear platform of the evolution car, trying to hold on to orthodoxy. But this "large additional expense" I long to see in the shape of the best thoughts of our most advanced and intellectual Freethinkers. Mr. Washburn's essay was, for me, the best thing of the year. JULIA A. J. PERKINS.

ROCHESTER, MICH., Feb. 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 for two years' subscription. I am pleased to count myself one of the old subscribers to your paper. I commenced with the first number, in Paris, Ill., and hav continued it thus far. It seems to grow better with age. I like the spirit and temper of its editorials. There is so little of wrath and bile about them, while they seem to hit the mark about every time. I shall be glad if John Peck's late articles get into pamphlet form. Oh, that Thomas Paine's picture in the last number was enlarged and in shape to frame! What an illuminated biography it would present! C. H. GREENE.

BOSTON, Jan. 29, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find check to make me square with you for THE TRUTH SEEKER until Jan. 1, 1888. As there hav been some who hav stopped their subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER on account of your favoring justice for the Chicago Anarchists, I want to say this: that my subscription for the next year is an offset to one of them, for I had made up my mind to take some other paper owing to the meanness you showed toward Heywood that started at the Albany Convention over a year since; but the justice you hav manifested toward the Chicago Anarchists induces me to help along THE TRUTH SEEKER another year.

Respectfully yours, W. C. JAMES.

[We never knew that Mr. Heywood complained that we treated him meanly, nor hav we the slightest idea that we did.—ED. T. S.]

HUEY, ILL., Feb. 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: An item of religious interest has just transpired at or near Boulder, in the neighborhood of Clinton county, Ill. A revival meeting has been going on for several weeks under the auspices of the Holiness Band, the minister in charge being a thorough revivalist, and converting many good people to his theory of sanctification. The other day something happened which has left the meeting without a minister. While stopping at a neighbor's near the church, where he had stayed the night previous, he was seen prowling through the kitchen some time after breakfast, the wife being out attending to her domestic affairs. When she returned she noticed that he hurriedly came out of the kitchen, and that one of the pantry doors was open. Soon after the minister said he would make a call on Brother Pritchard and several of the other brothers before evening church service. But just before starting he said that he had had a revelation from God that their mincemeat used for pies was poison, and he was commanded to tell them not to use it. He then left, and the wife, not believing his revelation, as she had used the mincemeat before, went to work and cooked more pies, and at dinner the family ate of them heartily, and were immediately taken sick. Dr. Newton, of Boulder, was called in, and pronounced the family poisoned. He was in time, however, to save the whole family. The wife barely pulled through with her life. The minister had told several of the neighboring brethren that morning of his revelation concerning the poisoned mincemeat. The excitement in the matter got so high before church-time that when that hour did roll around there was no minister to direct sinners in the path of sanctification, nor, at this writing, has he put in his appearance in the interest of sinners, or in the interest of law and justice. The many converts say that no one to this day knoweth where their good minister at this time rusticateth. Some, however, think that he, like good Elijah of old, hath gone up. CHAS. C. MOORE.

EAST GERMANTOWN, IND., Jan. 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: It is not more than two years ago that I first heard of the Freethought movement. Before that I would go to church every Sunday to hear an inspired sermon from an inspired Bible, delivered by a sometimes inspired (by alcohol) preacher. Now, see what THE TRUTH SEEKER has brought me to say in response to some remarks made by our preacher recently, answered by letter as follows:

Perhaps you will be surprised to receive a note from me, but at a recent burial sermon you classed Freethinkers as Atheists, which are about the same; for if a man thinks for himself he will discard orthodoxy, and is then classed as an Atheist. The most sacred gift that nature has implanted in man is thinking, and every man must think and reason upon all questions before pronouncing himself; and if you will study the principles underlying Freethought you will not class them as you did with criminals, but if your desire is to make an easy living by upholding this religious humbug which contains nothing but wind, then you must preach hell-fire and make whirlwind assertions, and all such; but, on the other hand, if your desire is, Mr. Wagner, to do good by teaching knowledge that benefits all, such as science and discoveries by scientific appliances, and truths as laid down in histories, and morality only, then you would do a lasting favor to your community and your name will go down as a public benefactor, and will be honored many years after your period of activity. PHIL FRANZMAN.

Of course he never answered this letter, and will perhaps holler louder. Don't you think, Mr. Editor, that every Freethinker should resent and right all shameless falsehoods and misrepresentations by the preachers in some such a way?

PHIL. FRANZMAN.

ROCKPORT, MO., Feb. 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: For the first time in its history Rockport has been shaken from its center to its circumference (not a Charleston shake, however). Mr. Remsburg was here, and delivered four of his lectures—"The Apostle of Liberty," on the 29th, the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the birth of the grand old hero Thomas Paine; on Sunday, the 30th, his lectures "Sabbath-Breaking" and "Bible Morals;" on Monday night, the 31st of January, "False Claims." The lectures were largely attended by fine-appearing and intelligent audiences, and listened to with rapt attention. Mr. Remsburg is regarded as a fine orator and a man whose truthfulness cannot be successfully assailed. I hav been describing what the intelligent ladies and gentlemen in his audiences think and say of him. The people of the other side are composed of the same element that some eighteen hundred years ago cried out, "Crucify him, crucify him." It is the spirit that pervaded the breasts of the masters of the Inquisition; it is the same malignant spirit that pervaded the soul and being of John Calvin when he caused the burning of Servetus some three hundred and fifty years ago. Servetus had fled from the Vatican to the mountainous country of Switzerland in the hope to find a place of refuge. It seems he counted without his host, for Calvin caused him to be burnt at the stake with a green-wood fire to prolong his punishment, and hugged the flattering unction to his soul that he was doing God's service. The same hellish and malignant fiendishness fills the diminutiv souls of some of the orthodox here. G. G. BEOK.

HAY SPRINGS, NEB., Jan. 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: As so many are telling what they like and what they dislike, allow me in the list. First, I am a new subscriber, and will say I like THE TRUTH SEEKER; do not know how I would do without it. I like your position with regard to the Anarchists. When THE TRUTH SEEKER arrives, my wife and myself both want it. I want to see if John Peck has written, and so with her; she wants to know if Mr. Andrews has written. I want to say, by the way, John Peck is my favorit of all your contributors. In my opinion, he still sleeps on the fore side. I feel like joining hands with him him and taking the pledge never to giv up the struggle until the mind of man is free. I am very glad to see his name in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hope he will write more. I do not want you to think that I underrate the rest of the writers and speakers. I see by your paper W. F. Jamieson is coming to Neligh, Neb. How I would like him to wake them up at Hay Springs. But we homesteaders are so poor we can only look on and admire. There are quite a good many Infidels here. I was talking with one of the finest of men about a poor cripple having to work on Sunday. I said, "Do you think it wrong?" "No," said he; "I am a Bob Ingersoll man." The same man, I believe, will be the representativ for the state legislature on the Democratic ticket next year.

I want to tell every Infidel if he will stand up for his belief under all circumstances it will not, as many think, hurt his business, for he can easily bluff the clergy of his community, and then everybody will say he is smart.

HENRY W. MATTLEY.

PROVIDENCE, Feb. 18, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find a list of names to send papers to, but I cannot assure you that you will get one subscriber from the lot, although they are all Liberals. I hav just received THE TRUTH SEEKER with Mr. Ingersoll's article entitled, "The Truth of History." Don't you think that it would make a splendid Liberal tract for distribution, to refute the old chestnut slanders of leading Liberals having recanted and being converted? The exposure of the frauds goes on. That fire in the town of Liberal laid bare the secrets of a noted spook-establishment of the place, which had mystified and deluded its hundreds. Mrs. Ross, of Boston, has been shown up as a humbug, as she was, in this city some time since, and now this week a Mrs. Green of this city was brought to grief by the editor of a local paper, who held her as she was impersonating a spirit, tore the mask from her face, while a friend of his turned on the gas. But notwithstanding all these exposures, they find hundreds of willing dupes, and why shouldn't they, when such a noted Liberal as Colonel Kelso writes "Spiritualism Sustained by the Bible?" That is a catching card, and it is not at all surprising to me to find that since an institution of humbug and superstition which has based its theology upon the Bible has deluded and hoodwinked its hundreds and thousands, a similar institution (only of a lesser note) should be able to draw consolation from the same text-book of superstition. We are told of the "divine teachings of Spiritualism," and the seances are begun by singing, "Nearer, my God, to Thee," showing what I hav always held to be patent to any one, that Spiritualism is a sort of a first-cousin to religion. L. L. NORTHUP, Materialist.

BAKER'S CORNER, Feb. 7, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I think I can say, as does Mrs. E. A. Fairchild, of Mt. Alton, Pa., that your paper has become an indispensable necessity in our family; we look forward to its coming with eagerness—even our children are anxious to see what the pictures are each week. But the one that strikes me most forcibly is found in Oct. 8, 1886, "Robbing the Family to Feed Drones." How true to life it is, as it is practiced to-day! Think of the untold numbers of helpless, innocent children who are not only robbed of their physical sustenance but are also deprived of all good, wholesome mental food, so that they are compelled to grow up to be but intellectual dwarfs. We hav many such in our immediate vicinity, as we are surrounded by orthodox of the deepest dye. Although we hav a goodly number of Liberals here, some few outspoken Freethinkers, and many who I think would be on our side if it were not for fear of condemnation by the church, we are badly in need of some good Freethought lectures here, but are so hemmed in by priestcraft that even our school-house is thought by our Christian friends to be too good a place in which to hold an Infidel lecture, but many hav begun to read Liberal literature, and quite a number of Freethought books and pamphlets hav been purchased by persons here. One good brother said in meeting, "It is awful to think how much pizenous literaturey is coming through the mail." We, however, are very glad that people are beginning to awaken to a more grand and noble purpose in life by reading good, sound logic.

We hav been trying for some time to get new subscribers for your estimable paper, but hav only succeeded in getting one name. We therefore inclose $5 for a renewal of our subscription and the new subscriber. MRS. LIZZIE BAKER.

NEW WATERFORD, O., Feb. 14, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith inclose to you my personal check, No. 631, on National Bank of Commerce, in New York, for $11, to be applied as directed.

I want to say in what directions I like THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I like the illustrations. They help convey to Liberals and illiberals a correct idea of the absurdities and wickedness of the superstitions of theology.

I like the man with the badge-pin, and the way in which he reports the doings at the Manhattan Liberal Club. Giv him a new Faber No. 2 and plenty of rein.

I like the firm stand taken by the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER in behalf of a fair trial and justice for the Chicago Anarchists, and for fair play and a fair hearing generally for everybody.

I like the editorials. They usually go right to the point, and sharpen said point and the people who read the said editorials.

I like "Notes and Clippings," "News of the Week," "Gems of Thought," "Communications," "Children's Corner," "Science Column," "Letters from Friends," "Book Review and Notices" (very much), the account of friend Putnam's doings and wanderings up and down, and of the American Secular Union. I like the advertisments and what they advertise, and as the "Poetry" is thrown in, and doesn't take up much space, I guess I'll include it also.

From all which it may be inferred that I like THE TRUTH SEEKER about as completely as that infamously cruel and devilishly bloodthirsty organization known as the holy (?) Roman Catholic Church "cussed" the late Victor Emanuel in the "Bitter Curse," reproduced in THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 12th, and which "cussin'" is about as childish and contemptible an exhibition of impotent rage, cold-blooded cruelty, and malicious vindictivness, as could well be imagined.

Colonel Owen and myself leave for Topolobampo to-morrow. I wish THE TRUTH SEEKER many long years of prosperous usefulness. DAVITT D. CHIDESTER.

MERIDEN, CONN., Feb. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hand you herewith check for $10, for four new subscribers, whose names please find on your blank. I must confess I feel somewhat discouraged to find so many illiberals who profess to be Liberal. The list should hav been forty instead of four, with the effort I hav made to obtain them. I hav been watching several weeks to see your notice to the thousand vicarious atonement Liberals reduced to five hundred. It must be they retain their old habits of charging their shortcomings over to Christ. Why don't you show them some justice instead of so much mercy, and make them pay up? No decent Freethinker will ride a free horse to death. If they are too poor to pay for feasting on your bounty, let them say so, and borrow from their friends who know them. If they are rich and stingy, they ought to be born again, and own up that they are not Liberal, take some Christian paper full of gush, God's glory, and quack medicin advertisments, pay nothing, and get nothing. Everything looks favorable for this year being a great eye-opener, if those who hold to saving mankind from crime, poverty, and ignorance in this world will improve their opportunity to circulate millions of McArthur's letters to his Catholic friend, and millions of Ingersoll's "Lay Sermons," with John Peck's "Christian Absurdities," as flyers among the numerous Protestant branches that hav grown from the old Catholic hulk, as that grand old apostle of liberty did the "Crisis" during the Revolution. We will then hav a different Second Advent from the one that the followers of Christ and Miller hav been looking for since 1843, in the election of Ingersoll and Henry George to preside over this great and glorious nation, when cathedral and cottage will be taxed alike. N. F. GRISWOLD.

FOND DU LAC, WIS., Feb. 17, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am pleased with your paper, and especially with the pictures—they photograph ancient history. But many of us miss an article from the man who has by reading, research, and thought become qualified to make the pictures. All who see them cannot read from them alone the history. I wish he could or would write the truth to go with them. I am glad the New Jersey court and judge were not ready with their inquisition for Mr. Reynolds's case. It will allow him to breath freely a while longer, and I would suggest to Mr. Reynolds to shirk a full hearing of his case until the last day in a New Jersey court. If they ever dare to bring it to trial, then on the trial hav a note-taker, and take every word, including Ingersoll's speech, and then print a book, and I will warrant he will sell enough to pay him a salary of $2,000 a year for a number of years.

I hav read the arguments of Gladstone, Huxley, Muller, and others, on Genesis and science, and Mrs. E. Lynn Linton's in reply, and will say that she has stated the case with more truth and common sense for the reader than all the rest. The book as now published is not to be read by many, while if printed in a ten-cent pamphlet, with her answer and a brief condensed statement of the rest, it will be purchased and read by millions, and work a revolution.

I am in favor of the Interstate Commerce bill, not for its protections, but for the fact it is a commencement to shake a gigantic fraud, and I am in favor of the laboring men beginning to think. It matters not what particular form they adopt, but the fact that they begin to think and not be voted by the old parties, who hav been allies in destruction of the welfare of the country for twenty years or more, is gratifying.

I am glad Dan Manning is out, and hope a man will be appointed who will deplete the treasury in paying the debt of the United States, instead of finding some way to waste the money.

I send you some names for you to send sample copies.

Yours truly, DR W. C. PRIEST.

BRONSTON, KY., Feb. 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: That there is a conflict approaching that will test the validity and soundness of the government of the United States I am perfectly satisfied. It may be remote or it may be near, but come it must. Look at the agitated condition of Europe to-day, the prime cause of which is ascribed by the crowned heads to the example set by the government of the United States. Look how we are divided among ourselvs, Democrats, Republicans, Prohibitionists, labor reformers, Anarchists, Communists, Socialists, and others of minor note. What's the trouble? The United States is the only government on earth that recognizes the power and authority to govern to belong to the people. All other governments recognize the power and authority to govern as coming from God. Startling as it is, nevertheless it is true that between these two theories is an irrepressible conflict.

In the American Catholic News of Nov. 17, 1886, under the caption "The Republic in Danger," is an ingeniously written article by Henry A. Brann, D.D., denouncing our public schools, that I wish every American would read and truly understand it. Near the conclusion of his arguments he says, "At any rate the Catholic doctrin and demand stand. The rights of God are prior to those of the state or even those of the parent." Do you hear that? In the same paper Cardinal Gibbons, of Baltimore, speaking of Christian unity, says, "In the Roman Catholic church of the sixteenth century, when Luther went out from her, these great requisits of Christian unity were found, and they are found as well in the Roman Catholic church of to-day; elsewhere I fail to find them."

There is an unusual effort being made at present all over the civilized world for the unity of Christendom.

What does it mean? It is the combined effort of priestcraft and kingcraft to crush the doctrin contained in the Constitution of the United States that the people hav a right to govern themselvs.

Catholics, Protestants, citizens, men and women everywhere, shall we go back into the Dark Ages or shall we continue to advance as we hav for the last one hundred and ten years? J. N. BROWN.

114 EAST 41ST. ST., NEW YORK, Feb. 22, 1887.

FRIEND MACDONALD: You will see by inclosed cards that we are at last located, if not yet established, uptown in connection with our down-town place, and hope to be able to diffuse the light of THE TRUTH SEEKER in this neighborhood more successfully than where we first commenced. We hav scriptural authority for it that "the way of the transgressor is hard." I (the writer) do not know in what respect I am a transgressor, but do know that my way is also at present hard—quite so, but aut inveniam viam aut faciam, out of difficulties and obstacles which now surround me.

I saw by your last issue that the man with the badge-pin was apparently becoming solicitous as to my welfare and much concerned about my temporary absence from the meetings of the Liberal Club. He appeared to regard me as a stray lamb (or perhaps a grizzled old goat) that had wandered from the fold, and was kind enough to express the hope that I would meander back again. My heart was touched by this indication of brotherly love on his part, and on last Friday evening I boldly encountered the storm of wind and rain and thunder and lightning which raged outside, and found my way to the club for the express purpose of thanking him publicly from the platform for his kind solicitude in my behalf, which I did, and while on my pins took occasion to say some other things of which he doubtless took due note. Those who orate at the club should remember

If there's a hole in a' your coats
I rede ye tent it,
There's a chiel among ye takin' notes
And faith he'll prent it, as I do, and remain, with kind regards,

CAPTAIN CLARK, the Mariner.

DAYTON, O., Feb. 2, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: If we wish to succeed in convincing the world with reference to the fundamental principles of error in all religious doctrins, we must show the growth, the germ of it, or in other words, its first start to deceive mankind. I spent twenty years in my travels through Europe, Asia, Africa, America, and last, though not least, Palestine. I was trained in my youth to believe the Bible, but my long residence and observations in Palestine convinced me that the statements made in the so-called "inspired Bible" were not at all justified by the geographical facts. I found no sea, no lake, in Galilee. I found that the tower of Babel could not possibly be sixty-four thousand feet high, and as it was built only one hundred and thirty years after the deluge, or destruction of all mankind but Noah and family, who lived two hundred years after its destruction, I naturally asked myself, Could one man and two boys build a tower sixty-four thousand feet high?

Then taking in connection the moral injustice and a God's hatred and malice toward the beings he "made in his own image," and his love to the inhuman, cruel, and brutal few he chose out of the crowd, I came to the conclusion that I must be a grand hypocrit, like all the Christian preachers, to make money off the poor, ignorant masses. For fifty years I wore the hypocritical "tiara." After that I threw off the cloak that I hated to wear, and became an honest man and a Freethinker.

The most important object in this communication is to say that our friends, the Freethinkers, hav furnished the truth to the world that the Bible is false from the beginning to the end, but Brother John Peck, through the valuable TRUTH SEEKER, has capped the whole truth. To that valuable work, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and Mr. John Peck, the world owes a debt of gratitude that money can never pay, and I will here say that if there is one Freethinker in the world who will order a million numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER with Brother John Peck's "History of the New Testament," I will giv all I hav in the world to erect a monument to his memory. F. R.

IONIA, MICH., Jan. 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $6—$1 to bring up my three months' delinquency and $5 for renewal and one new subscriber. Only one new subscriber after all the work I hav done! I could hav procured a dozen for any other paper with half the effort, and yet there are hundreds that would take it and agree with all it advocates, especially the Nine Demands, if it were not for the church society influence brought to bear against their interests—if their true sentiments on the subject were known. The martyr business is a little out of fashion nowadays, and but few persons can afford to suffer even as much as I hav—not less than one thousand dollars a year for the last ten years—by speaking out their honest convictions. If anything should be done to so reorganize society that public sentiment could be changed and reason take the place of superstition—some place furnished for women and children to go on Sunday besides to church and Sunday-school—the work would soon be done. As to this Bible, nobody that reads it believes the half of it, yet eighty thousand pettifoggers under fat salaries keep up the farce. Out of the five thousand inhabitants of this city, not one hundred would be left in five years if the tables were turned and the half of the money and time expended to enlighten the people now spent to keep up the religious racket.

A short time since, on returning from hearing a specimen of pulpit eloquence in which the little Methodist pounder took the occasion, as usual, to giv Thomas Paine a racket, winding it up with a little doggerel, the last couplet of which was:

Where he's gone and how he fares,
Nobody knows and nobody cares,

I remarked to a friend that the preacher should hav read Thomas Paine, which if he had done he would hav known that Paine was a very religious man. A sub-disciple elder was walking, with his wife, just forward of us, and a dozen others just behind. He stopped, having overheard my remark, and said, "I want to ask you one question." I said, "Well, I will answer it if I can." Question: "What is religion?" I replied, "It is faith and belief in the unknown and the unknowable." Said he, "What?" I repeated my answer. He replied, "I don't know where you get such a definition." I said, "Out of my thinker, and you know it is true." He answered, "I don't know as I do." Said I: "Does not all that is known or knowable belong to science?" He said, "I suppose it does." "Then," said I, "what is left for religion?" His reply was, "Huh!" and our crowd moved on. I giv this to show how easily their questions are answered. S. M. BAYARD.

LEXINGTON, KY., Feb. 2, 1887.

DEAR MR. EDITOR: I venture to send another "mosaic" for the purpose of informing you that the Young Men's Christian Association is now trying to raise its head in our midst. They are praying and singing most fervently; but I find that thousands here hav very little faith in the efficacy of prayer. I was complaining last night of my sufferings, having been turned out of church, and an old lady referred me to the good Lord, who is supposed to help his followers when in distress; but when I remarked calmly that the good devil would be quite as sympathizing and kind, she laughed heartily, and seemed to agree with me. "If Christ was around, no doubt, he would console us to some extent, but deliver me from the 'old one,' for he seems to be iron-hearted and penurious," said I.

Christians affirm that Christ was never "evoluted," and probably they are right; but their vague and childish notions reflect no credit upon the clergy who hav formed and perpetuated the cumbrous systems in which they hav faith. They hav never located their heaven and hell, yet believe in it with the obstinacy of idiots. They would tread life's wastes with hysterical energy alone, could they not indulge in dreams, which feed their hopes, and throw a fallacious light upon their existence. Next, after years spent in tireless anxiety respecting the proper instruction of Sunday-scholars—after prayers, money, and the human breath hav been expended, and that for weary years—they and their teachers manifest less interest every day in "divine things," the picnic and Christmas tree being the principal incentivs to improvement; and the church vestibule is the place where Sunday-scholars stand and insult in a loud voice members of other churches as they pass by. A riddle or enigma has also been composed, introducing the obscene mandrake story from the memoirs of Jacob in the Old Testament. And this to confirm and purify the morals of children!

But, dear Infidel ladies, if this was all! Day after day I hear a complaint like the following (this is no dream, it is truth): Mrs. Smith, perhaps, stands high in the church, looks like vinegar on communion day, all other rules of the church being kept with equal strictness. She hires a poor girl to do her work, who was raised in affluence, agrees to pay almost nothing, forces her to perform the labor of three servants (takes four boarders). The poor girl is soon broken down and miserable. Some man, who sees all this, likes the girl and pities her. He offers her a cottage and support, but no marriage. We know the result. But who has heard of her despair, her death by laudanum, her body carried out silently at night? And just now, in this town, there is something said about houses of refuge. Church-members, living in luxury, weeping and sprinkling cologne over your sins—kneeling in the dirt to your bloodthirsty heathen God—hav you any refuge from your own accusing conscience over your bowl of oysters, your splendid cake and wine? Do you never see the ghost of the pale orphan who was led by your white jeweled hand to the gates of sheol?

What will a man gain by being a Christian? I heard a Baptist divine declare from the pulpit, a few days ago, that no good could be effected in the human heart without a call or inspiration from God. Then, certainly, Christians, being influenced by a supernatural power, should walk among us as angels; how rarely one should fall! Few Lucifers would we hav at that rate. And then the good weight in stores, the truth-telling, and noble behavior would be something immense.

When Infidels do anything good, they receive very little praise. I know an Infidel lady whose husband is a Christian, converted once a year. He seduced a young lady, who called on the wife, with her baby in her arms, weeping bitterly. The injured wife gave her a back room, and treated her with kindness until her father came for her. This beautiful saint met her husband with tears and smiles and great kindness. Of course, her neighbors blamed her. Instead of kind words from Christians there comes a shower of slimy Egyptian toads around; we almost step on them. We can hardly speak but an orthodox scorpion is hurled in our faces.

A late writer informs us that St. Augustine gloried in the fall of the Roman empire and the triumph of Christianity. I glory in the fact that when Alaric entered Rome he did not find citizens putting one another on the rack for the sake of opinions. One worshiped Venus, and another Apollo, unpersecuted. St. Augustine attributes his own reform to the perusal of Cicero, Plato, and the Stoics, though, like other crack-brained persons, he finally went over to Plotinus, the Neoplatonists, and Christianity. What hav such vagaries done for us? But the Stoics hav taught the principles of honor and truth, how to liv, and how to die. ALHAZA.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Grandmother's Kitchen.

Dear grandmother's kitchen in the old fashioned farmhouse,
That stood by the brook at the end of the lane,
Whence four generations hav walked forth in their grandeur,
To do their life's duty, nor labored in vain.
There were judges and jurors, and learned legislators,
And ministers, too, of both gospel and law,
But the stateliest thing in that famed ancient mansion,
Was plain old grandmother—her peer you ne'er saw.

There were porch, and back leanto, and cluttered-up attic,
Where on stormy days the small children played "bear,"
The great, solemn "north-room," without picture or carpet,
For weddings and funerals opened to air;
A huge chimney-stack, that smoked like a furnace,
A "buttry" well stocked with meal, milk, and cheese,
But the blessedest room found in all that old building,
Was grandmother's kitchen—come in if you please.

Our grandmother's kitchen was stout-timbered and spacious,
Through small-lighted windows the sunshine looked in;
Its wide-hearthed, broad fireplace, with black free-stone mantel,
Warm-welcomed each guest, stranger, and kin;
From the beams overhead there was hung the ripe pumpkin,
And strings of rich apples prepared there to dry;
Oh, who can forget the fine-flavored pastry,
The toothsome and wholesome grandmother's pie?

The democrat table there stood, long and cross-legged,
White linen bespread it—she made it herself—
When the hot dinner from the big pot and brick oven,
Smelling of spice from the storekeeper's shelf,
Loomed up in profusion from bowl, pitcher, and platter,
For master and servant, for neighbor and friend,
There met together, a supply the most gracious,
In grandmother's kitchen, which all could commend.

JOHN PRESCOTT GUILD.

My Neighbor's Dog.

The story of my neighbor's dog may be interesting to the children of THE TRUTH SEEKER, because it is founded on fact and teaches a moral worth careful study.

On the other side of the way, for some eighteen years, has lived my neighbor's dog Carlo, who is a Newfoundland as black as a coal, and a dog of great intelligence. He is watchful, but not vicious, and knows enough to respect the wishes of his neighbors. One night he got into a fit of barking at some prowlers, and kept it up so long that I awoke from a sound sleep, wondering why he would not be quiet, and, going to my window, I could see nothing to giv him so much trouble, so I said, "Carlo, why are you making so much noise? I want you to be still. Go to your nest and be quiet." As soon as he heard me and saw me at the window, he commenced wagging his tail, and ceased his barking immediately. I appreciated his intelligence, and we hav been friends ever since.

But this was many years ago, and for a long time we hav enjoyed this mutual respect and good will for each other. His master always liked him, but of late saw that he was getting old and manifesting the usual carelessness of declining years, and, wishing to hav as fine a dog when his Carlo should throw off his mortal body, and go to dog-heaven, as the saying goes, he purchased, or had presented to him, a fine pup of the same breed.

When the new pup was brought to Carlo's notice, it seemed to put new life into him, and he strutted around and licked the newcomer from head to tail, and he even went so far as to squat down and try to interest the little fellow in a game of dog-romp. It was quite a while, however, before the wee fellow could appreciate this kindness and good feeling on the part of Carlo, but at last Jack, by dint of effort on his tutor's part, began to romp and growl, and worry at the legs and bushy neck of Carlo.

How kind, and careful, and attentiv the old dog has been to the newcomer who was to take his place! He never tired of teaching him how to watch, as well as to play all his own dog-tricks. He taught him how to open the gate by wedging his nose between the latch and the gate-post, so that he could get out and in whenever he wanted to, and he never failed to call his attention to a good opportunity to run at a chance pig that unconsciously strayed too near the house. He always went for the pig's tail, and would hold on to it, and race the piggie for dear life until he was far enough away, but while he did this he was never known to draw blood; he would just bite hard enough to hold by the bristles, and seemed to do it for fun until he had run as far as he wished. If the pig walked, Carlo would hold on, and walk along quite contented.

Jack soon caught on, and was not long in having the fun all to himself, because he could run faster. How tenderly old Carlo would provide his newcomer with choice pieces of meat-bones that he buried, and would dig up for himself and Jack to gnaw at when they felt so inclined!

If an angry dog came their way, and attacked little Jack, he would fly with all his might to his protector, and the dog was mighty big and lucky that escaped punishment when Carlo put his nose on him. Many and many a fight had he on Jack's account.

I am afraid that with all his dog-kindness and dog-wisdom he acted foolishly. He was too indulgent with his protégé. He often denied himself the little delicate bits of food that were put upon his platter, and would invite Jack to eat it; and when Jack was sick one time, he would not eat a mite until he got over his spell, so that they could eat together. But, alas for the short-sightedness of poor old Carlo! Jack has grown up to be a strong and rough-tempered dog. He is even larger than Carlo, but instead of returning the kindness of his protector, the indulgences which he received hav made him greedy and ugly, and he, from long habit, now claims as a right what was permitted through kindness, and as a result, he will snatch away every bit of food he can lay his teeth on, and let poor old Carlo go hungry to his kennel. On several occasions he even went so far as to bite and tear poor Carlo in the neck, because he was very hungry and would not drop the bone he took from his own platter, and this is the way he is repaying his old protector and instructor for the kindness he has for years bestowed upon him.

The other day their master, as usual, brought to each his food, and placing their platters far apart, we watched the result. Carlo, with his old and worn teeth, made slow headway, but Jack pitched into his with tremendous energy, and soon devoured it and turned the corner with his mouth full of food in great haste to drive Carlo off. He was so greedy that he did not take time to finish his own in order to rob Carlo of his. He immediately snatched the best and largest piece with a growl and fled. The old dog licked his chops and looked wistfully in the direction that Jack had gone, and with a low, moaning cry he limped into his house of straw, and there he cried in distress with his bodily pains and his cruel treatment from Jack.

Any kind-hearted boy or girl will naturally feel sorry for poor old Carlo, and will say that Jack is an ugly dog, both sneaking and mean, and will resolve that under no circumstances will he treat his parents in so shameful a way. And yet, how often do we find children that hav been clothed and fed and educated while their parents in the prime of life hav toiled hard to make them happy, turning against them in their old age, and greedily snatching away the saved-up money, and when that was gone, under the pretense of doing better, hav sacrificed the old homestead, and cruelly, by law, driven the old people into a cold world or to a country poor-house! My advice is: Grant no unnecessary privileges to children; teach them to make their own living and become useful members of society. Hold on to your homestead as long as you liv.

Children, above all other virtues, should cultivate kindness to old people, especially their parents, forgiving them their follies when age has benumbed their limbs or ruffled their temper; and whenever you reflect on your past and theirs, it will fill you with pleasure instead of pain.

Of all other things this is certain—
They are incomprehensible;
'Tis sense that must lift up the curtain
To make anything sensible.

Call anything infinit, absolute being,

No definit lines such term agreeing—
No body, parts, passion—no tail and no head of it.

Correspondence.

BOSTON, MASS., Feb. 22, 287.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I desire to tell you how delighted I was in reading your beautiful tribute to the memory of that most heroic of human beings, Giordano Bruno. So few, even of Liberals, appreciate his lofty courage and glorious devotion that your eloquent article seemed trebly generous and noble. And as John P. Guild so truly says, "The children are the ones we should particularly instruct." Wishing you all happiness and the utmost prosperity, GEO. N. HILL.

[That our friends may not forget either the living or the dead, we will say that it was chiefly through the efforts of brothers Hill and Wakeman that the new calendar, dating from the time of Bruno's martyrdom, the era of science, was inaugurated.—EN. C. C.]

OMAHA, NEB., Feb. 11, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you a letter letting you know that papa reads THE TRUTH SEEKER and has taken it for the last eight years. I read the Children's Corner every week, and think you are a splendid conductor. I hav a sister nine years old and a brother two years old. I am twelve years old and attend a public school that is near our home. I am in the seventh grade at school. I hav the "Story Hour" and think a great deal of it. Susie's portrait is sweet and beautiful. Your book is so nice that every reader of the Corner ought to hav a copy. As this is my first letter I will close, wishing success to the Corner.

Your friend, MARGARET COLVIN.

[The above is an excellent letter for the first one, well written, and every word spelled correctly. We thank Margaret for her complimentary allusions to our work, and shall count her among the choice treasures of the Children's Corner.—ED. C. C.]

Plant-Animals.

Does it seem odd to think of a plant-animal? Of course it does if you hav never before thought of it.

What is it? I thought you would ask that. But, of course, the name suggests that it is something partaking both of the nature of a plant and an animal, and usually found growing in or near the salt water.

The other name of these creatures is zoöphytes; and still another, radiates, and they are of the lowest order of life, having a beginning away back in the long-ago time.

Did ever you see a star-fish, or a "five-finger," as it is sometimes called? It has short, purplish spines all over it, and is shaped like a star—hence its name. They are quite common on the beaches, and I hav picked them up frequently on the shore of Cape Cod and at other places.

The jelly-fish is another zoöphyte, or plant-animal. They are transparent, and vary in form and color, some being as large over as a big washtub, but there is so much water in their bodies that when placed on the land they dry away to almost nothing. They exhibit lovely colors, and are very curious, but, although they appear only a lump of jelly, they hav mouths, and stomachs, and nervous systems. They are good swimmers, too. If you touch them they will sting you, and their sting is poisonous and causes great pain. It is thought that the big jelly-fish, coming in contact with good swimmers, sting them so that they are paralyzed and drown—that, instead of being taken with cramps as commonly supposed, they are stung by a jelly-fish. If you hav been on the water in the night (salt water, in which only they exist) you may hav noticed the luminous spots seeming to follow the vessel or boat—this is phosphorus emitted largely by jelly-fish, of which the water seems to be full.

Then, there are polypi. These are plant-animals, too, and from these you get your beautiful pink and white coral beads. They are so numerous in some sections that islands are made of their outside coverings.

Now, are there any other specimens of plant-animals that you know of?

Sea-urchins? Yes, that's right, and sea-anemones, that attach themselvs to rocks and look like beautiful flowers that grow on land. If you touch one with a stick it will contract instantly. Sometime we may pursue this interestlng subject further.

S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—What is a plant-animal? What is its other name? Spell zoophyte. Describe the star-fish, also the jelly-fish. What is the consequence if we handle them? What of the luminous spots seen in the water at night? Name other plant-animals.

CONTENTS:

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE BIBLE.
SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.
SPIRITUALISM A NECESSITY IN GOD'S GENERAL GOVERNMENT.
SPIRITUAL MEDIUMSHIP.
OBJECTIONS TO SPIRITUALISM ANSWERED.

Like all THE TRUTH SEEKER'S publications, the mechanical execution of the work is all that could be desired. Good paper, clear type—in short, a neat little volume.

The primary object of the work, as its title indicates, is to sustain Spiritualism, but the absurdities of the Christian religion, and the abominations of the old Jew book, get a terrible shaking up. The book contains much to interest every intelligent reader. . . . Colonel Kelso has done much acceptable work in the cause of Freethought and Liberalism all over the land. Send for his new book—read it—put it into the hands of every Christian; it will teach him that the way of the fool is foolishness. Every Liberal who reads it will certainly find his "Spiritual" strength renewed.—John Peck.

More Gems from Jones.

Sam Jones held forth in his jerky, disjointed way to a large crowd at the Young Men's Christian Association rooms the other night. Sam, as usual, was affectedly eccentric, and hopped from one thing to another like a grasshopper in a hurry to get there; and the "Christians" assembled to hear him giv tongue vigorously applauded his wild and grotesque utterances, under the impression, probably, that they were honoring God by so doing. Among the series of sayings of the salient and saintly Sam were the following:

"Show me what a man likes and what he hates, and I will tell you the kind of man he is."

Well, now, Sam, there is Chauncey Depew; he likes the festiv feed, where the green turtle and the capon smoke upon the board, and where, the feed done justice to, he will be called upon for a "few remarks;" and he hates all labor federations. Now, what manner of man is Chauncey, Sam? Now, I like a glass of good old Bourbon, when in the mood for it, and hate like poison the hypocrit masquerading in the garb of square-toed frankness. Now, Sam, what sort of a man am I? You can answer by mail, through the press, or at one of your kangaroo seances, as you like. I say "kangaroo," because you jump about so with your tongue.

"One trouble with the theology of to-day is that it is too broadcasted. I like things in rows. I want my theology to be like a telescope, so I can look up through it and see the spires in the city of God."

Yes, Sam, theology, as you say, is rather "broadcasted," consequently it is rather diaphanous, as it were; but so much the better for the world, Sam. So you like things in rows, eh? How would three or four rows of brownstone fronts suit you, eh, old boy? As you do not follow "the Master," in that he preached without money and without price, but exact a goodly sum for your freaks of speech, you seem to be on the road to "things in rows"—brownstone houses, for instance. But about that telescope business, Sam; you know you can't see the "spires of the city of God"—you couldn't, even with the Lick telescope, the largest in the world—and so own up that you want your theology to be like a telescope that you may shut it up and put it in your pocket, when desirable. Honest Indian, Sam, isn't this the reason?

"A man's reputation is like his girl. He can put her on or off and not lose much. Reputation is easily made. To-day a crowd will cry a man's hosannas; to-morrow it will cry, 'Crucify him!'"

Sam, you put your foot in it too far here. Put a girl on or off and not lose much, eh? What do you think the girls will say to that? Why, they'll come down on you like a thousand of brick, for all time; and when you lose the girls you lose three-fourths of your hearers. You are right about a man being cried up to-day and howled down to-morrow; and to-morrow, Sam, some one of more pronounced freaks of speech than yourself will bob up, and you will become a wall flower. Sic transit gloria mundi!

"Infidelity is only a great big mouth going all around talking. There's nothing in it but mouth, nothing behind it to back it up. Look under it and over it and through it and on all sides of it and you only find mouth."

You are wrong here, Sam. It is theology—orthodoxy—that is the great big mouth. Why, it is continually mouthing. If it didn't mouth, it would die of inanition. It has mouthed for two thousand years, and mouths to-day the same lurid doctrins that it mouthed at the start. It is obliged to mouth, or it would lose its pins. Infidelity is not backed up, I'll allow, by a monstrous God and fearful devil, consequently has no need of such a mouth as orthodoxy continually shoots off, and which has got to back up these beings for all they are worth, or lose its grip on the non-reasoning ones of earth. The less you say about "mouth," Sam, the better for your side of the house, which has an acre of mouth to an inch for the other side, and needs it all and even more.

"Faith is traces, and all you've got to do is step in and go ahead. Doubt is like these hold-back arrangements, and if you step in you are sure to go backward."

Yes, Sam, you can go ahead in the traces of faith, from little to great faith, but where are you then? Can you see, do you know, any more than when you started? A ton of faith brings you no more knowledge than an ounce of the same commodity. You are wise in not saying where you go to when "going ahead." Doubt, you say, is a pull-back arrangement that takes us backward. Doubt, Sam, is the halt on the march in the dark—not the march that I think you are on, but which you advocate for shekels—and when it blossoms into unbelief, then opens up a broad way of light from which the ghosts and goblins of superstition flee in affright. Hurrah for the "pullback arrangements," Sam. May they increase and multiply until unbelief makes the dark light.

"We shouldn't ask for more grace, but we should use the grace we've got already. It's not the use of grace, but the misuse of it, that damns men. There never was a bigger falsehood perpetrated on God than the Sunday-school song, 'Surely, the Captain can depend on me.'"

I agree with you in this, in every particular, Sam, and as far as the song goes, I must say I think the "Captain" who depends on the singers thereof will get badly left; and that's what you think, of course, or you would not hav sat down on it so heavily.

"People say to me, 'Jones, why don't you preach Christ? You only preach law.' To all such I say, 'Do you suppose I'll bring my God down here among you cutthroats?' The pulpit is the last place in the world to show the white feather. The greatest blessing a church can hav is a preacher who is game from head to foot. The guns of the devil were never closer to the pulpit than now."

So you don't propose to make a common thing of your God, eh? Keep him in a glass house of your own, I suppose? Well, I would do the same, were I you, and "in with a crowd of cutthroats." A God would be as much out of place among cutthroats as a hog in a drawing-room, I should think. Your God must feel awfully thankful to you, Sam. Say, Sam, can you find a pulpit where the "white feather" is not shown? As for your "game preachers," why, the papers are full of the "little games" of preachers, some of which are rather darkly tinted. You read of them probably. I agree with you in your proposition that the "guns of the devil were never nearer the pulpit than now." To tell the truth, I think there's a truce between the devil and the preachers. What do you think, eh?

"A man who has the courage to preach his convictions must be eccentric nowadays. I'm eccentric, they all say, and butcher my grammar. God never made two fellows alike, because if he did, one of them wouldn't amount to much."

Sam, how many of a hundred pulpiteers hav any convictions of the truth of what they preach? Albeit, you are somewhat eccentric, Sam, I don't think it follows that you are preaching your convictions. You are simply preaching—to call it that—for applause, notoriety, and shekels. Suppose God had made another fellow just like you, Sam—but don't let us think of it, in view of your conclusion in the premises, for you, possibly, might hav been the one that wouldn't hav amounted to much!

"There's many an old Salvation Army fellow who is going to sit around the throne, and many a D.D. who is going to take a back seat. I'm going to be a D.D. myself some day, but then things are coming down and I'm going up."

I don't know about the Salvation Army fellows "sitting around the throne," Sam. You do, of course, or you wouldn't hav so stated; but I agree with you that "many a D.D. will hav to take a back seat." I see you are going to chance it, however, by becoming a D.D.; but then, you say, "things are going down, and I am going up." I don't exactly understand you, Sam, but I must say that you appear to be somewhat egotistical.

"A good many preachers hav got wholesale liquor dealers in their church, but they don't say anything about them, because they might hurt their feelings. If there is anybody in this world I hold in contempt, it's the fellow who goes around with his feelings sticking out like quills on a porcupine's back."

Now, Sam, see here: Does a trader rap a buyer over the knuckles because the buyer is in some business which the trader thinks is off color? Not much. Well, then, shouldn't the preacher deal as gently with his customers as the trader with his? Why, the parson that raked over the coals the liquor man, the coal man, the grocer, the lawyer, the Wall-street bandit, the alderman, etc., etc., would very soon hav to put up his shutters, my dear fellow, and go into the liquor or coal business himself. Don't exact too much of the poor parsons, Sam. As for the object of your detestation, how uncomfortable the "fellow" must feel, eh? and what a queer sight, with his "feelings sticking out all over him like quills on the fretful porcupine!" Let us hope there are not many such, Sam.

"Do you want to know the difference between moral and physical courage? The first is the hero standing up for the right, and the second is the little bullpup sleeping on the mat."

You may be right about moral courage, Sam—I think a good deal of moral courage myself—but you are hardly generous with physical courage, don't giv it a fair showing off; your metaphor here is away off, Sam. Moral courage is a big fellow and a good one, but physical courage is his big brother, I won't say better, as he follows lines so different. He isn't a "little bullpup sleeping on a mat," but a full grown bull dog, wide awake and alert. When you can down John L. with moral courage, then I'll giv in that the latter is a bigger and better dog than physical courage, his brother, that leads in all enterprises of pith and moment.

Go on, Sam, with your freaks of speech. They amuse your hearers, don't hurt us, and put money in your purse. In time, if you are not bowled over by some other freak, you can hav what you like—"things in rows"—brownstone fronts, you know.

SI SLOKUM.

A Disgraceful Job.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

I was so impressed by Colonel Ingersoll's article on "The Truth of History," in your last issue, wherein he deals some hard blows on the habit of lying and misrepresentation among ecclesiastics, that I resolved to ask you to print the following truthful account of the late disgraceful job put up for the state of Maine Druids, who are supposed to worship as a god the power that sustains the world, and some of whom go so far as to contend that the Christian God is the corresponding devil or destroyer.

There are many Druidic organizations on this continent, and among these there are five civil corporations.

The corporation in Maine contains a university, the seat being Sherman, in the wilds of Aroostook. Once every summer—and that for a brief time or a few days—this corporation has power to grant the degree of M.D. on persons of seven years' successful study. The charter was granted by the legislature in 1880. It has a membership of 575, many of whom are doctors and lawyers who hav graduated elsewhere. The number of the original medical graduates of this institution are four, and no more.

In 1883 the president, Dr. D. H. Owen, of Sherman, who is a life officer, granted a dispensation to hold the university for a short period in the city of Lewiston. The same year the said dispensation was withdrawn or canceled, and still again renewed after a few months. The university met at Bangor and Lewiston in June, 1886, and, having performed some work, closed in July, not to be opened in Lewiston again for a year. About that time the person who acted as vice-president at Lewiston went to liv at Columbus, O., having closed his house at Lewiston. His name is Dr. Samuel York Carleton. He is very old, much older than he looks, and was an important and gallant officer in the war with Mexico in the days of Santa Ana. I hav never heard it alleged that Dr. York, as he is commonly known, was anything of an Infidel. Indeed, I think he is not an Infidel.

On the 23d day of July, 1886, just after said Dr. York left for Columbus, the president, Dr. Owen, having been bothered and pestered to death by York's enemies, who seem to be numerous and rife, formally canceled once more the dispensation whereby the corporation and its university held forth at Lewiston, and this time he did not mean to renew it any more. The declaration was given to six Maine dailies, including the Portland, Augusta, and Bangor papers.

Dr. York (Carleton) got tired of the West, and returned to his home some few months ago, but the corporation, as such, did not know that he was in Maine.

For some specific purpose which we cannot exactly exactly determin, some vile folks concocted a trick to play on York, which cannot be considered short of diabolical. A reporter of the Boston Herald was rigged up as a candidate for the medical profession. This reporter, whose name is said to be Beamis, called up Dr. York one night this month, and, as if in great hurry and anxiety, said he was on his way to the City of Mexico, where he was going to open a doctor's office, and wanted to be admitted to the mysteries of Druidism. Dr. York had not the power even to make him a Druid, and in the state of Maine Dr. Owen, at Sherman, alone had such power, to say nothing of making him a doctor.

It must be remembered that Dr. York is an aged man, and had been once totally blind for two years, and that his health has been very precarious for many years.

The reporter brought out a long article in the Boston Herald containing lies so thick and dense as to leave very little room for a true or correct statement of even a single point. If collected together, the lies would fill a column of THE TRUTH SEEKER. But, of course, something took place between York and the reporter, for the latter speaks of the doctor's making him a Druid, and raising him "by the sword." It seems that York gave him a matriculation paper, for which he charged him $5. That was a preceptor's card; there was no university act, but only a preceptor's privilege. The reporter further said that York granted him a diploma. York in reply says he did not grant him a diploma, but that he gave him an old blank to study the Latin thereon. Of course there could not be any graduation, to say nothing of a diploma.

The university was not in Lewiston at all, and the corporation was not aware of the whereabouts of Dr. York.

The first thrust made against the Druids of Maine was perpetrated by the Episcopal church in 1877, and the malignity of that ecclesiastical old fury has ever since continued. Some groups of doctors here and there hav often chimed in with the old ecclesiastical hag, and between the two a great deal of inconvenience has been the result to the Druidic cause. But what this last persecution was got up for we do not yet know. It is probable, however, that the object was to break up the charter of the Druidic Corporation in Maine. Fortunately for us, they made a miserable faux-pas, and in order to make anything out of it will hav to bolster it up with further lying. By the way, the reporter says he got commission from York to practice medicin and law, as well as to preach the gospel, but was told he need not believe in God unless he chose to. J. DAVIES, M.D.

Obituary.

K. Hanson died suddenly Feb. 3, 1887, at his home in Boggy, Bosque Co., Texas. He was born in Norway, Jan. 22, 1821, emigrated to this country in 1849, and settled in eastern Texas, where he lived for twenty-eight years, when he moved with his family to Bosque Co., Tex., where he lived until his death.

Deceased was brought up a Lutheran, the state religion of Norway, but upon the reading of a few Freethought pamphlets some years ago, among which were, "The Bible—What Is It?" by J. D. Shaw, of which he immediately expressed his appreciation, and said he only wished he could hav had the benefit of its perusal years before, he experienced a complete and radical change in his religious or ethical views, and finally lost all faith in the Lutheran religion, and renounced Christianity altogether, his eyes being opened to the injustice of its cardinal doctrins, its superstitions, and the absurdity of its claim to divine inspiration of the Bible. He at once and forever repudiated all its unreasonable creeds, and espoused the cause of Freethought, the principles of which he adhered to until his end. To close, in the appropriate words of E. A. Rohn, in his obituary notice of him, "He believed in the brotherhood of man; that religious duties consist in loving mercy and doing justice toward our fellow-men. He was faithful in all his relations of life—just, charitable, generous."

He leaves a wife and five grown-up children, with relativs and friends, to mourn his loss.

His sons, H. Jacob Hanson and Isaac Hanson, are both promising young men and Freethinkers. T. THEO. COLWICK.

New Books.

We hav received from the publisher a copy of "Little Lessons" by Elmina D. Slenker.

The book is designed expressly for children, admirably written, full of just such information as they need, which is presented in the writer's most charming and attractiv style. We publish below a chapter selected at random from the book. The book is an octavo of 98 pages. Price, in best binding, 40 cents.—The Edgar Post.

We are in receipt of a small book, published at THE TRUTH SEEKER office, New York, and written by MRS. E. D. SLENKER, entitled "Little Lessons for Little Folks." This small work is one of the most interesting and instructiv books for the young which we hav seen in a long time and should be in the hands of every child old enough to read and understand in the country. If some of our Sabbath-school superintendents would furnish their scholars with plainly written facts from nature instead of books of fiction describing some little child who became so good that it died in early childhood, the rising generation would be greatly benefited.—Star of Liberty.

Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "Tribute to His Brother," "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the four will be forwarded to any address, for 50cts, or either one for 15cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

The Busts of Voltaire, Paine, and Ingersoll. Cabinet size; true to life, price, $1.50 each. Every admirer of these apostles of Religious Liberty should hav them.

Photographs of Colonel Ingersoll. panel, 10½x17, $3; boudoir, $1; cabinet, 40 cents.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

She is very much attached to her home at present by means of a trace chain; but she will be sold to any one who will agree to treat her right. She is one-fourth shorthorn and three-fourths hyena. Purchaser need not be identified. I will also throw in a double-barreled shotgun, which goes with her. In May she generally goes away somewhere for a week or two, and returns with a tall, red calf, with long, wabbly legs. Her name is Rose, and I would prefer to sell her to a non-resident."

ONE of the city officials, whose office is on the second floor of the City Hall, is a very cautious man. They say that when he proposed to a young lady something over a year ago, he went at it in an original manner. They were sitting in the parlor, and Mr. S. began as follows: "Miss ——, do I look like an ape?" "Why, Mr. S., what a question! Of course you don't." "All right. Do you take me for a jackass?" "A jackass? What do you ask that for? Of course I don't." "Very well. You don't consider me a harum-scarum good-for-nothing, do you?" "Why, I never thought of such a thing. Why, Mr. S., what put such a notion into your head?" "Well, Miss ——, inasmuch as you find me devoid of these objectionable peculiarities, I hav come to the conclusion that you feel an interest in me, and I want to ask you to become my wife." They were married.

MANY a negro bears upon his body the seared scar of the branding-iron, and the purple lines of the Protestant whip. And what did the thousands of Protestant ministers do? Preached, every one of them, from carefully-selected Bible texts to prove that slavery was a divine institution.—E. M. Macdonald.

OUR literature is comparativly Liberal. Indeed, its Infidel tendencies are the lament of the pulpit and the religious press. The best magazines in the country are objects of frequent attack by the evangelical press for the heterodox character of many of their contributions and editorials. The secular press is chiefly in the hands and under the control of men who hav outgrown the whole Christian theology. If they show it respect, it is not because they hav any love or sympathy for it, but because it has been sanctioned by the faith and piety of millions, and because it is yet nominally the religion of the people for whom they write. The great majority of professional men are undoubtedly Freethinkers. [This last assertion is the most doubtful that the writer makes. I transcribe his words in a town of upward of eighty thousand, and there is scarcely a lawyer of any eminence, or even a physician, who lets it be known that he is a Freethinker, even if he is known to be one by those who are intimate with him. But this is a state of things that can't last long.] The public advocates of Freethought now speak in the best halls and to larger audiences in the West than the clergy can get to hear their sermons. And the Liberal cause is gaining daily.—Underwood's Lectures and Essays.

WE can conquer nature only by obeying her laws; and, in order to obey those laws, we must first learn what they are.—Winwood Reade.

THERE is a phrase, "Christian gentleman," and the idea of Christian seems usually to accompany the idea of gentleman; but why should the word gentleman be always associated with the name Christian? When you speak of a Christian gentleman, do you mean that the gentleman and the Christian are one and inseparable? Do you mean that a gentleman must be a believer in total depravity, in an eternal hell? that there is no gentleman unless he believes in damnation, that absolute refinement, good breeding, gentlemanliness, involves a belief in the absolute destruction and eternal torment of nine-tenths of the human family? By no means; when the terms Christian and gentleman are associated together, the term Christian is taken in its largest, not in its smallest, sense.—Frothingham's American Gentleman.

I BELIEVE in the gospel of intelligence. This is the only lever capable of raising mankind. Intelligence must be the savior of this world. Humanity is the grand religion, and no God can put a man in hell in another world who has made a little heaven in this. God cannot make a man miserable if that man has made somebody else happy. God cannot hate anybody who is capable of loving anybody. Humanity—that word embraces all there is.—R. G. Ingersoll.

OH, if the selfish knew how much they lost,
What would they not endeavor, not endure,
To imitate, as far as in them lay,
Him who his wisdom and his power employs
In making others happy? —Cowper.

I CARE not one straw for a belief in God, unless that belief makes one a better man. A God to whom you simply doff your hat or bend your knee as you enter church, and who frightens you a little on your death-bed, but exerts no restraining power on your vices, no ennobling influence on your character and life—what is such a God good for? He is nothing more than a horseshoe over your front door; nothing but the new moon over your right shoulder; nothing but a hollow, gilded figure-head on your boat, as you go sailing down the stream of time. I want no such God. I believe in no such God. I will teach the existence of no such God. But I believe in moral ideas as supreme. I believe in them as the divinest thoughts in all the great universe of mind. I believe in their mighty power to hold one up when he stumbles against temptations.—W. H. Spencer.

IF new-got gold is said to burn the pockets til it be cast into circulation, much more may new truth burn in the soul till it find utterance.—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

IT is assumed that the oath of a person who does not believe in a future life is worthless—an assumption which betokens much ignorance of history in those who assent to it (since it is historically true that a large proportion of Infidels in all ages hav been persons of distinguished integrity and honor); and would be maintained by no one who had the smallest conception how many of the persons in greatest repute with the world, both for virtues and attainments, are well known, at least to their intimates, to be unbelievers.—Mill's Liberty.

FEELING without judgment is a washy draught indeed; but judgment untempered by feeling is too bitter and husky a morsel for human deglutition.—Jane Eyre.

WOE to us if we cannot be resolute. The miserable man is he who halts between two opinions, who would and would not; who longs for the merchandise, and will not part with the price. He who has dared to look his destiny, however frightful, steadfastly in the face, to measure his strength with its difficulties, and once for all to giv up what he cannot reach, has already ceased to be miserable.—Carlyle's Letters.

THE three conclusions which I hav chiefly endeavored to make clear are these: That the tenet of the inspiration of the scripture is baseless and untenable under any form or modification which leaves to it a dogmatic value; that the gospels are not textually faithful records of the sayings and actions of Jesus; but, occasionally, at least, ascribe to him words which he never uttered and deeds which he never did; and that the apostles only partially comprehended, and imperfectly transmitted, the teaching of their great master.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Ohio legislature last week repealed a law discriminating against colored children in the public schools. Some of the good, pious people of the state threaten to withdraw their offspring from the schools if any "niggers" are allowed to attend.

FOURTEEN of the seventeen prominent women of Seattle, W. T., who were interviewed on the woman suffrage question, said that they were glad that the law had been declared void. This shows that the "prominence" of these fourteen ladies is due to something besides their good sense.

AN amendment to the Naval Appropriation bill, introduced last week by Senator Aldrich, appropriates $25,000 for the purchase of the steamer Stiletto for use as a torpedo vessel. The Stiletto is a ninety-foot yacht owned by a Connecticut man, and is said to be the fastest boat in the waters of the world.

MISS NINA VAN ZANDT doesn't know whether she is the wife of August Spies, the Anarchist, or not. Justice Engelhardt, of Chicago, who performed the marriage proxy for Spies, has returned the alleged marriage certificate to the county clerk. The clerk said he would not file the paper until he had obtained legal advice on the subject.

WHEN the Rev. Mr. Ward, of Englewood, N. J., shot his wife two weeks ago, the crime was charitably attributed to temporary insanity. The friends of Mrs. Ward now allege that the shooting was wilfully done, and that it was the crowning act of a long period of brutal treatment. He simply became angry at her and shot her. Mrs. Ward is recovering at the house of her brother-in-law, and when the reverend criminal is well enough to be out he will hav to face a prosecution.

THE friends of the Rev. Mr. Staunton, of Brooklyn, havn't got through having trouble about their pastor. After he was ousted from the presbytery and his wife had secured a divorce, he established an independent church. Now he has disappeared and his flock is without a shepherd. He is under bonds to pay his divorced wife $8 per week.

JOACHIM PECCI, pope of Rome, was seventy-six years old on the 1st inst. Father McGlynn's congregation sent him a congratulatory telegram promising that they would continue to pray for him. This is uncalled for. If there is anyone who does not need praying for, it should be the man who is infallible in spiritual matters, and who is physically too weak to be wicked.

AT the minister's weekly meeting recently, Chicago, the Rev. F. Taylor read a paper upon Christianity and Socialism, in which he said that "Moses, David, and Solomon stand in straight alignment with Henry George." The conclusion of his discourse was as follows: "To digest the whole matter, God's ancient land law made a per capita distribution of the soil, made the metes and boundaries of each inheritance perpetual, provided a periodical cancelation of incumbrances, and ready redemption at any time without interest. At the very vestibule of the New Testament, we find John the Baptist advocating Socialistic principles when he said: 'He that hath two coats, let him giv one to him that hath none, and meat likewise.' Turn it which way you will—Old or New Testament—the Bible affords the absolute property theorists magnificent fighting all along the line. It is passing strauge that, with such strong intrenchments in the Bible, the Socialists of recent years hav nearly all been Atheists, and hav entertained toward organized Christianity sentiments of incurable bitterness. But the mystery disappears when we remember that they, like the people, are more disposed to read the church than the Bible, and find it mustering with their enemies."

UP in Missouri they hav caught on to a scheme to turn the regular sensational "revival" to practical account, in a worldly sense. First, a noted "professional" is engaged who understands exactly how to "convert," then a committee is sent arouud to all the business men with a written "indorsement" of the prospectiv series of meetings, which they all sign with the understanding that the meetings will bring the country people into the city by hundreds, and make business brisk. After all the business men and the men of wealth and influence hav given their indorsement, it is easy to get nearly every one else to add his name, as the average man loves to be in fashion. These signatures appear in the local papers, and prove a powerful advertisment among the unsophisticated people of the rural districts, who imagin the entire population has got religion, and whole families pour into town to hear the wonderful evangelist whose ministrations are attended with such a marvelous outpouring of the holy spirit. The Sedalia Bazoo one day last week had over a page of such indorsements of a great revival meeting now in progress in that city. It is the shrewdest business scheme that has come under our observation for some time, and next thing to a paper railroad boom for a dead town.—Gazetteer.

THIS is a part of Counselor Swett's argument in behalf of his clients, the Chicago Anarchists: "I know of no more appropriate illustration of the legal status liability of the defendants in relation to their intemperate utterances, or in relation to their liability under all the evidence, than to recall the history of the formation of the Republican party. It was a party which had for its object the reformation of the civil society and the civil institutions in this country. The most radical of its leaders characterized the Constitution of the United States as 'a league with hell.' Underground railroads were everywhere established, leading from Mason and Dixon's line to Canada, and people conspired, contrary to the Constitution and laws, to aid and abet the slave in his escape. If he were arrested by officers of the law, people were guilty of a conspiracy to rescue him. The storm finally culminated, and by and by old John Brown, caught up by the inspiration of the occasion, committed an offense against the laws of Virginia. Was everybody who made speeches for the Republican party guilty of the offense for which John Brown was convicted? The side taken by the prosecution and the court is to say that John Brown's raid was a natural outgrowth of the Republican party. If there had been no Republican party there would hav been no John Brown's raid, and therefore that all Republicans who made speeches and believed in the Utopian idea of a change in society for the benefit of a class were like the Anarchists, and were particeps criminis with old John Brown, and ought to be hanged."

Mrs. Colman's Reminiscences.

One Saturday morning word came to me from my friend that she had made an appointment for me to speak in a Presbyterian church in the town of Rush the following Sunday evening, and that she would call for me in a few hours. I was full of fear; to speak in a church was something formidable. What if I should fail? We were to be entertained at the home of the person who had obtained the use of the church—a Friend—but whose standing was such in the town that the trustees granted him the use of the building. Mr. Hallock did not know me, but supposed I was an experienced speaker. Mrs. Post charged me that on no account was I to tell them that I had never spoken, save for a few moments in some convention. She said they had no anxiety, and it would be foolish to giv them any cause to fear a failure. The bell rang for the services to commence, and, with trembling knees, I ascended the pulpit. I always had such command of my voice that my embarrassment was not observable if I could keep out of sight the trembling that possessed my physical frame. The meeting was pronounced a success. Mrs. Post and Mrs. Hallock sat with me in the pulpit; Mrs. Post opened the meeting with a short speech and then introduced me in quite a flattering manner. When riding home, after the lecture, Mr. Hallock said to Mrs. Post, "Does Lucy Colman always speak from a written manuscript?" Mrs. Post's answer was, "I never heard her when she used notes before this evening." "Well," said Mr. Hallock, "if she will throw aside her notes I will obtain the house in the other part of the town, and take her over there for another meeting. I don't like reading; I'm too much of a Friend." So the notes were carefully put aside, and the next meeting was an extempore speech. My indefatigable friend soon appointed the third meeting. This was in the town of Williamson, where lived a noted reformer, Griffith Cooper. He had been a naval officer, but had been converted to the doctrin of peace in some special outpouring of the spirit, and was a Friend, but left the organization for the same reason that Amy and Isaac Post had—because of proslavery in the order.

I had a professed friend in Rochester who, though a Friend and Abolitionist, always felt that he held a commission from God to attend to God's business in this world. He was eminently Christian, and kept all the commandments of the law (save paying his debts). He did not like my Infidelity. As soon as he heard that an appointment had been made for me through Griffith Cooper for a Sunday lecture, he made haste with his wife to visit Mr. Cooper, and told him he was afraid the speaker would be a great disappointment, as she was entirely new to the business, etc. This was very perplexing to Mr. Cooper, as he prided himself upon having introduced to that community very able speakers—as a specimen, Mrs. Ernestine L. Rose, the accomplished Polish woman; but the meeting was well advertised, and must go on. When Mrs. Post and myself arrived, Mr. Cooper evinced much dislike for me, saying that his friend and wife from Rochester were already his guests, and had told him that we were imposing on them a person who was entirely green, and would no doubt disgrace the getters-up of the meeting. I was so chagrined that I refused his hospitality, as did my friend, and we sought a home, which was easily obtained, elsewhere. The church where I was to speak was a Union house, built by more than one body of Christians. The Reformed Presbyterians had at that time a settled minister by the name of Gregg. He occupied the pulpit in the morning, giving it to me for the afternoon. At another village a mile or more away, the Methodists were holding a protracted meeting, but gave up the hour of my appointment, and came in a body, five ministers, and seated themselvs directly in front of the pulpit, and, to their honor be it written, were very respectful to me and to the meeting.

Mr. Gregg opened the meeting; the house was crowded, and it was daylight, much more trying than evening for a young speaker. Mrs. Post always said (she was with me in the pulpit) she could hear my heart beat, so activly did it thump, but when I saw Mr. Cooper with his guest from Rochester (the wives did not venture to come to the church) looking as though a great catastrophe was about to happen, I lost all fear, and so conquered the timid getter-up of the meeting that at the close of the services he came to me, apologized for his inhospitable greeting, said he was proud of my success, and gave me a cordial invitation to his home, etc. I was already engaged by Mr. Gregg to go to Webster, some twelve miles, that evening, and speak for him at one of his regular appointments.

All these persons, save my constant friend, hav long since passed over the river of death, but I hav recorded this to show how much more to be dreaded and, if possible, avoided is a false friend than an open foe. Once engage in the dirty work of injuring one who does not believe in your creed, and the work grows apace, and, worse than all else, such persons come to really think they are doing God a service for which they shall merit and obtain a high seat in heaven.

In the autumn of that year Mrs. Post proposed that we should go to Michigan, and attend the annual convention of the Western Antislavery Society, and so find and plan work for the winter; and now commences my most arduous work for the slave.

The convention was held in a small town some fifteen or twenty miles west of Detroit, not at that time on the line of any railroad, so we were obliged to stay in that city over-night and find an early conveyance in the morning.

Mrs. Post, always fertil in resources, suggested that we hunt up some of the colored people of the city, quite a number of whom she had entertained at home; so we went into a barber's shop, where we found a good-looking, intelligent mulatto, who, learning our names and business, invited us to go to his house, where he said we would find his wife, who would be glad to entertain us as long as we desired to stay in Detroit, adding that Mrs. Bibb, the widow of the Rev. Henry Bibb, was a boarder in their family. I think Mr. Bibb deserves some little notice here, as he was a somewhat notable man, and the first colored man whom I ever heard speak from pulpit or platform. He made his escape from slavery, was retaken, and subjected to a punishment, for the awful crime of trying to be a freeman, that would shame a savage. An iron ring, stuck thick with sharp-pointed nails, was put about his neck and welded together. The ring was so small and close that the least turning of the head in any way would cause these points to bore into the flesh. Such was his equipment for day and night. The master was a Christian man, deacon of the Presbyterian church in the place.

The region of the South where Mr. Bibb was held as a slave was at this time greatly troubled by horse-thieves, and a company of them, visiting the town for the purpose of buying horses (as they said), came to see the deacon's stables. They were so shocked at the cruelty displayed that they immediately decided to buy the slave—the deacon agreeing to make the price low on account of the light color of his victim, which, as he said, made him less valuable.

The bargain was made; Bibb was taken to a blacksmith shop, and the iron collar cut from his neck, the horse-thieves taking good care in a few days to possess themselvs of horseflesh from this good Christian's stable, to cover the expense of their purchase. They were very kind to their man, but told him they could not afford to giv him his freedom without making something out of him, and that they would sell him to some one who would treat him well, compared to the treatment he had received from his former master, and that before they should sell him they would teach him to escape from slavery, and put himself beyond being retaken, all of which they did. Mr. Bibb became a reverend, and quite a successful business man, and died leaving some considerable property to his widow, a beautiful and accomplished woman.

To return to our journey, we found a more than comfortable home with our new acquaintances, Agnes and William Wallace. They were fugitivs of some ten years' standing, always fearing arrest. In the ten years Mr. Wallace had bought and paid for a pretty cottage on Congress street, and Mrs. Wallace had furnished it by the use of her needle. It was not only comfortable in the furnishing, but there were many elegancies that very few of the working people of that day felt able to supply themselvs with. Such people were slaves by the laws of many of the states, and the United States laws protected the states, and returned the fleeing bondman, and the church said, "Amen; 'tis according to scripture. Paul sent back Onesimus; why shall we dispute the law of God?" Mrs. Wallace proposed that we should come back to Detroit after the close of the convention to which we were going, and we agreed to do so. We found a conveyance to our meeting, arriving rather late in the afternoon. We were both of us strangers to most of the meeting. Henry C. Wright, an Eastern man, whom Mrs. Post had frequently entertained, was there, but he seemed hardly to notice us. He was talking of the angels, like a new convert to the church. He could think of nothing but Spiritualism. Mr. Wright did not trouble himself about us, not even sufficiently to introduce us, but at last a Mr. DeGarmo, who was a former resident of Rochester, discovered Mrs. Post, and soon found a home for us with his sister and husband, who were residents of the place. Here I found the Boston Investigator, as also the Liberator, Mr. Garrison's paper.

This family were ready to embrace Spiritualism when the proof should come to them; but I think it never came—never while I knew them. We had very earnest discussions concerning the subjects which the meeting was to entertain. Marius Robinson was present, from Ohio, a man almost ethereal in his make-up. He was one of the "Lane Seminary boys," studying under Dr. Beecher, who left that institution on account of the position its president held toward the antislavery cause.

Mr. Robinson gave up his anticipations of the pulpit, became an earnest worker for emancipation, and edited for some years the Antislavery Bugle, a very respectable paper published in Salem, Ohio, the organ of the Western society.

This man, whom to look upon, one would be impressed with his goodness, was set upon by a mob some few years before, while lecturing for the slave's cause, tarred and feathered, and left to die if not able to remove himself from the solitary place of his persecution. So long a time elapsed before his discovery and rescue that his death seemed imminent. He was very sick, for many months confined to his bed, and never recovered his wonted health. This man was not at all inclined to giv up this meeting to Spiritualism. He, with Mrs. Post and myself, loudly opposed the whole thing. This was the beginning of hostilities, so to speak, with the Spiritualists of Michigan and myself.

I was appointed by the Western society as their agent, and so advertised, but had to pay my own expenses and make my own salary. Not a very bright outlook for earning a living for the home in Rochester, but I had succeeded so well in three months that the American Antislavery Society, its headquarters in Boston, being informed that I had kept myself employed, paying my own way, sent me a commission to work for them, guaranteeing my expenses, and a small salary, at the same time charging me to use diligence (in all ways) to make my collections cover the expenses.

I had asked that society to employ me when I decided to go West, but my Rochester friends had sent them word that I would fail (I had more than one of that kind of friend there), and so had failed to get an appointment. It was a great satisfaction to be told by the general agent at the end of the year that my work had cost the society, in expenses, much less than any other one in the field. I did not tell him what was true, that when not able to find people sufficiently friendly to the cause to entertain me for the cause's sake, I never allowed myself the luxury of more than one meal a day, or a fire in my room, no matter though the thermometer marked many degrees below zero. If reformers were a little less like other people, and would put aside their jealousies and fears that some other one would be a little more popular than themselvs, and so not be guilty of suggesting that there might be improprieties in the conduct of such a one, the work for the world would be more easily done. But we are all as yet very imperfect, we shall learn by and by, let us hope.

LUCY N. COLMAN.

From Florida.

FORT MYERS, FLA., Feb. 15, 1887.—It may interest some of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to get a word from this far-off "summer-land." We arrived here from the "cold regions" some ten days since, and found June weather here, and it has continued quite uniformly ever since.

This place is the farthest south of any considerable settlement on the main-land of Florida. The inhabitants are mainly from the East and Northwest, there being but few nativs of Florida here, except the colored and the Seminoles, whose reservation is some distance inland, but some of whom often come to the white man's market with venison and other products of the chase or of their primitiv industries.

This climate is the finest you can conceive. There are clouds which relieve the monotony of a continuous "shine," but which never cast a pall of gloom; and there are constant breezes from the Gulf and ocean which render the almost vertical sun of June and July tolerable to bear, they say. At the latter month, I am told, their rainy season commences, which must, I should suppose, mix the heat and wet in somewhat uncomfortable proportions. This side of the Caloosahatchie is supposed to be below the frost line, yet last winter Jack Frost made a raid some distance below it, and his traces can be seen here now in the stumps and shortened limbs of the cocoanut, mango, and even guava-trees. This year he came quite down to the river, but did not cross at this point, where the river indeed is really an arm of the Gulf, or rather of Charlotte Harbor. This harbor is a beautiful sheet of water, interspersed with islands, but the shores are low, and the country low, and the soil sandy, but quite productiv. Henry George has hardly been heard of in this region, but everywhere people are complaining that the land is forestalled, that advancement is checked and, in many places, wholly suspended by the arbitrary refusal of large proprietors to sell at rates possible to be paid. It is but a brief period since nearly all the land in Florida was public land. Now little or no available land is open to entry under the homestead law. The management of the public lands in this state might be said to be exceptionally villainous only that it is merely different in detail from that in the other states and territories. Wherever the bona fide settler goes in search of land, he finds it in the hands of parties who hav anticipated his purpose and blocked his way, and such action is sanctioned by the laws of the state or general government. It seems to me this speaks poorly for a state control of the land, since in all modern states the land, originally owned by the state, has been quite generally given up to private commercial ownership. This, but for a circumstance hereafter explained, would be something astonishing, since, as a question of commerce, no profit can possibly arise from the purchase and sale of land. To place a price upon land adds nothing to its productivness or to the exchange of commerce, begets no supply, and creates no demand for any production of labor. It would, of course, operate as a bar to those who sought to apply their labor and had not means to purchase; that is all. For, whatever price is put upon the land originally, or subsequently added, in whatever speculativ appreciation, adds nothing to the general wealth, nor even to the wealth of the land-holders themselvs, taken as a whole, since control of the land of a country, such as will maintain a monopoly, can only be effected at a great loss to some, especially those who attempt to carry on speculations by the use of credit. Commercial transactions, taken as a whole, tend to equilibrium, i.e., the profits, over and above appropriate remuneration of services, form an equation with losses. This cannot be otherwise. And why this proposition is ever thoughtlessly questioned is because we hav before us the immense fortunes which a few acquire through careful or fortunate improvement of the ebb and flow of the trade currents, while the losses, however well noted at the moment, at once disappear, leaving not even a wreck behind.

That this same principle holds true in regard to traffic in land no one familiar with real estate operations will question. In any matter of gaming, there must be as many gains as losses, and as great amounts of one as of the other. I know, for instance, a family in southern Ohio, whose ancestor took up a considerable tract of land when it was the "Northwest Territory." They hav been selling land ever since, but seldom bought any, except under foreclosure. They hav now—the fourth generation—more land, at least in pecuniary value, than ever before, and are largely wealthy in improvements, buildings, and also in shares and bonds. All these values, however, so far as they hav been derived from the trade in land, hav been obtained from the losses of those who hav attempted to obtain homes, or carry lands on speculation, but whose selling has been in the main compulsory, and so at a loss, and which the successful holder has been thus, and only thus, enabled to add to his stock. One family has made profits; a thousand, losses.

As an illustration of this, and of the folly of efforts at curing the land evil by taxing away its profits, when there were really none to tax, I will state that in one of the counties north of this, I noticed an advertisment of two hundred and eighty-five farms and lots to be sold for taxes. Doubtlesss some of these were taxes neglected by oversight, and due from non-residents who were able to pay; but a large proportion of those are due by persons "declining the business" of dealing in lands, because compelled to do so from economic causes. Where land is able to be rented, either with or without improvements, there seems to be an increment to the credit or profit side, to be sure, but it must be remembered that this is largely balanced by the interest paid upon land credits, and that what is not thus balanced is really a time purchase, an instalment, as it were, of the purchase price, and represents very closely, if not identically, the interest upon such price, and can but show that, as in all other games of chance, losses form an equation with gains, however they may be shared.

The deduction seems plain, then, that the body of the people hav no interest in land traffic, more than in any other system of gaming, and that it is a grave mistake to giv it the sanction of public law.

On our way to Florida we stopped at Washington, and "did" some of the public shows. We attended the woman's meetings, both Suffrage and Temperance. We listened with a good deal of interest to Mrs. Neymann, Mrs. Colby, Mrs. Wallace (mother of Gen. Wallace), Miss Frances E. Willard, Mrs. Whitehall Smith, and, last but not least, Mrs. Isabella Beecher-Hooker. The movement in both directions has evidently not only come to stay, but to make a home for itself. It seems quite probable, as you hav pointed out, that the woman's ballot may not only help on the prohibition movement, but also the God-in-the-Constitution craze; but although I hav heretofore shared this fear, I now think that the God which they will help put into the Constitution will not be the mere masculin Jehovah of the Jews, but rather the Elohim of Genesis, embracing "Mother Nature" as well as "Father Spirit."

The hierarchy of the eclesiastical institutions, no doubt, perceive that the enfranchisment of the woman means the abdication of their supremacy, and so consistently oppose it. Woman's subjection in the church is assured so long as inferiority in rights is maintained in the state. The real priest is constitutionally opposed to her civil emancipation. Many ministers, however, whose noble manhood underlies their theological conceptions, join heartily in the movement, indifferent to consequences. Doubtless in the minds of some there is a purpose, also consistent with the priestly rôle, to turn it to religious account by guiding a movement which can be no longer directly resisted. But whoever has listened to Miss Willard, Mrs. Smith, Mrs. Wallace, or Mrs. Hooker, will become satisfied that the enfranchisment of woman, in civil and secular affairs, will necessarily lead to her supremacy in the church, where she far outranks the other sex in number and in zeal.

Of course, this will not be attained without a terrific struggle with the male supremacy which now dominates the ruling sects. The Catholic church has already a woman among its immaculately conceived divinities, a "mother of God," and numerous dead women elevated as saints; but its entire living hierarchy is composed of men, celibates at that, who are divorced as far as possible from human ties, and direct relation to posterity. Now, the woman's movement is especially a human one, and the religion to which it leads is one in which humanity will no longer be sacrificed to the theological idea; but the theological conception will prevail which is best calculated to lift and ennoble humanity. The fact that all the leading minds in this movement are taking a deep interest in the labor and economical reforms is proof of this position. Not only are the ladies who are conspicuous for their religious fervor earnest investigators of the labor question, but the more Liberal and even skeptical of them are evincing the same interest.

While, therefore, I attach little importance to the ballot in the hands of man or woman, as anything more than an educational experiment, and am unable to understand how a truth or natural law can be determined by "a show of hands," I am deeply interested in this rebellion of woman, more for what it promises to lead to than for what it distinctly proposes. ## The Jewish and Christian Fiddle.

To F. W. Beardsley, Dear Sir: Your letter dated Birmingham, Connecticut, February 16th, came to hand via the editor of The Truth Seeker.

I receive a great many letters; some from men who are not honest—they do not mean what they say; they are hypocrits, wolves in sheep's clothing; they claim to be what they are not; they pretend to be Liberals, when I know they are working in the interest of the church. I take such men and shake 'em up, then giv them an airing, then roll them under my foot, and then sit down on them—sometimes hard. But you seem to be an honest inquirer, and, as such, are entitled to due consideration.

As to your first question, "Where does John Peck get his authority in reference to the crucified savior Christna? I hav seen the name spelled Crishna and Krishna, but I never saw it spelled Christna. The name is pronounced Kreeshnah."

The authority in regard to the Hindoo savior Crishna will be found in "The History of the Christian Religion," by Charles B. Waite, and in "Sixteen Crucified Saviors," by Kersey Graves, in Taylor's "Syntagma," and in a number of other works.

These works can all be obtained at The Truth Seeker office, and I commend them to your notice. Perhaps they may reveal things to you which you never thought of before.

In regard to the second question, "Where, in the Bible, does it say that death ends all, or something similar?" I hav to say that I am not aware that I ever made the statement that the sentence "death ends all" could be found in the Bible.

But the sense of the sentence can be found in the Bible, if not the sentence: "As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away, so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more. . . . And thou shalt seek me in the morning, but I shall not be" (Job vii, 9, 21).

"But man dieth and wasteth away, yea, he giveth up the ghost, and where is he? As the water faileth from the sea, and the flood decayeth and drieth up, so man lieth down and riseth not till the heavens be no more; they shall not awake nor be raised out of their sleep" (Job xiv, 10, 13).

"The wicked shall not be." "The wicked shall perish, . . . and be as the fat of lambs; they shall consume; into smoke shall they consume away" (Psalm xxxvii, 10, 20).

"For that which befalleth man befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them; as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they hav all one breath, so that man hath no preëminence over the beast, for all is vanity. All go unto one place, all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again. Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth?" (Eccl. iii, 19, 20, 21.)

There are many other passages of the same import, but I hav not the time to look them up. I hav given you sufficient to show you that any doctrin can be proved by the Bible. It has been said that the Bible is like an old fiddle—any tune can be played on it. The violin has been pronounced the king of instruments because it affords the greatest variety of sounds. But the number is scarcely greater than the different doctrins which can be established by the Bible.

It teaches love and hatred, war and peace. It encourages the use of wine and strong drink, and forbids it. It teaches honesty, and recommends the selling of tainted meat. It teaches the love of parents and the hatred of parents; the love of children and the hatred of children, even the eating of them. It teaches monogamy and polygamy. It commands virtue and then consigns young virgins to the lustful embrace of a brutalized soldiery. In brief, there is no end to the absurdities, abominations, and contradictions of the Bible.

Read it for yourself, with your eyes open! You will find it one of the most convincing Freethought documents which has ever been published. Hoping this may prove satisfactory, I am, Respectfully yours, John Peck.

Why Am I Not a Christian?

REPLY NO. II. TO THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

Gentlemen: After reading your card asking why I am not a Christian, I sent it to the Rev. J. E. Richards, who once sued me for expressing my honest opinion as to his religious belief. And let us hope that it will do him much good. Christ was put to death for having expressed his honest opinions, and I was sued for having expressed my honest opinions. When I look back at the record of professed Christians and see how bad they hav been, it almost makes me shudder to look at a church.

According to Lord's "Modern History," a work used in our public schools, the Catholic church used to sell indulgences—that is, the right to commit sin. And its business agent said: "There is no sin so great that the indulgence cannot remit it. Even repentance is not necessary; indulgences save not the living only, they save the dead." "The very moment that the money clinks against the bottom of this chest, the soul escapes from purgatory and flies to heaven."

Now, gentlemen, as bad as the Catholics were and their religion is, it is better than your religion. They pray for the dead; you do not. They are willing to giv a man a chance in the next world by praying his soul out of purgatory; but if your mother is in hell you let her alone. You profess to believe in prayer, but you will neither pray for her release nor pay a minister to ask God to let her out. You say that Christ cast out devils; but he did not cast them back into hell—he was willing that they should remain out where they could get a little fresh air. Don't you think that your mothers, if in hell, ought to hav a little fresh air sometimes? Christ was so good that he never hurt anyone, not even the devil, when he had a chance. He is said to hav forgiven a thief and a band of unbelieving murderers who took his life for the reason that they did not believe him to be the son of God. And yet, you insult the memory of Christ by supposing that he who was willing to forgiv unbelieving murderers will damn or has damned your unbelieving good mothers. And you want to know why I am not a Christian?

The church always has run everything, and to-day it tries to run our public schools. It has more cheek than honesty, and no respect for the rights of others. Let me giv my views on the Bible-in-school question, which were published in the Evening Journal:

THE BIBLE IN SCHOOL.

Sir: I see by the Journal that "Mt. Clemens has been agitating itself over the Bible-in-the-public-schools question, and the teachers hav lent their aid to continue the unsettled state of affairs by requiring the pupils to vote upon the subject. The returns showed 441 in favor of reading the book; 36 against it, and several who didn't care anything about it."

Now, it is evident from the above article, taken from the Journal, that the teachers hav influenced those children how to vote, and if so, they hav shown themselvs unfit for the positions which they occupy. In school they should attend strictly to the things in this world, and let the clergy, church, and Sunday-schools do the looking after the things in the next world. Protestants would object to the Catholic Bible, and the Catholics object to the Protestant Bible, and others object to the running a school in the interest of any sectarian church or religion.

All religions and all Bibles are sectarian, and the law has settled the question of sectarianism, and settled it fairly and squarely, by saying, "The legislature shall make no laws to compel any person to pay tithes, taxes, or other rates for the support of any minister of the gospel or teacher of religion" (Article 4, section 29, of the constitution of the state of Michigan). Now, when a teacher reads a religious lesson, he is a teacher of religion, and if he reads it in school, he is a violator of the law, for the law says that he shall not do it.

And we find these words on page 17 of the General School Laws for 1885: "No school district shall apply any of the moneys received by it from the primary school interest fund, or from any and all other sources, for the support and maintenance of any school of a sectarian character."

Now, the Catholic, the Protestant, and all Bibles and religions are sectarian, and the overriding of the constitutional rights of the tax-payer caused a most scandalous law-suit at St. Johns, another law-suit at Lowell, and it has been a bone of contention at many places for years. In place of discord, there should be harmony in the school district, and if the teacher, in place of a religious lesson, would giv a temperance lesson and point out and explain the effect of alcohol on the human stomach, it would be better for the school, and no one justly could find fault with such a course.

St. Johns, Mich., Jan. 7, 1887. M. Babcock.

Gentlemen, you should hav a better opinion of Christ than to believe that he would cast out a lot of devils and then send them to drive a drove of hogs to water, where the devils could get a drink, and then believe that he will cast your unbelieving good mothers into hell, where they will hav to try to do without water forever and ever. M. Babcock.

News and Notes.

The Chess brothers, Garden City, Kansas, are a couple of Michigan boys, full of the pioneer spirit and enthusiasm for humanity. It was they who began the campaign in this frontier town, which, in two years, can boast of the graces of an Eastern city, so rapid has been its advancement in wealth and prosperity. Our friends did not know but they would be alone in the battle, but they soon, on carefnl inquiry, discovered a large and influential number of Liberal minded men and women who were interested in the expression of Freethought, so that the Opera House was secured for the occasion, and it was nearly filled with one of the most appreciativ audiences I hav addressed.

Mr. H. C. St. John, a leading lawyer of the place, a son of ex-Governor St. John, is a thorough-going Liberal, keen and clear as a northern breeze. He has his father's reformatory ability, but not any of his orthodoxy. I enjoyed the hospitality of himself and wife, and brother, Mr. J. P. St. John and wife, and I was delighted with the company of such genial and progressiv minds, who see the bright and intellectual side of life, and take the world at its best.

Another stanch Liberal is G. A. Kimball, who, in the Western phrase, has the "sand;" who puts his colors out with great determination and stands by them no matter what the consequence. It was his slendid generosity, with that of the Chess brothers, that made the success of our work here so brilliant and promising.

Dr. Frank Cartwright, Mrs. Wilma E. Cartwright aud his wife, Dr. Dodd Cartwright, J. A. Garver, Grant Stanley, Charles McGill, Albert Rigrish, A. S. Parsons, Fred Finnup, Wm. Inge, Wm. Householder, D. R. Widmer, and others of these pioneer ranks display the courage and frankness of thought which is so inspiring in these Western communities.

I had a much larger audience on the second evening than on the first, and I look for a live society here. Garden City is a kind of miraculous evidence of abounding Western pluck and audacity. Lots hav gone up from $40 to $3,000 in two years, and some pretty big fortunes hav been made, and still the wheel goes rolling on, and a bigger jump than ever is expected in the spring. Western Kansas seems to be the Eldorado of the tide of emigration this year. The prairie schooners by the thousand are floating on, and many of them will ride at anchor on these beautiful plains.

My Freethought friend, Morris Collar, of Dodge City, who is one of the leading citizens of that place, and has a most elegant residence on the outskirts, has laid out an addition to that growing city, and named its avenues Voltaire, Paine, Bruno, and Bennett; so hereafter, as we drive our teams along this dashing metropolis, we shall greet the Freethought signals. Only think of the luxury of driving 2:40 down Voltaire avenue, or racing nip and tuck on the Bruno boulevard, or beating the wind on the Bennett road with the clattering hoof, or riding through Paine street in a coach and six. Happy times are coming, and I thank friend Collar for his delightful suggestions. Our very highways shall proclaim the glories of human endeavor, and, in the midst of sublime memories, we'll "jump into the wagon, and all take a ride."

However, I had to wait two hours to take my ride on Thursday evening, when I bade good-bye to Garden City, with pleasant anticipations of another visit. The train was nearly two hours behind time, and I missed the train at Pueblo, and was obliged to lay over for several hours ere I could pursue my way to Denver, where I arrived at and about midnight. I tumbled to sleep as soon as I possibly could. Saturday morning dawned gloriously, although I did not catch much of a glimpse of it until about noon. What a joy it was to look upon the mighty and snow-capped peaks towering into the sparkling azure, and girt with brilliant cloud draperies, as if they had just come out of nature's most fashionable millinery, and were bent on dazzling the eye of every beholder. I like the Colorado mountains—queenly and beautiful, coquetting with the sky as they lift up their jeweled heads, and winning brightest smiles from heaven with myriad colors and wondrous, fantastic forms of beauty.

I met for a few minutes my Liberal friends, Thos. J. Truss and John G. Jenkins, and, as I found I could not fulfil my California engagements if I remained over March 13th, I was generously permitted by my Denver comrades to forego my engagement for the second Sunday in order that I might reach the Pacific coast in time. I find that San Diego is four day's ride from Denver, and here I am now over two thousand miles west of New York. Would that I had the seven-leagued boots, but I must be satisfied with the iron horse. I hope, however, for better things, and that we can harness a hurricane and go at the rate of a hundred miles an hour instead of twenty-five. Saturday afternoon in the golden, glorious sunshine alongside the splendid lofty walls of the mountains I speed to Greeley, and soon I find myself by the genial fireside of Captain Wadlia, where I feel perfectly at home, so Liberal and cordial is all the atmosphere about. In spite of many difficulties our Greeley allies keep the flag on high, floating to every breeze of heaven. Captain Wadlia has been stirring up things quite lively with several able articles in the Greeley Sun on "Church Taxation," "The Cost of Religion," etc., and there has been a newspaper battle in which the clergymen of the place hav participated, and as truth has had a fair showing, and our captain knew how to handle it, it has done some pretty effectiv work in the way of facts and figures as well as arguments.

Eular C. Stillwell is the secretary of the Union here, and knows no such word as fail. On Saturday evening there was a social meeting at her house, and we had a very pleasant time, with music, short speeches, etc. Mr. Hoagland, the Unitarian minister, joined our company with affable spirit, although not exactly on our platform yet. But in answer to my address on the Nine Demands he gave a very sensible and fair-minded discourse, and struck the keynote of the unity of Liberalism. J. W. Leighton, our earnest, Liberal worker, who was the first one to break ground in Greeley for the work of our Union, also gave a rattling speech, and also my namesake, L. L. Putnam. He has a good name, and so, of course, I think he is a good fellow, and I was glad to hav the family honor so well sustained as it was by his remarks. This Saturday night meeting was a pleasant success indeed, and made way for a full house on Sunday evening, the largest audience that has yet been present at a Freethought lecture.

Sunday morning I went to hear Mr. Hoagland. He is a thoughtful man and has fine literary ability, and it was an intellectual treat to listen to his discourse, based on transcendental philosophy, concerning the gentleness and goodness of God as a father to all. I also remained in the "Bible class," where John Fiske's latest book and Evolution were pretty thoroughly discussed, with radical differences of opinion, but with the utmost generosity of spirit. This Unitarian church, with its somewhat broad platform, an intelligent society, and a progressiv minister, is doing good work for Liberal sentiment, but a work that can by no means take the place of our deeper and more advanced labor for human liberty. The success of a Liberal Unitarian Society only renders more imperativ the organization of Secular Societies in order that the best may be attained.

Sunday evening I lectured on "The New God," which seemed to suit the cultivated men, whom I addressed, except one man, who, when I was about a quarter through, muttered, "I can't stand that," and forthwith strode out as if he thought the very lightnings of God were after him. I guess, however, he got a nervous shock that will giv him a little mental illumination.

They are having quite a revival at the Baptist church. A young man is here who talks quite vigorously, especially in regard to hell-fire and the awfulness of Infidelity. In fact, he is so vigorous that he insulted with his remarks a class of young ladies in the Sunday-school last Sabbath, and with one accord they all arose and left. The remark he made I would not publish in "News and Notes," nor some other things he has said. I went to his prayer-meeting yesterday, Monday afternoon. Dear me, what a mental displeasure it was to listen to those reverberations of superstition! In the evening I took in the regular revival services. His sermon was the most picturesque bosh I ever endured. It reminded me of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S suggestiv illustrations. He spoke quite familiarly of the evening devotions in the ark, of "Mr. and Mrs. Noah," as if he were there on that occasion. "Mrs. Noah!"—that struck me like a blizzard. I suppose this young gentleman must hav received her card. He spoke of "Mr. Noah's" devotions—why did he not say something about "Mr. Noah's" spree when Mr. Noah found himself safe on dry land. I am sure it would hav added piquancy to his discourse. He spoke of little, insignificant Zaccheus "setting" on a tree, and "sidling" down to the feet of Jesus. I wonder if thus this theological gosling was hatched. Good luck to him! I believe he is doing more damage to Christianity than I can do.

I hav had quite a varied amount of entertainment and amusement since I hav been in Greeley. I feel as if I had almost circumnavigated the universe.

I hav enjoyed, along with my visit with Captain and Mrs. Wadlia, the hospitality of Mr. Fred. Smith and his wife. Mr. Smith has one of the finest libraries in the state, and it is a pleasure to meet with one so well informed and who has so thoroughly mastered the scientific position and recognizes the true relations of mind and matter. Captain Boyd also is one of the best thinkers I hav met. He has traversed the whole circle of human thought from Plato to Kant and Spencer, and understands the logic of science and accepts its results.

Mr. and Mrs. M. J. Hoggarty are also advanced Liberals, who out of orthodoxy hav come to the front in the noble domain of Freethought, and I spent a happy evening in their home, from whence the black wings of superstition hav fled, and where Reason's torch is bright.

J. W. Cairns, Dr. A. L. Camp, Major Williams, Max Clark, F. B. Pollock, J. E. Billings, John Levy, Joseph Morse, A. D. Moody, Samuel Graham, Dr. Welch, L. W. Hooper, I. J. Stevens, Henry Currier, Jas. Tuckerman, and others, are among those who hold the fort in these mountain fastnesses.

I was pleased to meet Mr. York and Miss Campbell—good allies who made my way so agreeable last year at Forks Creek, with the Smith brothers, who are so ready to lend a hand for Liberalism.

Since I was here last fall, Charles Berry, the nephew of Captain Wadlia, has died. He was, at the time I met him, unwell, but cheery and enthusiastic for Freethought. He knew that he could not recover, and he went home East to his father's to die. He suffered greatly, but in the midst of all he was bright and heroic, and found his consolation in humanity itself and the beautiful thoughts of science. He met death with noble patience and without fear, and so we place the dear flower of memory over the grave of our departed comrade, whose bright companionship I shall always remember.

So I go on with courage to new fields—to Longmont, Boulder City, Denver, etc. I hope to be with friends at Prescott, Arizona, March 13th; then I hasten to National City and San Diego, Cal., March 16th, 17th, and 18th; Los Angeles, March 20th and 27th; Santa Ana, March 21st, 22d, and 23d; Norwalk, March 24th and 25th; Tulare City, March 29th and 30th; Visalia, March 31st, April 1st; San Francisco and Oakland, April 3d and 10th; San José, April 17th and 24th; Sonoma, Stockton, Sacramento, and other places in California until June 1st; Oregon in June; Washington territory, July; as heretofore noted. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Greeley, Col., Mar. 1, 1887.

The Liberal Club.

The 438th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club was held on the evening of Friday, the 4th. Mr. Wakeman presided, and Judge Jay Groo was the speaker of the evening. The badge-pin man sat by the secretary's table, and scooped in the proceedings. He noticed that the admission fee of five cents was dodged by a young man from Philadelphia, who was present for the first time, and whom Treasurer Morris gazed after more in sorrow than in anger.

Judge Groo opened his lecture with some light irrelevant talk, and baited his audience for a few minutes with chestnuts in order that they might the more readily follow him. He was not, he said, a lecturer, as the word is understood. He always talked for nothing, and paid his own expenses. This method had not proved a financial success. The lecturer had noted that despite all the work done for temperance, people continue to drink. Efforts in behalf of abstinence hav not had the desired effect. He proposed to show the extent of the evil, the causes of it, and the remedy.

The extent of the evil is this, that eight hundred millions of dollars are spent annually for liquor. Add to this the cost of the material of which liquor is manufactured, the costs of arrests for drunkenness, the asylums, the pauper-houses, charities, and loss of wages caused by drink, and we would in one year hav a sum greater than the national debt, all of which could be saved by prohibiting the sale of liquor. Six hundred thousand persons die annually from the effects of drink. Side by side, they would make a row of graves thirty-four miles long. This is 165 men per day—seven per hour. Seven men, the judge estimated, would die from the effects of drunkenness before his address was ended. If the tolling bells could be heard for each one, the ringing would be nearly continuous. If these victims of drink were to form in line and march, one man going by per minute, it would take forty-one days and forty-one nights for the procession to pass a given point.

The cause of drunkenness, the speaker maintained, was taking intoxicating liquor into the stomach. The jurisprudence of the country is responsible, because it licenses saloons. Liquor-drinking is on the increase. More is drank now than twenty-five years ago. Moral suasion and the Christian religion hav failed to produce the fullest results. Prohibition laws should be passed and enforced. The speaker closed with a reference to one Moses, and the phenomena he witnessed on the mountain, and said that there wasn't much hope for this country until its temperance laws agreed with the laws of God on the same subject.

Mr. Rosenbourgh was the first critic. He had lived in New York fifty years, and had sold liquor. These temperance lecturers all told the same stories. He had heard them first forty years ago. Mr. Rosenbourgh didn't know about that fellow Moses, but he guessed he took liquor when he could get it. Christ was a distiller, and made wine. This speaker favored high license. Proper education in the effects of over-stimulation would do more than anything else to eradicate the liquor habit.

Mr. Nichols said the favorit beverages in New England were applejack and Medford rum, and very good drinks they were, too. The controling races of the world, past and present, hav been and are users of alcoholic liquors. The finest specimens of physical manhood come from regions where drinking is practiced to the greatest extent; for instance, the blue-grass regions of Kentucky, and the lowlands of Scotland. Liquor is a necessity. Mr. Nichols believed in no license and no prohibition. There should be no restriction on the sale of so desirable and necessary an article as rum.

Mrs. Leonard took a teaspoonful of stimulant after her meals. Her grandfather drank whisky with regularity up to the advanced age of 101.

Mr. Brophy once believed in free rum, but was now a Prohibitionist.

Lawyer Chamberlain said there was a class of retailers of superstition called ministers, who dealt out a mental poison as deleterious to the mind as liquor is to the body, and these are the men back of the prohibition movement. Mr. Chamberlain saw no way of restricting the sale of liquor consistent with liberty, and would therefore favor what was called "free rum;" that is, no license and no prohibition.

Dr. Foote, Jr., believed liquor to be an unmitigated evil. He was an advocate of individual prohibition. If people were given a chance to be wicked, and still remained good, it showed a higher state of civilization than that in which they wanted to be wicked and couldn't. Take away liquor as a stimulant, and the user will generally resort to something as bad. Some teetotalers lived totally on tea. (It was several minutes before this pun dawned fully upon the audience. Then a German gentleman sitting in front thumped the floor violently with his umbrella.) Adulterated liquor, the speaker maintained, was as good as any. The worst thing in any liquor was the alcohol, and the more water added to it, the better. Drunkards generally come upon the state for support ultimately, and the legislature should get up a scheme for making liquor cost the drinker enough so that every time he indulged he would be laying up something to pay his expenses on the road to ruin.

Judge Groo remarked in closing that the critics did not seem to agree in their opposition to him. The atmosphere of the Liberal Club was different from any to which he had hitherto been accustomed, but he rather enjoyed it. In reference to the wine made by the savior, he said he would not object to Mr. Rosenbourgh manufacturing all the wine he could from cold water.

So the meeting closed. The liquor problem was not settled.

At the next meeting Mrs. Hinton will discuss the question, "What is Socialism?"

The Number of the Beast.

The beast with seven heads and ten horns, described by John the Revelator, has been the subject of a vast amount of useless study by religious dupes. Some hav believed that the number of the beast indicated the year 666 of the Christian era. Others, with more rational notions, having ascertained that the Apocalypse was probably written about A D. 68 or 69, just after the death of Nero, hav professed to find the number of the beast in the name Nero Cæsar, spelt with Hebrew letters; giving to each letter its numerical value, the product is said to be 666.

Numerous other similar solutions hav been put forth, and now comes a new one by the Rev. M. Baxter, an Advent preacher. He has issued a little pamphlet from the office of the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York, entitled, "The Great Crisis." In this he tells us that "Antichrist will be a Napoleon;" that the name Napoleon is derived from the Greek Apollyon, that is, from the Greek aorist, Apoleon, and that taking the Greek word, Napoleonti, and giving to each letter its numerical value, it foots up 666. Therefore "Antichrist must be a representativ of the Napoleon dynasty." But where is the coming "Man of Sin" to be found? Prince Louis Napoleon, though he had the number 666 contained in his name, says Mr. Baxter, was lacking in the characteristic of being "a king of fierce countenance," etc., and furthermore, the prince got killed in 1879. But the prophetic successor now exists, says Mr. Baxter, in the person of Prince Paul Jerome Bonaparte, who was born in 1823. His face is the very image of the first Napoleon, and the fatal number, 666, is discovered in the Greek nominativ for P. Jerome Napoleon; and not only in the Greek, but the Hebrew letters of that name, to wit: Pe, 80; Gimel, 3; Resh, 200; Aleph, 1; Mem, 40; Beth, 2; Aleph, 1; Nun, 50; Pe, 80; Resh, 200; Teth, 9; total, 666. The Hebrew alphabet, being practically devoid of vowels, the name as spelt out by Mr. Baxter is P. Grom Bonprt. He does not explain why he contracts Paul to P, nor why he ends Jerome's name in Greek with an e, making it Jeromee. But the omission of that e would hav made the number too small by five, and the addition of aul to the first initial, P, would hav made the number 431 too many. In expounding prophecies, you must always fit the fulfilment to the prediction, even if you hav to pervert both.

And now for the edification of all Adventists, as well as other cranks, whether Christians or skeptics, the "Man of Sin" who writes for THE TRUTH SEEKER will submit a solution of the problem of the number of the beast which is entitled to grave consideration from its antiquity. The Rev. S. Baring-Gould has translated what he calls the Second Toldoth Jeshu, a Hebrew document brought to light in 1705 by Huldrich. It givs a full account of the life and death of Jesus, the son of Miriam (Mary), by Joseph Pandira. An uncle of Jesus, named Simon Ben Kalphus (answering to Simon Kepha, of the first Toldoth Jeshu), having procured the incommunicable name (Shem Hamphoras), wrought signs and wonders just as Jesus had done. Having by this means become a leader of the sect, he sat on a tower and wrote commandments. The narrativ then proceeds:

> And Simon composed for the deception of the people of Ai lying books, and he called them "Avonkelajon" (Evangelium). . . . He also wrote books in the name of the disciples of Jeshu, and especially in that of Johannes (John), and said that Jeshu had given them these.
> But with special purpose he composed the Book of Johannes (the Apocalypse), for the men of Ai thought it contained mysteries, whereas it contained pure invention. For instance, he wrote in the Book of Johannes that Johannes saw a beast with seven heads and seven (ten) horns and seven crowns, and the name of the beast was blasphemy, and the number of the beast was 666. Now the seven heads mean the seven letters which compose the words, "Jeshu of Nazareth" And in like manner the number 666 is that which is the sum of the letters composing his name.

Mr. Baring-Gould has not given the seven Hebrew letters answering to "Jesus of Nazareth," but the "Man of Sin" has ascertained them. Their English equivalent is Jshu Natzr, and the names and numerical values of the Hebrew letters are, Yod, 10; Shin, 300; Vau, 6; Nun, 50; Yod, 10; Tsaddi, 90; Resh, 200; total, 666.

The authenticity or great antiquity of this document we will not pretend to vouch for, but it is perhaps about as truthful as any of the rest concerning Christ and Christianity, and it purports to hav been written by Rabbi Jochanan, son of Saccai, in Jerusalem (see Rev. of Ant., pp. 394–413).

Mr. Baxter announces that Christ is coming about the year 1900, or a little sooner, and is sure that within thirteen years all of us will be either in heaven or hell.

ANTICHRIST.

A Decided and Sound Opinion.

From the New York Tribune.

The punishment of two years' imprisonment and a fine of $500 for selling a copy of Balzac's "Contes Drolatiques" and a copy of the "Heptameron," inflicted on a New Jersey bookseller, has no relation to either justice or equity. In the first place, it was preposterous to class these books with the kind of literature intended to be prohibited by the law, and the charge smells loudly of gross ignorance or malignity. It was not to lay base traps for booksellers that Anthony Comstock was commissioned, and such work as this can only bring his office into disrepute. It is difficult to know what to think of the jury that convicted in such a case and the judge who passed such a sentence upon such a conviction, but there need be no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the cause of public morals is injured, not supported, by such flagrant abuse of the law. It is, however, to be hoped that this really monstrous case of tyranny and injustice will decide the New York legislature to pass the bill now before it making it a penal offense to entice anyone into committing a breach of the law for the purpose of procuring evidence on which to prosecute.

SENATOR MURPHY'S BILL.

"A person who commits or participates in any act which would make him an accessory of the crime if the act committed were a felony, is a principal and may be indicted and punished as such, and any person who without specific written authority from the district-attorney of the county in which the crime is committed or attempted, entices, solicits, induces, or aids another to commit such crime, is a principal, and may be punished as such."

The Marriage of Catholics on the Pacific Coast.

From the California Spirit of the Times.

DEARLY BELOVED: Appointed by the Vicar of Christ, as we are, to watch over your spiritual welfare—nay, placed by the Holy Ghost, though most unworthy on our part, to govern you in religious matters, having, moreover, to giv an account of your souls to the divine judge—we are constrained by a sense of duty and responsibility to address you some words of admonition. For, although we are aware that many among you are dutiful children of the church, and delight in revering and obeying its holy laws, there are others (but we trust they are few) who imagin that the church is too rigid, and that they are at liberty to dispense themselvs from its rules—to obey or disobey. But the church, like Christ, is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever; it is the same here as in other parts of the world; its sacred laws, enacted under the guidance of the divine spirit, are as binding here as in any other place.

Therefore we deprecate the haste of those who, when about to marry, will not giv timely notice to their pastors, nor wait for due publication of the bans; we heartily deplore the bad dispositions of those who, under the guilt of mortal sin, receive the holy sacrament of matrimony without any religious preparation; and we sincerely regret the negligence of those who fail to obtain for themselvs the treasure of the nuptial benediction as a pledge of the favor and protection of heaven. But, above all, we condemn, as fraught with the most disastrous consequences, the rashness of those who recklessly make matrimonial engagements without carefully examining whether in the persons of their choice are found the qualities required in good husbands or wives. Now, among the qualities which a Catholic should seek in a companion before matrimonial engagement, and, in fact, before beginning or contemplating any mutual affection, is the incomparable treasure of the Catholic faith. Hence, the church abhors, and has ever abhorred, mixed marriages. She does not allow them to be celebrated inside of her temples, nor with her sacred vestments, nor with the imparting of any blessing. And this attitude, and these laws of the church, are founded on very obvious reasons. For, leaving aside those happy instances in which the non-Catholic party respects in the Catholic the right of the free exercise of religion and of the Catholic education of the offspring, and treating the question on its own merits, it is evident, in the first place, that the faith of the Catholic is naturally liable to be weakened, if not seriously injured, by the absence of all faith, or a different belief, in the other party. In the second place, the want of the Catholic example, and frequently the actual non-Catholic and sometimes anti-Catholic exertions of one parent must naturally or necessarily damp, materially injure, or wholly paralyze the faith of the offspring. It also often happens that before the children are sufficiently old to understand and practice their religion the Catholic parent is carried away by death; and in this case it cannot reasonably be expected that the surviving parent who does not value the Catholic faith for himself, will take much interest at all in securing it to the children. Would to heaven that said experience did not corroborate these reasons, and that we were never called on to mourn over the deplorable results which we hav pointed out.

Hence, every Catholic young man and young woman should calmly and seriously reflect on this before entertaining the thought of even the possibility of an engagement, and should also take counsel, in due time, of parents and respectiv pastors. Instead of doing so, there are some Catholics who, despising the authority of the church of Jesus Christ, and almost abjuring their faith, apply for the celebration of their marriage to a civil officer or Protestant minister, not only exposing themselvs thereby to make a contract which has no force before God and consequently does not prevent their intercourse from being a "horrible concubinage," but also committing really a sin or sacrilege—partaking of the enormity of a sacrilegious communion received at the hands of a minister or a magistrate. This language may appear strong, but we fear it is scarcely strong enough to awaken the indifferent Catholic to a sense of his duty—the only object we hav in view.

We therefore ordain: First, that the pastor, unless authorized by the ordinary, shall not assist at the marriage of those who will not hav applied to him at least three days previous to their marriage; second, that none can be married without having furnished due vouchers for their freedom, and, when both parties are Catholics, without the due publication of the bans; third, that in no case whatever can a Catholic be married by any other person than a priest without subjecting himself to excommunication; fourth, that when the parties are entitled to the nuptial benediction the pastors shall see that the special mass for that benediction shall accompany or follow the celebration of the marriage; fifth, that as the holy see teaches, there must be a grave cause for a dispensation for a mixed marriage, and that the usual promises must be made, otherwise it would be a grievous sin to contract.

Finally, we direct that this circular be read from the altar at high or low mass and vespers on the first Sunday of Advent every year in all the churches of the province.

Yours, sincerely, in Christ,

PATRICK W. RIORDAN, Archbishop of San Francisco.
FRANCES, Bishop of Monterey and Los Angeles.
PATRICK, Bishop of Grass Valley.

From the Roman Catholic Monitor.

The laws of the Catholic church concern Catholics alone—and no one else. All Catholics are bound to believe, with St. Paul, that "marriage is a great sacrament," whilst a vast multitude of those outside the church may look upon marriage as merely a temporary union of two people to last just as long as it suits the taste and convenience of either party to stay out of the divorce court. Non-Catholics, therefore, marry, remarry, and intermarry, as often as they meet with any person foolish enough to go into a limited partnership with them—but no Catholic can thus transgress the law of God and the church without being guilty of mortal sins which bring eternal damnation upon the unfortunate soul thus stained.

THE anniversary of Modern Spiritualism will be celebrated by an eight days' reunion at Greenwood Hall, Cincinnati, beginning March 27th and continuing through April 3d. Two meetings per day will be held, excepting on Sundays and on March 31st, on each of which dates there will be held three meetings. This reunion will be under the joint auspices of the Society of Union Spiritualists, of Cincinnati, Ohio, and the Southern Association of Spiritualists. Address all correspondence to G. W. Kates, secretary, Chattanooga, Tenn.

MATILDA JOSLYN GAGE writes of Mrs. Slenker's "Little Lessons for Little Folks:" "I was pleased to receive 'Little Lessons,' which I consider a valuable little work. I am always glad when science is taught children in a comprehensible manner. It is a safeguard against false beliefs. I was especially glad of the chapter upon fresh air. There is incalculable ignorance upon this subject. People do not begin to know of the poisonous qualities of impure air, which not only destroys human life, but will decay wood. The old houses of Parliament were rendered so weak by foul air that a hammer could be driven through the largest beam in consequence. Air is life. The higher a nation rises in civilization the more pure air it requires. I thank you for having published the little book, and for giving me an opportunity to see it."

Freethought in Australia.

Among Australian Freethinkers there is probably no event of greater interest than the Freethought conference which is held each year in one of the chief cities. The fourth of these annual assemblages was held during the latter part of last month, and proved as interesting as its predecessors. Resolutions were passed favoring Sir Alfred Stephens's Divorce Extension bill, the compilation of a new Secular song-book for Freethought Sunday-schools, coöperativ effort to effect the repeal of blasphemy and heresy laws and laws concerning oaths, legislation for the relief of female shop assistants, taxation of church property, and a few other matters. It was resolved, among other things:

That a sub-committee (resident in Sydney and Melbourne) be appointed, with full power to take such steps as they may deem necessary to secure the amalgamation of the Secular societies of Australia for the engagement of lecturers and for propagandist purposes.

Another resolution (and it was one upon which opinions were somewhat divided) was submitted by the Melbourne Anarchists' Club, and ran as follows:

That the various Freethought associations of Australasia be recommended to incorporate in their "Objects" the following resolution, adopted by the National Secular Society at their Annual Conference, held at Glasgow, on the 13th June last, viz.: "Secularism affirms that progress is only possible through liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech."

The motion was carried by a two-thirds majority, upon the important word, "fullest," having been struck out. After the conference, a deputation appointed from the delegates waited upon the minister of justice for the purpose of securing an alteration in the law relating to oaths and affirmations. They were promised that their wishes should be met as far as possible. An important step will in all probability be taken shortly by the amalgamation of the Australasian Secular Association (N. S. W. branch) with the Liberal Association (New South Wales). A motion to that effect was submitted to the conference, and a special meeting of the latter association will be held next month to decide the question.

Previous to the conference, and during Mr. Joseph Symes's visit to Sydney, the blue-coated gentry of that place attempted to exert a little of their customary domineering authority by taking steps to prevent him from re-delivering a lecture on "Phallic Worship." The meeting having been arranged for, and the Oddfellows' Hall having been applied for for the purpose, the Freethinkers learnt to their surprise that the police, hearing of the proposed re-delivery of the lecture, interviewed the secretary of the institution, and informed him that if the lecture were delivered, the license should be forfeited. It subsequently transpired that the police had made this attempt at intimidation entirely on their own authority; and having been cautioned against a repetition of their meddlesomeness, the lecture was delivered without further trouble.

Politics and piety got awkwardly complicated a few weeks ago. It happened in this manner: A Sydney firm shipped twenty Bibles to Melbourne, and upon their arrival there they were found to be a "pirated edition" of the "revised version," and not allowed to circulate in the British dominions. It appears that the author of the work had granted or sold the copyright to the Oxford and Cambridge universities, and the copies in question being non-copyrighted American editions, dare not pass through the Custom House. Here arose the difficulty. Literature confiscated by this wondrous institution is consigned to the flames, as the copies of the Freethinker were treated two or three years ago; but how could they possibly burn God's non-copyright edition of his "word" in that manner? The idea was too terrible. A happy thought occurred to the pious official, and instead of allowing the precious volumes to be destroyed he had them re-shipped to Sydney. But in spite of such laudable precautions, the divine author appears to hav repented his having allowed this tranaction to hav progressed so far, and probably considering modern international copyright laws of superior import to ancient revelations which hav long been exposed, he thought it best to "square" matters, and accordingly wrecked the unfortunate vessel which carried them.

A notice recently appeared in the Liberator, announcing the contemplated formation, on an extensiv scale, of a Freethought book depot. Although Mr. Symes appended a note to the effect that it "is a move in the right direction, and it is to be hoped will meet with the success it deserves," the announcement appears to hav been premature, for nothing further has been heard of it.

An effort has recently been made to suppress the Liberator, a petition having been presented to the legislature, numerously signed, and calling upon them to either stamp it out by existing law, or, failing that, to specially legislate it out of existence. The petitioners received the usual information, to the effect that the matter would receive consideration; and there the affair has ended.

There has been a deal of fluttering in the Roman Catholic dove-cotes during the past few weeks, Miss Edith O'Gorman, the "escaped nun" from America, being on a lecturing tour through the colonies, much to the satisfaction of the Protestant section of the community. In New South Wales party feeling ran high, and the Orangemen and their Roman rivals broke out in activ riot.

Mr. W. W. Collins, who recently paid Melbourne a short visit, is lecturing again in Sydney; and Mr. Thomas Walker is busy combating theology in Queensland. Mr. Picton, the lecturer for the Sydney Christian Evidence Society, is also in the latter colony, and between the two religious excitement is a little warmer than is usual in that sultry climate.

There has been little Freethought news arriving from New Zealand of late, owing principally to the suspension, or rather cessation, of the Rationalist. Without a representativ newspaper a body is apt to soon become disorganized. There is little prospect, however, of such a fate befalling the Freethought societies of "Maoriland." Mr. Joseph Evison, the editor of the Rationalist, is already bringing out a new paper, which is to be entitled the Liberal, and which promises to be superior if possible to its predecessor. Iconoclastic theology is not to monopolize the space to the detriment of all other matter; but more attention is to be given to constructiv social reform; nor is the paper to be exclusivly a party paper, but a Freethought paper in the strict sense of the term; in short, it will be, in the words of the circular, "A thoroughly Liberal paper, in which the merely anti-theological element is made subservient to the social and political element."

Questions Without Answers.

The answer should be a reason of the hopes, not the fears, that are in you (see 1 Peter iii, 15).

1. As we are required to love our enemies, may we not safely infer that God loves his enemies?
2. If God loves his enemies, will he punish them more than will be for their good?
3. Would endless punishment be for the good of any being?
4. As God worketh no evil, can God inflict, or cause, or allow to be inflicted an endless evil?
5. As we are forbidden to be overcome of evil, can we safely suppose that God will be overcome of evil?
6. Would not endless punishment prove that God had been overcome of evil?
7. Would not endless punishment be the return of evil for evil?
8. As we are commanded to overcome evil with good, may we not safely infer that God will do the same?
9. Does not justice require of us the fulfilment of the law of God?
10. Will not justice be eternally violated if the law of God be not universally fulfilled?
11. If all men justly deserve endless punishment, will not those who are saved be saved unjustly?
12. If you had sufficient power, would you not save all mankind?
13. Are you more merciful than the God who made you?
14. Is the creator of human sympathy less benevolent than the created?
15. If God would save all men but cannot, is he infinit in power?
16. If God can save all men but will not, is he infinit in goodness?
17. Did God design universal salvation when he created man?
18. Will God carry his original design into execution?
19. Can finite man frustrate the purposes of the almighty?
20. Would endless punishment benefit the almighty as the inflictor?
21. Would endless misery benefit the saints as spectators?
22. Would endless misery benefit the sinners as sufferers?
23. If endless punishment be the wages of sin, would the sinner ever receive payment in full?
24. If the scriptures should testify that God will hav all men to be damned, could we safely infer that a part was to be saved?
25. As the scriptures testify that God will hav all men to be saved, can we safely infer that a part will be damned?
26. If God made an endless hell before he created man, did he know there would be any use for it?
27. If God knew there would be use for an endless hell, must he not hav created some men for endless misery?
28. If God made an endless hell, was it included in the works which he pronounced "very good?" (Gen. i, 31.)
29. If there be a personal devil, who made him?
30. If a holy angel was tempted to sin by surrounding evil, is heaven a holy place?
31. If an angel became a devil by sinning, was Adam the original sinner?
32. If men are totally depraved by nature, must not children be so likewise?
33. If children be totally depraved, is it true that of such is the kingdom of heaven? (Mark x, 14.)
34. Men are to be washed from their sins. If they are totally depraved, what is there to wash?
35. Is it the revealed will of God that all men should be saved?
36. Can God will all men to be saved, knowing that a part will be forever lost?
37. Can Jesus Christ be the savior of any more than he actually saves?
38. If Christ be in no sense the savior of unbelievers, why are they called upon to believe in him as their savior?
39. If unbelievers are not called upon to believe in Christ as their savior, what are they to believe?
40. Must not the thing that is to be believed be true before it is believed?
41. Must not the thing to be believed be true, whether it is believed or not?
42. Does not the law of God require all men to love him supremely, and their neighbor as themselvs?
43. Will not justice be eternally violated if the law of God is not fulfilled?
44. Would not the salvation of nine-tenths of mankind glorify God more than the salvation of half?
45. Can we giv glory to God in the highest without believing in the salvation of all men?
46. If sin exist eternally, can it be that Christ was to "finish the transgressions and make an end of sin?" (Dan. ix, 24.)
47. If there be no certainty in relation to the final destiny of man, is not salvation a work of chance?
48. What better is chance than Atheism?
49. If God be not the father of sinners, why are sinners taught to pray, "Our father which art in heaven?"
50. Can he be a Christian who affirms that if he believes in the salvation of all men, he would not worship God?
51. Can he be a Christian who inquires, If all men are to be saved, what use is there in being virtuous?
52. Some say that if they did not believe in endless punishment, they would take their fill of sin. How much sin would it take to fill a Christian?
53. If all men deserve endless punishment, would it not be right for God to inflict it?
54. If it would be right for God to punish men eternally, would it not be wrong for him not to do it?
55. If the return of evil for evil be right in deity, would it not be equally right in man?
56. Does the belief of endless misery cause the believer to "rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory?" (Peter i, 8.)
57. Can a belief of anything short of universal salvation fill the heart with joy and peace?
58. Will not the devil and all his works be destroyed? (Heb. ii, 14; 1 John iii, 8.)
59. Will not death, the last enemy, be swallowed up in victory? (Isa. xxv, 8.)

The above questions were handed to me to copy some two years or more ago, by a friend of mine, and as they are too good to lose, I thought I would send them to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I do not know who wrote them first, but send a copy just as I got them.

The Junius Question.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 31, 1886, I submitted proof positiv that Philip Francis was not Junius; that is, I proved an alibi. Junius wrote a private letter to his publisher Woodfall on the 11th or 12th of November, 1769, saying, "I hav been out of town these three weeks, and though I got your last I could not conveniently answer it." But on the 4th of November, 1769, Philip Francis wrote a letter to his brother-in-law in America from the War Office in London, and I hav found another alibi. But now comes a Junius student, Judge Horace P. Biddle, of Indiana, who presents in the Public Press of New Albany not less than half a dozen alibis for Francis. His article was written for the purpose of answering a presumptuous lawyer who in a long series of articles on the Junius question in the Indianapolis Sentinel concluded with a most positiv indorsement of Philip Francis as Junius. That lawyer had notice of my alibi last summer, but thought he could evade it by the silly plea that "Junius was such a gay deceiver." As if the war clerk Francis could hav any possible motiv in telling an unnecessary lie to the printer Woodfall, who never for a moment distrusted his unknown correspondent Junius, and even sought his advice more than a year after he had ceased to write (see Private Letters, 63 and 64).

I will quote only one of the alibis submitted by Judge Biddle:

On the 6th of January, 1772, Junius wrote a private uote to Woodfall, his publisher, concerning the famous letter to Lord Mausfield, No. 58. Upon the same day, and during several days before and for several days after, Sir Philip Francis was at Bath, over a huudred miles from London, attending upon his father, who was sick at that place, and in the language of Sir Philip, "truly in a deplorable condition"

(Notes and Queries, 4th S., Vol. 11, p. 130.) This alibi, it seems to me, is equal to old Weller's, and I concur with the writer of the article cited: "After this, shall we hear any more about Francis?"

Judge Biddle concludes by remarking that the opinion in England that Francis was Junius, after having prevailed against many conflicting opinions during half a century, but never fully believed, is now entirely exploded.

Now, let any one, if he can, produce a single alibi or other fact incompatible with the identity of Paine as Junius. The author of "Junius Unmasked" intends to write the Life of Paine, which will require several years of research in England and France, because Paine's work was all secret up to the age of fifty-four, when he wrote the "Rights of Man" in reply to Burke, and first came out openly as an author. And even then he says, "Had Mr. Burke not urged the controversy (in regard to the French Revolution), I had most probably been a silent man." When the time comes for Mr. Moody to begin his "Life of Paine" he says he will go through it like a whirlwind, and scatter the falsehoods to sheol.

The Railway Problem.

As our people hav no idea that the railway problem in England presents about the same features that our own does, a brief abstract from the papers of Charles Waring, in the Fortnightly Review, of London, will not be amiss. As early as 1872, Sir Henry Tyler said: "The question is, whether the state shall manage the railways or whether the railways shall manage the state." But then the question was a very simple one as compared with it today, because of the enormous growth of the system in number of miles and wealth.

The capital of the English railways is now four billion dollars, or more than the national debt. Their lines are over 20,000 miles. They carry 700,000,000 passengers per year, and some 260,000,000 tons freight. Their receipts were over $350,000,000; working expenses, $185,000,000; net profits, for dividends, $165,000,000. There are some 400,000 shareholders, who receive about $400 each per year, average. They employ some 400,000 people. They hav managed England almost from the very outset, and their power is now despotic. Their sole consideration is what will make the most money for their owners. And if it pays them as well to convey one hundred passengers or tons of freight as it would to carry a thousand, it is safe to say they will carry but the hundred. That is to say, important—yes, absolutely essential—as are the railroads to our very existence at this time, yet they are wholly managed in the interest of a few persons, the public being secondary. To the life of the nation their monopoly is like a monopoly of air, water, or bread, yet these roads are held and operated as monopolies.

In Parliament the railway shareholders are supreme, because the landholders hav united with them, their interests being identified (new roads increase the price of land). Thousands of new laws hav been enacted, and this has drawn the legal profession into partnership with them.

In the beginning, says Waring, monopoly was not suspected, but the need of single management excluded independent carriers. By leasing, purchasing, and pooling, competition has been virtually suppressed and prevented. For forty years efforts hav been made to control these evils by legislation, but in vain. "And now," says Waring, "the companies hav obtained a position of superlativ strength and advantage, and one which they may well regard as almost impregnable." The railways hav purchased or destroyed all competing canals or river ways. "But the sea is the great free-trader," says Sir Thomas Farrer.

Byron, apostrophizing the ocean, exclaims:

> Man marks the earth with ruin; his control
> Stops with thy shore.

But Mr. Waring says, "The railways, however, do not hesitate to attack the competition of the sea," and are doing it successfully; and here is a point our free-traders should note. In fact, British agriculture is as much oppressed by the preference given to foreign imports of farm products over English farm products as it is claimed our American farmers are oppressed by our protectiv tariff, which taxes the exports in taxing the imports they are traded for.

Home products are charged outrageously, in order to favor foreign imports and meet ocean competition, and every favor and facility is given to foreign imports over home products. Mr. Waring givs us a list of charges, showing discrimination in favoring or disfavoring home products, as well as in favoring foreign over home. A few I cite here: "Among these curiosities I find the following: An equal charge for 27 as for 86 miles, and again an equal charge where the difference is 116 miles. The same goods in same quantities are charged as follows: For 27 miles, $1.15; for 20 miles, 35c.; for 8 miles, $2.08; for 100 miles, $4.12, and for 112 miles, one-third more than for 114 miles; same charge for 28 as for 2 miles. Between Norfolk and London, for cattle, 10 shillings per head, or $2.50; between London and Midland counties, a longer distance, 5 shillings, or $1.25. Preferences to large dealers are common, preferences for storage given, and in a thousand ways favors and disfavors shown.

In grouping and districting the country so as to charge the same rates to and from stations at various and great distances, the companies hav generally exercised a wise discretion for the people, but this only proves their power. Where there is no coal, but plenty of iron, they hav carried coal for a trifle, and thus built up enormous industries, as at Westbury, but the slightest caprice could ruin the whole of it. The fact is, as anyone who can think must know, that all the trade, all the industry of Great Britain is now at the mercy of a few men. By a nod or a whisper they can make millions of people tremble and turn pale. In all the history of this world, never has there been a time when such awful power was placed in so few hands.

By securing control over harbors and purchasing docks, they are obtaining virtual control over ocean transportation. [In Texas several harbors are under control of the railways. At Chicago we see the railways cunningly obtaining ownership of the lake shore.] Hardly a session of Parliament passes in which docks are not transferred to the railway companies.

Mr. Waring shows that it will require more legislativ interference and office-making to attempt to control the roads than it will to take and operate them by the government.

Within twenty years the called-up capital of the companies has increased from £445,000,000 to £801,000,000 sterling, the mileage has increased from 13,000 to 19,000 miles; the passengers from 252,000,000 per year to about 700,000,000; the receipts from £36,000,000 to £70,500,000 sterling; working expenses from £17,000,000 to £37,000,000.

Four or five company managers now control what were originally over two hundred lines, and the tendency is for all to come under one management.

Mr. Waring almost exhaustivly treats the subject, and suggests state control as the only solution of the problem. The articles hav been republished in full in the Library Magazine of New York. Those interested in this most important of all subjects can get the number for a trifle.

The Bright Future.

Credulity is one of the early characteristics of childhood. Although the absurd story of Santa Claus, with his impossible nocturnal visits and gifts to all good children, has been transmitted from generation to generation for hundreds of years, the infant mind is still easily impressed with this nursery legend, and perhaps it will be so continued until maturer age and the child's reason show its absurdity.

Reasoning from the standpoint of developed reason and intelligence, is it unreasonable to hope that our descendants in the not very far-off future will look with equal surprise on the legendary and monkish superstitions which now surround us?

Many thinkers are not observant of the fact that the world has made rapid advances in liberalization within the last half century, and we now look back with astonishment at what our forefathers once held as sacred. Who shall predict, at the rate we are now unfolding, what may be the result of the future? It is not difficult to show that from the religious element of man's composition the vast multitudes of priests hav ever drawn, and still draw, their support and importance.

Perhaps about the year 3000, or less, the "holy father" at Rome will be farcically exhibited in full canonicals on the stage by some traveling theatrical corps. Then may be seen the once-splendid "grand deputy of God" with cross and golden key, in full pontifical robes, becapped with high tiara, heading his holy army of cardinals, archbishops, priests, confessors, sanctified and fumigated by his numerous attendant chorus and altar boys. Then may he be seen, the host, holy cross and all, masquerading on the stage, at fifty cents per capita, before our children's astonished eyes—astonished that such mummery could ever hav passed off as a serious matter of religion. This may seem extravagant nonsense to many, but when we consider how many myths of past ages the intelligence of the world has outlived, it cannot but encourage us to hope for the world's much higher future. Even like the nursery legends of our childhood they will cease to scare like the absurdities of Santa Claus.

Taking the world as a whole, it has ever been a severe struggle for the champions of truth to overcome the stubborn belief in a multiplicity of gods and goddesses, with their capricious and malignant influences upon the living; but it has been done after the struggle of ages. Ignorance ever backed by the complications of the priesthood has gradually had to yield the conflict, and science, the arts, and general intelligence now reign triumphant to the extent they never ruled before. The champions of truth hav done wonders! In this war of blind superstition they hav vanquished the army of pagan gods, reducing them to the lonesome number of three—"Father, Son, and Holy Ghost."

In speaking of the world we must estimate it as a whole, and forbear charging our ancestors with the crimes of past ages. The Liberal is apt to look with surprise with what pertinacity the orthodox priesthood cling to what is called the Bible, even although science, reason, and common sense repudiate this monstrosity as a libel on Omnipotence. However, he will cease his surprise when he bears in mind the immense army of priests and laymen who gain their sustenance by upholding this journalization of ancient deeds of barbarity and libidinous literature.

It is a great error to suppose that what is known as orthodox priesthood are so ignorant and obtuse as not to understand its bald absurdities. Not so. The learned orthodox priesthood, the sanctimonious bellwethers of their flocks, know too well the folly of attempting an argumentativ justification of its enormities, and thus with assumed dignity wave controversy aside.

A Revival that Does Not Revive.

From the Sunday Gazetteer, Denison, Tex.

The editor has been honored with an invitation to attend "a meeting" in progress at the Southern Methodist church, "for your special benefit." We return thanks to the management for getting up this meeting for our benefit, and if we discover any beneficial results, shall not hesitate to make due and prompt acknowledgment. This invitation also informs us that we are the subject of the prayers of the Christian people of Denison, and we are earnestly entreated to avail ourself of the benefit. This is certainly very kind of these praying people, and, however much we may disagree with them as to the efficacy of work of this kind, we assure them that whenever we become aware of any advantage accruing to us from this source we will inform the readers of the Gazetteer. While having our shortcomings, of which no one is exempt (not even Rev. T. E. Sherwood, probably, whose name is appended to this document, and who says all Infidels are scallawags), yet we don't think we are a very great sinner. We strive to attend to our own business, earn an honest living by working for it, pay our just debts, and express our conscientious opinions when a proper occasion presents itself, frankly and honestly, even on religion. However, as happiness is what we are all after, we will not put a straw in the way of any one who desires to make us happier, or who can add to the joy in the household.

"God calls you," says this circular. We don't know about that. He hasn't addressed us that we are aware of, and as we are suspicious of "middle-men" in transactions of this kind, Mr. Sherwood will please excuse our abruptness if we say we don't believe it. "Jesus Christ has died to redeem you," says this invitation. The Universalists say if he died to redeem all men, then all men will be redeemed. Not being a divine, we will delay any discussion of this question until the clergy settle it among themselvs. "The Holy Spirit impresses you." If this is so, then it must be it wishes us to use our own best judgment in deciding this question of religion, after a careful investigation of the whole subject in the light of historical facts and common sense, as this is the impression we received when reading this document. The closing appeal is put in the form of a question: "Will you giv God a chance to save your soul?" This may be clerical, but to us it is impertinent. The God that could speak a universe into existence, and govern it by his providence, does not certainly require puny man to giv him an opportunity to do what he pleases. However, whenever he notifies us (any messages from "middle-men" will be looked upon with suspicion) that we must do something to giv him "a chance," we assure the author of this conundrum that we will jerk off our coat and go to work in good earnest. But meantime we shall jog along the old way, striving to make the best paper for Sunday reading in the state of Texas.

The Perspicacity of the Kiralfy Brothers.

The clergymen of Cleveland hav all been invited to attend the performance of the "Back Crook" in that city, and some are very indignant. Said the Rev. G. T. Downing: "I would as soon accept an invitation from the devil to watch the fires of hell burn. The invitation is an insult. The Kiralfy brothers must look upon the clergy of this country as a gang of long-eared asses."

A Roman Catholic Opinion.

From the Catholic Review.

We do not, indeed, prize as highly as some of our countrymen appear to do the ability to read, write, and cipher. Some men are born to be leaders, and the rest are born to be led. The best ordered and administered state is that in which the few are well educated and lead, and the many are trained to obedience.

Those of humanity who reflect, see, and advance, always hav to drag behind them the long tail of those who know neither to reflect nor to see, and who will not advance. But progress goes on all the same; convinced adepts of the different religions, positiv and dogmatic, diminish daily in number among the really activ members of mankind. Let us be satisfied with this. Those who are not for progress from henceforth exist, so to say, no more; they will disappear totally one day. The exercise of the mind becomes more than ever a condition of existence. The preponderant rôle of the religions in past times is explained by the fact that then they were almost the only means by which men could set their intellectual and moral activity to work. They were the unique opening for all the higher aspirations of our being. At that epoch, with the exception of religion, there was no mental occupation other than coarse and material; nothing between the visionary and the most common reality. In the present day the necessary and natural middle course is found. One can meditate without being a dreamer; one can even be a visionary without being constrained to believe. Science and art hav spread before our eyes their domains with never-ending perspectivs, where every one can expend his surplus activity without wasting it needlessly. Science permits of disinterested research, without tolerating the wanderings of the imagination. It givs enthusiasm without delirium. It has a beauty of its own consisting of truth.—M. M. Guyau.

Religious Persecution in Arkansas.

It has been generally supposed that since the New England religious persecutions of the Episcopalians, Catholics, and Quakers the Christians of this country had come to let each other alone and united in stealing from our public treasuries and persecuting the Infidels. This is not the fact, however, as some very recent Southern cases show. They are brought to light by a speech in the Arkansas senate by Senator Crockett.

It appears that up to two years ago Arkansas allowed Seventh Day Adventists and Seventh Day Baptists the same privilege that other states allow them, namely, the privilege of keeping Saturday and laboring Sunday. In 1885 this law was repealed, and since then the persecutions of the Adventists and Baptists hav been common. Senator Crockett's speech was in advocacy of the reënactment of the law, allowing religious organizations to keep any day in the week for Sabbath, providing one day in the week is kept.

Two cases of persecution which the senator brought to the attention of the Senate are atrocious. The first was of a Mr. Swearigen, who settled in Arkansas from a Northern state. He is a Seventh Day Adventist, the Biblical religion of which C. B. Reynolds was once a distinguished ornament. Mr. Swearigen settled upon a farm four miles from town. He was far away from any church, and, after having kept Saturday according to his conscience, worked upon his farm on Sunday. His labor and his faith were shared by his son, a lad of seventeen. The two were observed by their Christian neighbors, and reported to the grand jury, by whom they were indicted. They were tried, convicted, and fined. Having no money, they were imprisoned for twenty-five days in the county jail. At the expiration of the sentence, the Sabbath-breaker's horse was levied on to pay the fine and costs, amounting to $38. The horse sold at auction for $27. A few days afterward the sheriff demanded $36—$11 balance due on fine and costs and $25 for board for Swearingen and son while in jail. When told that the Adventist had no money, he promptly levied on the only cow, but was persuaded to accept bonds, and the amount was paid by contributions from friends of the same faith.

The second case was of a young married couple who moved into Arkansas from Ohio. They were Seventh Day Baptists. When the law allowing them to choose their own Sabbath was repealed in 1885, they continued the religious habit of keeping Saturday and working Sunday. An envious Christian neighbor observed them, the grand jury indicted the husband; he was tried, convicted, and put in jail for refusing to pay the fine. Week after week passed by, the baby sickened and died because the mother had no means to hire physicians; the wife was prostrated, and, a day or two before the law was appeased and the husband released, she, too, died. He returned home only to meet his neighbors at his gate bearing her coffin to the graveyard—dead of a broken heart and lack of care.

At the time this bill was pending in the legislature, six men were under indictment and were to be shortly tried at Malvern for breaking the Christian Sabbath. They kept their own day of worship, but the theological Moloch was not satisfied with that—they must observe the Christian Sabbath as well. Though the bill passed the Senate, we do not know whether it became a law in time to save these men from a fine or the jail.

Christian intolerance cannot be so far down the aisles of time as is currently supposed when Infidels here in the North are imprisoned for opinions' sake, and tragedies such as Senator Crockett recited are enacted in the South.

The church and state must be really as well as theoretically separated.

The Knights and the Church.

Cardinals Gibbons and Taschereau, the former of Baltimore, the latter of Montreal, are now in Rome. Their errand, as given to the public, is twofold, viz., to obtain their red hats and to settle whether the Knights of Labor is an organization to be condemned by the church. Cardinal Taschereau, in obedience to instructions received from Rome, has already settled the question for Canada by condemning the order and ordering Roman Catholics out of it. In this country the question is still open, though regarded as practically settled in favor of the Knights. Cardinal Gibbons is friendly to the order, and has made an argument addressed to one Simeoni, prefect of the propaganda at Rome, in favor of allowing Catholics to remain members.

It appears from this argument that the American archbishops hav voted upon the question, and that ten of the twelve see no reason for condemning the Knights. Mr. Gibbons has examined the Knights' constitution and by-laws, and has "not found therein the elements which the holy see so clearly designates as condemnable, and the formula of their organization contains neither oath nor obligation which prevents those who do not belong to it, or even their enemies, from becoming acquainted with their affairs. Catholics are not forbidden to divulge everything to competent ecclesiastical authorities, even outside of the confessional." The master workman of the order has also assured Mr. Gibbons that he "professes his religion faithfully and receives the sacraments regularly," and "with filial submission he begs the pastors of the church to examin all the details of the organization, and says that if they find therein anything reprehensible to point it out and he will faithfully promis to hav the proper modifications made." Mr. Gibbons givs, further, nine reasons why the church need not condemn the order. They are:

"1. Because such a condemnation does not appear to be justified either by the letter or by the spirit of its constitution, of its laws, or by the declarations of its heads.

"2. That such a condemnation does not appear necessary in view of the transient form of the organization and of the social condition of the United States.

"3. That it would not be prudent, on account of the reality of the wrongs of the workingmen and the fact that the existence of such is admitted by the American public.

"4. That it would be dangerous to the reputation of the church in our democratic country.

"5. That it would be powerless to compel the obedience of our Catholic workingmen, who would regard it as false and iniquitous.

"6. That it would be destructiv instead of beneficial in its effects, forcing the sons of the church to rebel against their mother, and to range themselvs with condemned societies which they hav hitherto avoided.

"7. That it would be ruinous to the financial support of the church at home, and to the raising of Peter's pence.

"8. That it would turn into doubt and hostility the marked devotion of our people toward the holy see.

"9. That it would be regarded as a cruel blow to the authority of the bishops of the United States, who, it is well known, protest against such a condemnation."

When the Knights of Labor met recently in Baltimore, Mr. Powderly, it is well known, spent a good deal of his time with Cardinal Gibbons. It was then, probably, that he gave the debasing assurances which the cardinal now transmits to the pope. But if Executiv E. A. Stevens had been made general master workman, instead of Terence Powderly (a not unlikely turn of affairs, when both were upon the executiv board a few years ago), we fancy the cardinal would hav had less comforting news to take to his master. Powderly has sold the Knights out to Rome.

Cardinal Gibbons's reasons are sound, looking at the matter from his standpoint. There is no need of the church denouncing an organization it owns, and which it will own so long as the present master workman is kept in office. That is the main and sufficient reason, and no others are necessary. The others given are what the lawyers call cumulativ, and would be good were not the first so strong as to render them useless. It would be, as Mr. Gibbons says, highly imprudent to raise a row in this country between the church and her followers. The atmosphere of the United States is conduciv to independence, and the McGlynn affair is a warning to ecclesiastical authorities. Every time the church condemns a success, she shows her fallibility and damages her reputation. But, most cogent of all reasons to the pope, a condemnation of the Knights would stop the collection of Peter's pence, and endanger the pecuniary welfare of the holy church! That reason is of itself sufficient to turn the darkest heretical black into the purest of religious white. The church must hav cash or the church goes down. It cannot liv on the love of God alone.

Cardinal Gibbons has done well, and proved himself a most adroit politician. There is only one thing more to be explained. Cardinal Taschereau's officially authorized condemnation of the Knights still stands good in Canada. How is it that the order is all right this side of the Canadian line and all wrong on the other?

A Cheering Letter.

Here is one of the letters we occasionally receive which make life worth living:

"GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., Feb. 17, 1887.

"TO THE OFFICE OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Gents: I hereby remit your $3.25 for back dues on your paper. I like your paper all but your George's or Anarchist arguments. I do not believe in dividing my fortune with some loafer—that is too apostolic, like Ananias and Sapphira when they were dividing with Peter and, keeping a little back, got killed for it. That is not our Liberal principle, from my standpoint. So I will discontinue your paper at present until you can afford to be logical to your government in your arguments, for we hav no use for dynamite in this country where there is a free ballot. Yours respectfully, A. D. YOUNG."

We are glad to hear from Mr. Young—glad, indeed, that he has at last concluded to divide his fortune with creditors who hav honestly and well earned a little of his cash. We wish he had divided earlier.

We are pleased also with Mr. Young's hearty appreciation of THE TRUTH SEEKER—for he expresses his appreciation unqualifiedly. The true appreciation of friends sustains us in many a dark hour. It is true, friend Young makes a slight reservation in enumerating his likes, but as the two or three things he mentions that he dislikes are things he never found in THE TRUTH SEEKER, his admiration of the paper is complete.

We are glad that he does not like Anarchy. Neither does the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. In fact, so intense is our dissatisfaction with the system that we hav used several columns of the paper several times to show how fallacious, as a philosophical system, Anarchy is in theory, and how utterly impracticable it would be in fact. We are pleased to know that Mr. Young has read the articles and agrees with us.

It is also a source of great satisfaction to find in the West a gentleman who indorses our opposition to Henry George. Here in New York about all our friends oppose our notions. But we would not vote for a man for mayor of the city who was pledged to enforce the Sunday laws, and who looked to piety instead of to principle for votes. Neither can we see how Mr. George's theory of taxing land values instead of the houses and improvements upon the land would giv us all a farm, or even a building lot. So we opposed Mr. George's election to the mayoralty of New York, and still oppose his theories of land reform. That so well-informed a sociologist as Mr. Young pronounces our opposition sound is gratifying, and will hav its influence upon our New York friends.

Other points of agreement between Mr. Young and the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER are also noticeable. Like him we do not believe in dividing with loafers; like him we do not think dynamite is needed where there is a free ballot. On this point, as against Anarchy, we hav said much. On several occasions hav we been scoffed at because we told workingmen that it is foolish to make incendiary speeches when the place to talk is at the ballot-box. Liberal principles demand neither unworthy division nor dynamite. In asserting this we are "logical" to the government, and therein is another point of agreement with Mr.

Young. He also is "logical" to the government. In fact, in the face of all the opposition we hav recently encountered, Mr. Young's letter is like an oasis in the desert.

We thank him for writing it, and for his unlimited approval of our editorial course. That he does not take THE TRUTH SEEKER is of no consequence, so long as we hav won him over to our views. We do not believe he will backslide into Anarchy, or go off to Henry George's ideas, or the advocacy of dynamite.

Mr. Remsburg in Danger.

Our esteemed friend Worley, of Odessa, Mo., furnishes us with a batch of newspaper clippings, from the Democrat of that place, which indicate that there must hav been fun in Odessa a short time since.

It appears that J. E. Remsburg was invited into the town to deliver a three days' course of lectures. As the editor of the Democrat was not informed of Mr. Remsburg's subjects, he was beguiled into advertising the meetings. Since the lectures, the editor spends most of the time in tearing his own hair, with short intervals of abusing Mr. Remsburg and the Infidels of Odessa. Sackcloth and ashes but feebly express his contrite humility.

There was talk, after the first lecture, among the proslavery orthodox element which dominates the place, of mobbing Mr. Remsburg and getting him out of town in the most expeditious manner; but wiser counsels prevailed, and he rode out upon the train as usual. It was not humanity that prevented the mobbing, but a fear that the world about would condemn the act. The opinion entertained by the Christians of Odessa of the Infidels may be gathered from this paragraph in the Democrat:

"Prior to and during the reign of Robespierre in Paris God and the Bible were mocked and derided, and death proclaimed an eternal sleep. Outlawry, rapine, plunder, debauchery in all its phases, and murder ran riot in that unhappy city, and her streets ran red with the best blood of France. Sodom, Gomorrah, and Babylon might be quoted where men devoted all the days in the week (Sunday included) to the gratifications of their depraved inclinations, and what a harvest they did reap!"

Mr. Remsburg may congratulate himself upon getting away from Odessa alive. The ungrammatical tom-tit who edits the Democrat is a fire-eater, and now expresses a great desire to make a meal of the Infidel. His appetite seems to increase with the distance between himself and Mr. Remsburg.

The Latest Kansas Arrests.

The arrest by United States authorities of Moses and George Harman—which we had scant time to chronicle last week—seems to us to be very much the same kind of an affair as the arrest of the former editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, D. M. Bennett.

The article complained of, if we are rightly informed by N. H. Harman, is one upon which trouble was threatened at the time of its publication. A clergyman announced that it was "the evidence he was waiting for," and a copy of the paper containing the article was sent to the post-office inspector, presumably to get him to prosecute, but that was the last of it, though Mr. Harman evidently thought he was to be a martyr.

The article in question is a coarsely-written and exclamatory denunciation of the abuse of marital rights. Such an article would not be allowed in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, because it not only is offensiv, but useless. Nevertheless, it is not obscene, and surely a man has a right to say things which may offend. We do it every week, and are remonstrated with almost as often. Mr. Heston's pictures are offensiv to Christians, but we do not see how he could be held to blame for that. Our right to hav them made and to print them is unquestionable. The pictures, the editorials, the reports, the contributed matter in all our daily and weekly journals, offend hundreds of thousands every week. If everything were suppressed which offends anyone, there would be nothing printed. So, because the article is offensiv is no reason for its suppression.

The opinion of the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER as to the utility and rightfulness of the United States postal laws upon obscene literature is well known. The laws are unconstitutional, and hav no place upon our national statute books. Any prosecution under them must, therefore, be condemned.

As to obscenity laws in themselvs, they are necessary and right when enacted by state legislatures and enforced by the proper municipal authorities. No one living in a large city can doubt that these laws, or rules of society, are of the first importance in properly punishing the nefarious scoundrels who traffic in books of the vilest type, and ruin young men without a thought other than the dollars gained. Such books are known at a glance, and should be burnt wherever found.

The difficulties attending the enforcement of these laws are two, but one of them would be almost done away with by the repeal of the unconstitutional national statutes. There hav sprung up in almost every state societies of private persons who hav taken upon themselvs the task of enforcing obscenity laws. Under the national statutes they inflict much injury. Under state statutes they cannot, for the sense of the community more often secures justice in a state than in a national court. These prosecutions should be taken out of the hands of these meddlers and put into the charge of the local police. The second difficulty attending the prosecution of the obscenity laws is the delicate judgment required in deciding what properly comes under the statute. In old times the conversation and literature were very "broad," and naturally the works of genius that hav come down to our generation are broad. Such works are the Bible, Shakspere's poems and plays, Swift's works, Rabelais's works, the "Arabian Nights," and dozens of others, without which our literature would be much poorer. Again, certain people—narrow and starved in thought, dyspeptic, and fanatically pious—regard with professed horror objects to which educated and traveled people never giv a second thought. Such folks look upon art galleries as the devil's evangels, and the theater as a section of hell. If the law was interpreted by them, the world would be what a nunnery generally is not—a place of austere "virtue," as ridiculous as unpleasant. When once outside of the really obscene, it is impossible to draw the line; it has never been done, and we do not believe it ever can be. Like blasphemy, it is a question of geography, of social custom, of education—in short, of pure opinion.

But if we take the opinion and definition of one of the most bigoted authorities extant—him of infamous memory in connection with D. M. Bennett—we do not see how the article for which Moses and George Harman are held to bail can be termed obscene. It could not corrupt the morals nor deprave the mind, and if the use of one word is in this case obscene, then it is in every case, and the publishers of all medical books may be prosecuted.

No one can regret more than we the possibility of another fight on this unwelcome question. Nothing new can be said upon it, and no good can come of it.

If the purpose of Lucifer is to discuss such questions as this article raises, Mr. Harman certainly could insist upon the language of his correspondents conforming to the usages of the world, or he could exclude their communications from his columns. His was the risk, and no correspondent should ask an editor to risk his liberty that the correspondent's ideas may be circulated. But if Mr. Harman and his son are sent to jail for printing a word, it will be no less an invasion of personal rights, no less an outrage, than that inflicted upon the founder of this paper. And that is putting the matter very strong.

Blind On One Side.

In relation to the bill recently introduced in the Senate of the New York legislature by Senator Murphy, requiring that "the schools established and maintained by the New York Catholic Protectory shall participate in the distribution of the common school fund in the same manner and degree as the common schools of the city of New York," quoted in THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 26th, the Christian Advocate says:

"We must not only protest against the bill in question, but it is high time to demand of the legislature the repeal of the clause in the Children's Law of 1884, which condemns children to be sent to institutions under the control of persons of the same faith as the parents of the children, as not only unconstitutional, but as multiplying enormously the number of infant paupers, and as heavily increasing the burdens of taxation, and as enlarging the tendency of Roman education to illiteracy, pauperism, and crime."

This is right. Not only should the law referred to be repealed, but every law granting a penny from the treasury of the state should be repealed, as well as every law giving the Protestants the right to invade state institutions and teach their sectarianism. The law allowing judges to giv vagrant children to Catholic charities is not one whit more unconstitutional or immoral than the law which allows the managers of the Randall's Island House of Refuge to make that public charity a Sunday-school for the Protestant church.

But we notice that with the Christian Advocate, as with other religious organs, it makes a vast difference whose ox is gored.

Send the Bible Society to Jail.

Anthony Comstock has had John A. Wilson, of the Globe Publishing Company, at Paulsborough, N. J., sent to prison for two years and fined five hundred dollars for sending through the mails Balzac's "Droll Stories" and the Queen of Navarre's "Heptameron."

Comstock's attention was attracted to Mr. Wilson last September by an advertisment of these books Under an assumed name he sent for copies, and the federal grand jury found indictments upon them. Mr. Wilson stood trial upon Balzac's work, and when the jury convicted him on that, pleaded non vult on the other indictment, with the penalty stated. Two years ago Comstock tried to imprison a man for selling the "Heptameron," but a Freehold, N. J., jury acquitted the seller. A Trenton jury, it seems, is less educated in the classics.

It would be in order now to imprison all who sell the works of Shakspere, Swift, Sterne, and Rabelais, and of those Jewish fellows who wrote the Old Testament.

A Golden Opportunity.

A bill permitting the New York municipal authorites to giv the American Museum of Natural History four hundred thousand dollars has become a law.

If Mayor Hewitt and the other gentlemen composing the Board of Estimate and Apportionment are in earnest in desiring the Sunday opening of this museum, now is their opportunity.

To obtain this money the managers of the museum would sink their piety out of sight, and the people of the city might then obtain a view of the treasures of the museum.

COMPLAINING in the last issue of Liberty of his side-tracking by B. R. Tucker from the editorial columns of that paper, Henry Appleton incidentally makes public a just cause of complaint against another editor. He says:

"I did send a communication to THE TRUTH SEEKER, but Macdonald, though he had just published your communication, chose to even outdo your side-tracking method of disciplin by dumping me out of his columns altogether."

We apologize. Mr. Appleton's communication has been in the accepted pigeon-hole since its receipt, and twice progressed as far as the hook, but its length and the arrival of other matter hav prevented its seeing daylight. Nevertheless, we hav hopes.

WHILE the social fabric of our republic is being turned topsy-turvy by dissatisfied labor, and humanitarians are racking their brains for a social panacea, it is encouraging to find one man who knows it all and is willing to impart his knowledge to others—at five dollars an hour, as his card says. Not only can W. M. Boucher, 28 Waverly Place, this city, answer Pilate's old conundrum, but he professes to be able to tell what science is, what law is, what value is, what money is, and he also teaches economics, ethics, sociology, and explains international bi-metalism and the labor problem. Mr. Boucher is a valuable man to hav in a large city and Henry George, Dr. McGlynn, and the labor leaders should apply to him at once to settle the problems vexing the Knights of Labor and other working bodies.

THE ideas of the Roman Catholics as to salvation were newly stated the other day by a Jesuit of San Francisco. He laid down the law that out of the Roman Catholic church there is no ordinary hope for salvation, and that he who stands aloof from her exposes himself to everlasting damnation. In order that a person can be saved he must, according to the law of Christ, belong to the church of Christ. There could only be one church of Christ, and this church, the speaker contended, was and could only be the holy Roman Catholic church. The heathen would not be judged by the law, "for one that knows not the law will not be judged by the law." The Jews could be saved provided they came into the church. As for Protestants, salvation was open to those of them existing in "invincible ignorance" or complete unconsciousness of the law. In this respect they were as heathens. They were spiritually in union with the church and virtually were within it. Protestants yet in doubt must speedily clear up their doubts, or else die without the church. This is a very pretty doctrin for Roman Catholics, and for their sake we are sorry it is such a stupendous humbug.

Mr. Remsburg's Bereavement.

MY DEAR MACDONALD: Over the wires this morning came the sad words, "'Gene is dead." Our pretty babe, two years old, and named for you, has died. I am now hastening home, and my work in Illinois is suspended for the present.

Yours truly, J. E. REMSBURG.

Decatur, Ill., March 2, 1887.

Letters from Friends.

ARLINGTON, N. Y., Feb. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am happy to state that we hav a Freethinker that dares to name a boy after Robert G. Ingersoll. The youngster is eight months old and a bright fellow too. His name is Robert I. Halstead, and he will be trained in the Freethought line, for his father and mother are Freethinkers. Please let it be known that there is another who will bear the name of our friend Robert. G. W. MONSING.

CARLINVILLE, ILL., Feb. 21, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: We had J. E. Remsburg here to deliver three lectures on last Thursday, Friday, and Saturday evenings, and had a good turnout to hear him, notwithstanding bad weather and that the Baptists and Methodists were holding a revival meeting on the opposit corner of the Opera House where Mr. Remsburg spoke; and as a result of those lectures I send you the inclosed order for books, and expect soon to be able to send another order and perhaps one or two new subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. W. H. WHITE.

DEXTER, Mo., Feb. 21, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: We had J. E. Remsburg with us last week. He delivered an excellent course of lectures to very small houses. The churches hav all our women. The best men are not church-members, though they claim to believe in the God of the Bible, and are not afraid to investigate. We had Jamieson here last winter, and he gave us splendid lectures. Your humble servant and J. W. McCollum had to put up the collateral in both instances. I get very much discouraged telling the truth sometimes, and it would pay me if I could bring myself to be an orthodox hypocrit. JOHN Q. CARTER.

STITZER, WIS., Feb. 14, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been receiving and reading THE TRUTH SEEKER for more than one year, and am well pleased with its contents. My belief is in science as a guide for civilized man, and that theories and doctrins that cannot be demonstrated to be true are unworthy of serious thought, and belong to the superstitious traditions and teachings of primitiv man. Among us the shades of Egypt are holding in bondage the minds of the people. As they bear their chains so willingly, how shall they become free? As bishop has burnt bishop at the stake for place, so the people should bear their burdens hoping for everlasting happiness in another world if their reason can be so directed. WM. A. GRISWOLD.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., Feb. 11, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I read M. Babcock's answer to the Young Men's Christian Association. I enjoyed it very much and wish we had more such men in our midst. It really seems as if such words were enough to convert any true person to truth. If some patent medicin man could invent a medicin that would digest words in a Christian brain, he would be the savior of this world, but I am afraid it is hopeless, as they swallow them by the dozen, and they should be taken one at a time, and slow at that, until a healthy digestion is accomplished. Your paper is one of the best as well as one of the most truly religious papers in the world.

CHARLES SACH.

SALEM, IOWA, Feb. 21, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I want to tell you and the readers of your valuable paper of the intellectual feast that we had on the 5th and 6th of the present month, in listening to the three lectures of Samuel P. Putnam in Fort Madison, Iowa, a distance of twenty-five miles from our place, through the rain and sleet; but we felt amply rewarded for our trouble.

Putnam is a little Samson in our ranks, and I think he was effectual in removing the superstition from the minds of some of his hearers.

My husband is seventy-seven years of age, and my age is sixty-four, and we are both strong in the belief of the Nine Demands of Liberalism. CHARLOTTE SHELDEN.

ALLEGHENY CITY, PA., Feb. 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Having read with great pleasure your most worthy paper for the past two years, I congratulate you for the success you hav had with the same. It ought to be read by a great many more Liberals. I favor the cartoons, as they are very entertaining, as well as instructiv. We all hav enough to do for the advancement of the grand Freethought movement, free speech, and equal rights. Independence and freedom were once won for us, but in the nineteenth century we hav to fight another battle—a battle for our rights, the rights of man. I am happy to think that we are gaining ground. I can see a bright day, and that not very far in the future, when the people of this country will hav to respect our noble Declaration of Independence and Constitution.

Mr. Seymour is with us for to-morrow afternoon, and Mr. Reynolds in the evening. C. R. GRIFFITH.

CHICAGO, ILL., Feb. 7, 287.

MR. EDITOR: I received a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER sent me some time ago, for which, thank you. I buy your paper every week from Mr. F. F. Follett, 302 State street. I could not do without it. It seems that the most dreary, lonesome time in my life was when I was out in the Rocky Mountains where THE TRUTH SEEKER was not to be had. The pictures are very, very good. My Christian friends are afraid that God will damn them if they read the paper, but they cannot resist looking at the pictures, —I or no —I. A highly educated and prominent lawyer of this city has renounced Catholicism. After reading a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER he said: "It is the only paper that I hav ever seen worth subscribing for." So much for your paper, regardless of what those gentlemen Peter Friedrichs, D. B. Phillips, and J. R. Davis, hav written you. Perhaps they are to be pitied rather than blamed. They hav been taught to believe in that obscene old book, and the crimes sanctioned by it, and they hav not the courage to renounce the gods and all their crimes. STELLA CAMPBELL.

STRASBURG, ILL., Feb. 24, 287.

MR. EDITOR: J. E. Remsburg delivered his lectures here as announced last week. David Siberts and lady came in a wagon through the Illinois mud ten miles to hear him; Mr. Lugar, from Seigal, nine miles away, attended both lectures; Uncle Bill Storm and his four boys walked five miles to hear the lecture. Judge Brackin, eighty-two years of age, occupied the chair, and his gray hairs gave dignity to the occasion.

Mr. Stewardson and Mr. Shelton made music on the violins, Miss Ida York on the organ, Mr. Seymour on the bones. Miss Pearl York and Miss Emma Martin closed the first evening with song; John Brackin, J. N. Storm, and myself took up the collection. We did not hav twelve basketfuls left, but, after paying all expenses, we hav $6.70 left. The worst recommendation that I can giv Mr. Remsburg is that Christians feel hurt because he did not say something that they could find fault with. You may want to know how I enjoyed it. If you do, just ask some old Methodist how he felt when he was born again. He can tell you, for he is used to describing his feelings. A. YORK.

VISALIA, CAL., Feb. 14, 287.

MR. EDITOR: It is with regret we learn that the Boontonites are not likely to press the case against our champion, C. B. Reynolds. They are quite willing to avoid an exposure of their bigotry in the secular courts, with the eyes of the whole civilized world on them. Would that Mr. Reynolds could force them to the issue, affording Mr. Ingersoll another opportunity to shed the brilliant light of his grand intellect on the benighted of mankind.

I would like to draw your attention to two publications by Ignatius Donnelly, entitled, "Atlantis" and "Ragnarok." They not only explain many of the legends and traditions of savage races, but show that much of the Old Testament or Jewish scriptures is virtually history, though badly mutilated. Mr. Donnelly's theory of the drift is well supported, not only by the relations of the legends from two hemispheres, but by the sciences of astronomy, geology, and paleontology. It is, in fact, the first work successfully harmonizing science and the Bible, or a large portion of it, which would be gratifying to Christians, if they would read it, and edifying to all.

IPSWICH, DAK., Feb. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $4—$3 to apply on my subscription, and the balance for books, as per order. Please excuse negligence for not remitting sooner. I assure you I could not get along without the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, and hail with joy its weekly visits. It is the only intellectual friend I hav, outside my own family and one or two old men who, like myself, are ripening fast for the grave, for our long and peaceful slumber. I hav been trying to get at least one subscriber, but, alas! not even one. There are a few who would like to take the paper, but are too poor. Others hav not the moral courage to step out and assert their rights in this God-forsaken, priest-ridden community. They hav tried their best to ruin me and my business, but as I am now getting better acquainted, I quite often hear it is said, "I would rather deal with Brown, because I can depend on what he tells me." So I am strong in the faith that truth may yet prevail.

With many good wishes to you and all the lovers of truth up and down the broad land, and hoping Brother Heston's shadowing forth the folly of the old Jew book may never grow less, I remain, A truth seeker and Materialist,

A. J. BROWN.

BRAIDWOOD, ILL., Feb. 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I like your course with THE TRUTH SEEKER; it is at its best, and you appear to be able to keep it there. Your course in the Anarchist trials is correct. People here publicly express the belief that that bomb was thrown by a Pinkerton thug, and the pieces of the shell are said to compare with a pattern of United States ware shell cast at the Potomac arsenal. How did Anarchists get that shell? A lawyer here said to me, speaking of the trial, after having carefully read the proceedings, "It is as big a farce as I ever saw."

And now a few words to Mr. Goodell, of Sacramento. Since the war I hav lived in a mining town; hav seen strike after strike, but I hav never known strikers to injure property. During one strike we had quite a number of buildings burnt, mostly belonging to citizens of the place. An old rookery or so belonging to the coal company was burnt. The coal company made a great cry for the militia, but the town council thought they could do a little in the way of protecting property. They put on an efficient night watch. In a few nights a gentleman was caught under a large dry-goods store in the act of setting it on fire. You will say he was a striking miner. No, he was not. Was he a citizen of the town? No. He was a farm hand in from the country, and he was not seen in town till he was caught under the building. But a coal company lawyer cleared him all the same.

And now a few questions to Mr. Pfarrer, of Springfield, Ill. During the Gould strikes on the Southwestern railroads Pinkerton's thugs were at East St. Louis. A number of people had been over to St. Louis for groceries. On coming back they were fired into; five or six were killed, and others wounded. Who committed this murder? Again, the day before the Haymarket meeting a body of unarmed people were fired into near the McCormick Reaper works, and three or four killed and others wounded. Who did that shooting? During the butchers' strike at the stock-yards, Armour had Pinkerton's thugs there. When they were being sent away, a lone boy was seen on the sidewalk—was fired at and killed. Who committed that murder? At Jersey City another boy has been shot. Who protects these criminals? And why are they not prosecuted?

Mayor Harrison was at the Haymarket meeting, and there told the chief of police that it was a lawful and a law-abiding meeting. Therefore the police had no business there, neither had the bomb-thrower.

Whose property has been injured by strikers? I hear of none. By what authority does Bill Pinkerton keep that band of thugs? I know of no law for it.

Heston's pictures are splendid. F. B.

FONTANA, KAN., Feb. 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me a catalog of books—Liberal and scientific works—and discount straight, as I want about $15 or $20 worth of them myself; and as I went out last night and heard the voices of three ministers at one time in three different houses, I concluded to put the truth in the hands of all that I can. I went to the Baptist church Friday night, and the preacher in his sermon requested the members of the church to go around and solicit all their friends to come to their church and tell them of the goodness of God, etc., but if they met an Infidel, just pass him by, for they would be fooling away their time talking with him. Then he looked around at me, and remarked that almost any fool could ask the best of lawyers questions that he could not answer (I had been asking the preachers in this town some hard questions). He also compared a skeptic to a buzzard, that would sail over all the nice, living, fat cattle and pounce down on the carcass of a dead one and there satisfy his gluttonous wants. But there was one argument, he said, that they could not answer, and that was this: If the Christians were right, the skeptic would lose his soul; and if they were not right, they would lose nothing but their works. After we were dismissed, I approached the minister and told him that I accepted the comparison he had made between me and the buzzard, and therefore I would pounce upon him. I said that I thought his unanswerable argument expressed a great deal of doubt about the divinity of his cause and showed that he only worshiped through fear that the skeptics were not right. For my part, I was not afraid. He bade me Good-night. F. D. MILLER.

CLIFTON, KAN., Feb. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I send you five dollars for THE TRUTH SEEKER for two years.

Here in the West the farmers are waking up of late, forming Farmers' Alliances, shipping their own grain and other products. The grain buyers had formed a pool, making a basis of three cents per bushel the price for shipping corn, and as much more as they could make; on other grain and hogs and cattle in proportion, and the farmers got tired of it and kicked. Within the last month five Farmers' Alliances hav been organized here in Washington county, along the line of the railroads. At first the pool-buyers said the farmers could not hold together, and would not amount to anything; but they hav already got up scales and office and to-day commenced shipping grain at this point, with very favorable prospects. All along the line of the Central Branch of the Pacific and Kansas Pacific the farmers are taking up the matter of organization in this state, not only for shipping grain, but for political purposes. First, we strike at the effects to free ourselvs from some of the present leeches, and as we grow in strength and numbers will try and reach back at this treacherous villainy of class legislation that has made it possible for a few persons to become millionaires by impoverishing the many. We are beginning to discuss these important questions among the farmers pertaining to transportation, taxation, tariff, and monetary and political economy. We are getting disgusted with our agents in the legislature and Congress; look upon them as a body of political demagogs. We think there are too many lawyers, bankers, and bondholders in these bodies. The people hav been deceived by them. They got there by unjust means, especially the U. S. Senate. JOHN C. HANAN.

DUNDEE, MINN., Feb. 19, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send you $5 to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I would feel lost without your paper, and I am glad to inform you that my wife takes fully as much interest as I do in the paper. I hav earnestly hoped for the Interstate Commerce bill to become a law ever since its first introduction, and now as it is a law I think it will be a great help to the poorer class. I am aware that a common carrier can no more haul freight and passengers at the actual cost of transportation than a merchant can buy goods and sell them again at cost and make a living at it. But whenever a merchant sells to some of his customers at double profit, he can sell to just that many at cost, and thus favor his chosen ones and be as well off financially as if he had charged all the same, so long as he is not caught at it, or so long as the poorer or unfortunate ones cannot help it. But this is not justice! Now there is a clause in Section 22 of the above-named law which I think unjust. It reads as follows—viz., "Nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit any common carrier from giving reduced rates to ministers of religion." Now, take the common carrier in the same view as we hav taken the merchant. If they only charge a living profit for carrying passengers, they cannot carry ministers at reduced rates and make a living at it. This no one should ask of the common carriers. Then if they make a reduction below living profit for ministers, they must charge just so much more to the rest in order to liv themselvs, which is not doing justice to the rest of the passenger traffic. Now, we hav it. There are but two ways the common carrier can make reductions for ministers; one way beats the rest of the people, all but the ministers themselvs, and the other way beats the common carrier. I say, beat neither; but charge all the same—and only a living profit—ministers and all. You ask for names of Liberals; find list inclosed. C. W. BANTA.

BAVARIA, KAN., Feb. 21, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Friend Putnam has been here, and given us seven lectures in this county, two in Brookville, three in Salina, and two in Bavaria, with good houses in all the places. We had at Bavaria an example of Christian tolerance, as they hav been telling us they had a great deal of it. As soon as they found we were going to hav Freethought lectures here they took up a petition to the county superintendent of public instruction, asking to hav the schoolhouse closed, so we could not use it for Infidel meetings, it being the only building here large enough for any meeting. Christians hav used it ever since it was built, seventeen years ago, for a church. Thanks to the school officers, the scheme did not work, and we had our meetings at the schoolhouse, and it was the best advertisment that could hav been given us, as the house was not large enough to hold all who came, and many went home without being able to hear the speaker.

Two very devout Christians took so great an interest in Mr. Putnam's last lecture that they could not keep from interrupting him. One was moved by the spirit of the Jewish God, the other by the spirit of—well, corn, I suppose; but Mr. Putnam answered them very satisfactorily to the Freethinkers. I hav not known of any of the honest Christians sanctioning the actions of these men. We had thought that intelligent Kansas was a long way ahead of New Jersey, but, from all indications, we must wait before we claim it.

Perhaps it would hav been the best thing for us here if the Christians had succeeded, as then we would hav built a hall of our own as a public hall open for everything. We will soon hav one here. Our thanks are due to the school officers, also the young men here, as they hav attended all of our meetings, and set a good example for some of the older Christians to follow, by listening, and not interrupting or making any disturbance.

We hope, by honest and fair dealing, to show our Christian friends we do not need a Jewish God to control us, but depend upon doing right to our fellow-man for our salvation, if any is necessary. T. H. TERRY,

Sec. pro. tem. Bavaria Secular Union.

CEDAR FALLS, IOWA, Feb. 11, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: By reference to your files of 1880, and, I think, for the month September in that year, you will find an article written by me, entitled, "Cain's Wife—Who was She?" In that article I broached the new and startling discovery (startling to Christians) that the Bible teaches in plain and unmistakable language that in the beginning there were two separate and distinct creations of men and women; that, as the closing and final act in the six days' work of creation, a pair—a man and a woman—were created, made, and formed, and brought upon the stage of the green earth, and then and there received their instructions both as to what they should eat and what they should do. The making of that pair was the last act in the work of creation on the sixth day.

On the seventh day, God being weary, he took a rest.

And, coming upon the scene of his six days' labors on the morning of the eighth day, he failed to find his man and woman. They had skipped and gone over to the land of Nod. Hence he found it necessary to make another pair—another man and woman. For it was on the eighth day that God said, "There is not a man found to till the ground." Accordingly God proceeded at once to make another pair. It should be observed, however, that entirely different methods were used in the creation or manufacture of those two pairs of human beings.

The first pair came by the first method, while the second pair, called Adam and Eve, were manufactured, and each out of different materials, the woman coming several days after Adam, as time was required for him to dry sufficiently for practical purposes.

Now, let any critical Bible student read Gen. i and ii carefully, and he must arrive at the same conclusion as herein set forth.

Nevertheless, I claim priority over all, theologians, Bible commentators, or others, in making and publishing to the world this idea—this fact of a double creation, at different times and by different methods. These wonderful and startling facts were first published to the world in the year of grace 1880, in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

And now comes Dr. T. W. Chambers, an eminent writer and theologian of the regular orthodox persuasion, and in his critical notes an Genesis, written in the light of modern literary and scientific research (soon after my discovery was published), referring likewise to the documentary views of the modern "high critics" (evidently referring to my notes), saying, "as he pointed out a seeming difference in style at Gen. i and ii," that there is evidently here a change in style, "a transition to a new division, or, as some suppose, to a mere document which Moses was divinely directed to use in making his record."

The editor of the Sunday-School Times, where I find Dr. Chambers's views briefly set forth, also says that from time to time critical side-light articles hav been added by eminent specialists in the line of the Sunday-school lessons, etc. Now, what is this but an acknowledgment from these theologians and would-be teachers that they hav already received considerable light from those not reckoned as orthodox believers in all the traditional teachings heretofore imposed upon them by the church? Well, we are glad to see them adopting our views, but what we complain of is that they are thus stealing our thunder without giving us due credit for our discoveries, and appropriating to themselvs what has cost us much study and scientific research.

It was my intention at the start to hav the article containing my important discoveries copyrighted, but, owing to a press of business at that time, it was neglected; and now, finding that those views are becoming popular with theologians and others, while we secretly rejoice, we still think that no Christian has any just right to appropriate our discoveries to his own use without giving us due credit.

FENNIMORE, WIS., Feb. 16, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am not a subscriber to your paper, but intend to be soon. You sent me a few sample copies, which I hav circulated freely and carefully.

What first prompted me to write you is this. In your "Letters from Friends," I notice many of them admit to being "Infidels." This word is hateful to me. I am a Freethinking Moralist, as near as I know what the term means, but I'm a Liberal anyhow, and can't help it. I'm not Infidel to my friends, my neighbor, my patients (being a physician), my wife, or my country. As to being Infidel to my God, I am not aware that I am under any obligation to take Webster's definition, any more than I am obliged to take his definition of freedom. As I am credibly informed, once upon a time, when a woman with a child at her breast was running through a tangled cypress swamp for freedom, with a bloodhounds upon her track, Mr. Webster took the side of the bloodhounds and called it liberty. I wish that all Liberals could regard the name "Infidel" in the same light I do; but if they can't I'll not put them upon the Christian rack, nor burn nor crucify them.

I am not posted or in any manner informed of the nature of the persecution or prosecution of a Mr. Reynolds. If the case stands as I am led to understand it, I would like to contribute to the fund for his defense, if there be such a fund. How can I find out?

As to the cartoons of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I can say "Amen" to them. They constitute a literature of themselvs that is quicker read and easier comprehended than anything that is written, and are also more expressiv, because they appeal to the eye as well as the understanding.

I will not presume to giv advice to Liberals, but will tell them my plan of working.

We are aware that it would be the personification of foolishness to attempt to convert an old, straight-backed Calvinist to reason.

My plan is a "still hunt" among the young, from ten to twenty years of age, and the more intelligent the better. I place Liberal literature in their hands, and it is so new and strange to them that they read it with avidity and ask for more. Thus the good seed is sown; and some, at least, will fall upon good ground. I find that the more intelligent young men are Liberal from nature, Sunday-schools and preachers to the contrary notwithstanding.

All the youug people want is a starter, a place to begin; they liv in an atmosphere that is repulsiv to their nativ sense of justice, common sense, and decency.

Reasoning from my success in this matter, I would advise all Liberals to make the acquaintance and court the friendship of all the bright boys they can, and place all the inducements possible in their hands of looking up their own interests, and let the blockheads go into the church for preachers or religious editors. D. O. PICKARD, M.D.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., Feb. 20, 287.

MR. EDITOR: The worthy secretary of the American Secular Union has come and gone, and he has left the Liberals of this vicinity feeling encouraged. The fact is, even the most sanguin Liberals did not know that there were so many Liberals in this community as there are. It is safe to say there are no less than one hundred, Salina being the center. The Opera House of Salina was comfortably filled for three evenings to hear Mr. Putnam's brilliant, flowery, logical, and poetical lecture; and another marked feature of those meetings was that the audience applauded to the echo as if it were a political gathering. A Secular Union was organized at Salina with about thirty-six members, of which your humble servant is one, along with the rest, Dr. Houser being appointed to procure the charter and issue the call for the first meeting as soon as the above document is received.

I took it on myself to make some pleasant calls with Mr. Putnam upon several distinguished citizens. Mr. Putnam went where I led the way, and my acquaintance in the town at this time was very limited. Mr. Putnam made a very extensiv sale of books at Salina. We learn that they had crowded houses at Brookville and Bavaria, all three of those meetings being a brilliant success. What can the Christian expect when the prayer of the righteous availeth naught? It will be remembered that just before Mr. Putnam started he uttered a prayer that he might not come in contact with any wind-storms or cyclones; but he did with onc of the worst gales that hav been in this part of Kansas for the last seven years, which spoiled our meeting at New Cambria, so much so we left my humble home but a few steps with the lecturer, and turned back and took shelter under its roof for the night, but we learn since that there was an audience of twenty or thirty, awaiting our arrival at William's Hall. I felt very much disappointed, as I had the honor of arranging this meeting. I suggest to the auxiliaries of the American Secular Union they must not expect too much from organization at once, but must hav patience and remember all new movements must hav growth which requires time. Remember the short life of the Grange and other organizations that lacked patience. Don't expect any more for the present than that our meetings will be a place of social amusement and education of the young, and an exchange of ideas, thereby improving one another; and remember that we can do this much cheaper than the churches, because we will hav no minister's salary to pay, every one being his own spokesman with us. We can hold entertainments and make them self-supporting, and we can also be able to decide, when we hav an occasional lecturer from abroad, whether we can't replenish our treasury instead of a few having to bear the burden of the expenses, as it is where no organizations hav been perfected.

But the most important thing about organization is in being ready to act in a body the moment an opportunity is offered to accomplish something; and as a proof that our worthy secretary is aware that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty" we hav only to call your attention to his fight for the opening of the museums in New York on Sundays. He has succeeded in making this a political question of the municipal government of the city of New York. So he has the peculiar faculties of forcing our demands on the body politic, and, I fear, much faster than Liberals will make up their minds to follow where he leads the way; and I want you all to understand one thing: we can never accomplish the Nine Demands without a political effort, and as nine issues are greater than one or two, you must make up your minds to sacrifice one or the other, if need be. By this means you can hasten the day of equal and exact justice.

JOHN W. ABBOTT.

AURORA, O., Feb. 22, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav concluded to inclose a short article I published in my county paper as a schedule of part of my belief. I see by the two pages of "Letters from Friends"—a most interesting part of your paper—that there are many Liberal farmers. They may be as desirous to read something on agricultural questions as on greenback, temperance, and financial matters. There are no subjects of more vital importance than the ones merely glanced at in this communication. Is it not a strange anomaly that in the labor discussions that hav grown so fierce in the last few years the farmer is seldom included among the different classes of labor? He is generally left out of sight.

I am nearing fourscore, and until the last year hav not thought of finishing a day's work with eight or ten hours. I hav earned what I am worth and much more that is wasted and spent on others. Society and government, by their burdens and taxations, hav failed to strengthen themselvs lately in my affections, and I begin to feel like challenging their demands.

I like to read in your correspondence anything that shows what my fellow-Liberals are at home. This article may help them to some hints about myself. So please put my name to the article if you deem it worthy of publication. It was published in the Portage County Democratic Press, Ohio.

Yours, N. EGGLESTON.

THE LOAD THE FARMER CARRIES.

MR. EDITOR: Is it any wonder the farmers of all nations, in all times, hav gone down under the weights imposed upon them? Is it any wonder the American farmer begins to stagger? And yet the blessed creatures never did, and do not now, know what ails them; or rather suppose that nothing is the matter so long as when they go to town some rich banker condescends to stop and ask about the health of their families and the condition of their crops. They do not understand the relation between those crops and the notes upon which the banker grows rich, but remember with thankfulness how the banker overlooked their coarse garments, and smiled graciously upon them. Such notice pays for a large instalment of toil, while it is the cheap return offered by idleness and luxury to those who create everything.

The farmer not only makes the country, he makes cities, he makes the world. He makes the sun and all the stars. If it were not for him they would be of no use. They might as well go out, and they would go out. He not only has given perfume to the jasmin and color to the roses; he is the creator of all roses and gardens and fields of grain. The banker and railroader only manipulate and transfer and exchange what he creates, and get rich; while he grows poor and poorer, until he is broken down, overburdened, and crushed under the load of parasites that swarm on him. So went under the once industrious and noble farmers of the Euphrates, of the Nile and northern Africa, and of Italy and Spain—and they drew down in their ruin the many wonderful cities that had forgotten their makers and creators in the days of their vanity and blindness.

The farmer treads the wine-press, but does not drink the wine. He makes the tapestry and the carpets and the laces, but daintier feet and hands cannot spare him room upon their rich, soft figures, or share their loveliness with him. He builds railroads, colleges, and churches, Euclid avenues and Fifth avenues. He does more; he maintains all the vermin and parasites that infest them, all the worthless, unworked classes, and the courts and penitentiaries that keep them in order. Cabinets and legislatures, mines and manufactures, would starve without his crops. Had he no further stent than to support himself, he could do it as he once did, and be a gentleman again.

But I hav not much hope for him. I confess that some signs are favorable. But most of the men who come to the front in our agricultural schools, institutes, and provision law making, are not the best farmers of the country. They are men whose dispositions are distressed greatly by close application to home work.

Again, the strikes in our cities and mines are operating indirectly most severely upon the farmer; more so than upon the classes against which they are directly aimed. Agriculture is not yet ready to sing the song of eight hours, or ten hours, for a day's work. The idle world demands of the farmer fourteen hours at least, or eviction, and his ears never hear a swell of sympathy.

Higher wages mean more burdens and higher taxes for the agriculturist. They mean less crops, less work, less profits, and more mortgages on the land. They mean abandonment of the old homestead, removals, tears, and extinguishment. Higher wages and less time for field hands, besides all this, encourage idleness and unsteady and expensiv habits among those training for farm life.

By almost universal consent the dissolute machinery of society and government is running adversely to the welfare of labor on farms, and the laborer is fast hastening the way toward the doom of his forgotten predecessors.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

One by One.

One by one, the moments whirl us
Swiftly down life's restless stream,
One by one, we're passing onward
Through the darkness and the gleam.

One by one, the hours are speeding,
Never halting on their way;
One by one, while youth and pleasnre
All may vainly bid them stay.

One by one, the days are fading,
Weeks and months roll into years,
One by one, they fill the record
Of time's memories, smiles or tears.

One by one, the leaves expanding
Robe the woods in deepest green;
One by one, at Autumn's summons,
Fading, falling, quit the scene.

One by one, friends on life's journey
Drop asleep to wake no more;
One by one, they fail to greet us
At the erstwhile welcome door.

One by one, oh, may we ever
Lessons learn from time's decay,
One by one, to fill our places
Nobler, worthier every day.

Two Industrious Girls.

TOLEDO, OHIO.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav not written in the Children's Corner for a long time, and so I thought I would write a few lines. I think "The World We Liv In," "A Selfish Girl," and, "Are Your Hands Clean?" are very nice stories. Uncle has "The Story Hour," and I think it is very nice. I hav a book that was given me by a cousin. The title is, "Write Your Own Stories." Every other page has a picture, and opposit are lines to write your story on; and the one that I hav chosen is two little girls, one with a dust-pan and brush and the other with a dusting-cloth. And under the picture are the words, "Brushing Up the Crumbs;" and if you think it good enough, please publish.

Your little friend, ROSA MCLENITHAN.

These girls are brushing up the crumbs. They are trying to surprise their mother. She is surprised when she comes home. She sees her six-year-old daughter dusting the room and her four-year-old brushing up the crumbs. They don't like it because she came home, but when she calls them in the other room, she givs them candy, and then they say they are glad she came home. After they ate a little of the candy, they went back to dusting and sweeping until it was all done. When supper-time came, they helped set the table and get the supper. When supper was ready and their papa came home, he was surprised to see everything so neat and tidy. Weren't they kind to their mother?

Correspondence.

ELLENSBURG, WASH., Jan. 31, 1887.

MISS WIXON: My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for several years. I hav seen so many letters in the Corner, I thought I would write one too. We liv near Yokamo river. In the summer we hav a great time down there. There are rocks of all shapes and kinds, as granit, slate, quartz, basalt, etc. There is no timber except along the river, and back in the mountains. There are balm, alder, dogwood, and other kinds of trees along the river. Back in the mountains are fine fir and tamarack. I am ten years old. I love to read the stories in the Children's Corner, and always read them.

Yours truly, THOMAS W. PARRISH.

LISBON, IA., Feb. 13, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Our school has been out since February 4th. I hav been sawing wood since then. We hav had fine winter weather, but to-day is pretty windy. We liv on a farm two and a half miles south of Lisbon. We hav one hundred and ninety-five acres of land, twenty-five of which is timber. We are the only Liberals in this neighborhood. Pa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since it was printed. I hav four brothers and two sisters. Lisbon is a small town of one thousand inhabitants and five churches. We all like Watson Heston's pictures; this morning we all had to laugh at Nimrod when he treed a 'possum. I will close for this time. EDWIN A. SAILOR.

COLON, MICH., Feb. 28, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I had intended to write before this, but owing to sickness in our family I could not. My Grandpa Powers has been very sick, but he is better now. I was so glad to see Uncle John in the corner again, but ere I got time to reply to him I read in the Children's Corner the sickness and death of little Ralph. I mourn with and for Uncle John in the death of his little Ralph. That is what we all hav got to come to sooner or later—to be laid away in our last resting-place, but we cannot help but mourn for our dear departed ones. I hope that Uncle John won't forget his little TRUTH SEEKER friend in his loss, for I love Uncle John and all THE TRUTH SEEKER friends. I wish to send my love to Uncle John. In the last Corner I read about "Pets," by Seward Mitchell, and some day, with your permission, I want to hav a little talk with him about pets, for I think by talking with the pen we become acquainted with each other. I am glad to see that Mr. Putnam has started out again on his round of travels, and I wish he could drop in on us some day, but I don't expect any such pleasure is in store for us. I send my best respects to all the Children's Corner friends. I will close with love to you.

Sincerely yours, FRANCES B. CORNWALL.

[Yes; you may talk with any of our correspondents, but please be brief, as you see our space is limited.—ED. C. C.]

HARRISBURG, PA., Feb. 14, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I suppose you thought it strange not to hear from me after so kindly publishing my story, but nevertheless I wrote to you a day after THE TRUTH SEEKER containing it reached me, thanking both you and Mr. Cozine for the kind attention given my story. But it is a mystery to me why you did not receive the letter, for, soon after I mailed it, it was returned to me unclaimed. The address was correct, being the same as stated at the top of the Corner; and not till now did I find an opportunity to write you again. I don't understand why Mr. Cozine asked for my full address in THE TRUTH SEEKER, when he did not want to write to me, as I complied with his request, and that was the last I heard of Mr. Cozine. As it is not our custom to depend on God, I will just hav to hope you will receive this letter.

HERMAN S. TAUSIG.

[It must hav been owing to some mistake that the letter did not come to hand, as our mail is large, and we never knew such a thing to happen to a letter of ours before. In regard to D. B. Cozine, his conduct is inexplicable. To offer prizes and then fail to comply with his own terms, nor even to deign an explanation of his conduct, is very strange, to say the least. He cannot be a true Liberal, for we never knew one to be guilty of such wrong-doing. To deceive a child in such a manner is the hight of meanness. But let us charitably think that his mind may be unbalanced or that he has become a member of some religious body where they wink at such things. Liberals are of better material.—ED. C. C.]

CLEVELAND, O., Feb. 12, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As you were kind enough to print my other letter, I thought I would write again. I spent six weeks with my auntie. While there, mother moved to Cleveland, Ohio. I came home and started to school here. It was just examination, but I went through with it, and was promoted. I did not expect it, for I had been here for such a short time. I like the school here better than either of the schools I hav attended, because they do not make us keep our hands behind us. They let us sit the way we like. I attend the Case avenue school. My mother got married while I was in Springfield, and my stepfather is a Presbyterian, and would like to hav me attend Sunday-school regularly, but mother runs the Sunday-school business. Mother says I can go sometimes to please him. She says it won't hurt me to go sometimes. The more I go, the less I think of the way they do. I went last Sunday, and the superintendent said that when we go along streets and see so many cards on the door with diphtheria on, we ought to come to Sunday-school and be good. They cannot scare me that way. It is the money they want. They are building a new church, and want a great deal of money. I hav a little friend living in Illinois somewhere. Her name is Nora Carter, and if she sees THE TRUTH SEEKER I would like to hav her write to me. My address is 975 Payne ave., Cleveland, O. I am going to send you some verses mother wrote. She wrote them just for fun. I asked her for them, and she gave them to me to do what I pleased with them. I wanted to send them to you and hav them printed with my letter, if you think it worth while. I close my letter hoping you will think it worthy a place in the Children's Corner. ETHEL VANETTA.

They say that I am drifting away from all things good,
Drifting away from heaven, drifting away from God;
Drifting away from righteousness, drifting away from truth,
Drifting away from everything they taught me in my youth.

They say I am drifting onward, far out into the night,
Drifting away in darkness, drifting away from the light;
Ever drifting downward, farther from the sky,
Drifting away from God's mercy, drifting on to die.

I know that I hav drifted far out on the bay,
But with the lamp of reason to light me on the way,
And freedom for companion, with truth and right to guide,
I think I'll float on safely, and come in with the tide.

What is Evolution?

Evolution is a pretty big word, but your minds are capable, I am sure, of taking in its import.

It means, briefly expressed, to grow, to unfold by degrees, little by little, step by step. The world was not made in a year, nor in six thousand years, as was formerly taught, but, as has been told you before, it has been growing slowly for millions of years—is still growing and developing?

Plants and animals did not attain their present state all at once. They hav been growing—evoluting—and are yet some ways off from perfection.

Linnæus and Buffon were the first among modern naturalists who taught gradual growth or evolution.

Low types of life existed first, like the mollusks that are found in the very oldest rocks; after them came certain kinds of fishes, and then the water animals appeared; following them came crawling and slimy serpents, hideous reptils, and then the mammals. Mammals means those creatures that nurse their babies, like the cow, the cat, and the goat. The word mamma is derived from mammal, and you can see readily how like it is to it. Man, the highest species of animals, came last, but the first race, or primitiv man, was not of the same order that you see to-day. Far different. But there was that in him that foretold what is to-day, as every form of life has shadowed that which was to come after.

Through many changes, variations of climate, food, battles with enemies, and many other causes, organic life has developed, the stronger and best fitted to liv surviving the weak and inperfect organisms. Darwin calls this "the survival of the fittest," and "natural selection."

Everything advances in the most perfect order, and is subject always to law and government. Through successiv stages of reptil, beast, and savage, the human being has come, and when you see a man or child behaving like a brute, you must be sorry for that one, because he has not yet developed properly, and is still showing very plainly that he is in the order of evolution.

You ask what it is that has caused all the great changes in nature. The two great causes are Force and Matter, and I guess we shall hav to call them the parents, the father and mother of the universe.

Evolution, or growth, or progress, whatever we may call it, is a great study, and when you are older, and your minds stronger, you must read the works of the great writers on the subject, and use your eyes in observing plants and animals; the elements, as fire, air, water; and studying about their habits and ways in a wild condition, and also when domesticated; note the difference, and draw your own conclusions. You hav reason and intelligence, and, of course, reason and intelligence are intended for use or exercise, and to make us good and useful citizens of the world in which we liv. S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—What is the meaning of the word evolution? Was the world made in six thousand years? How long has it been growing? Is it finished yet? What modern naturalists taught evolution first? Name the oldest forms of life. Name the next. What is the meaning of mammal? What word hav we from it? What is the last species called? Was the early man like the present type? Tell the causes of progress. What does Darwin call this? What is subject to law and government? Through what changes has man come? When must we be sorry? Can you tell the two prominent causes of change? What shall we call them? What ought we to observe and study?

SPIRITUALISM Sustained By the Bible.

BY COL. JOHN R. KELSO.

CONTENTS:

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE BIBLE.
SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.
SPIRITUALISM A NECESSITY IN GOD'S GENERAL GOVERNMENT.
SPIRITUAL MEDIUMSHIP.
OBJECTIONS TO SPIRITUALISM ANSWERED.

Like all THE TRUTH SEEKER'S publications, the mechanical execution of the work is all that could be desired. Good paper, clear type—in short, a neat little volume.

The primary object of the work, as its title indicates, is to sustain Spiritualism, but the absurdities of the Christian religion, and the abominations of the old Jew book, get a terrible shaking up. The book contains much to interest every intelligent reader. . . . Colonel Kelso has done much acceptable work in the cause of Freethought and Liberalism all over the land. Send for his new book—read it—put it into the hands of every Christian; it will teach him that the way of the fool is foolishness. Every Liberal who reads it will certainly find his "Spiritual" strength renewed.—John Peck.

New Books.

THE FATHERS OF OUR REPUBLIC: Paine, Jefferson, Washington, and Franklin. By John E. Remsburg. Published by J. P. Mendum, Investigator office, Boston, Mass.

This work seems to me the best vindication of Thomas Paine I hav ever seen. We constantly hear from the orthodox pulpit (and, I am sorry to say, sometimes from the Unitarian) that Thomas Paine was a blatant blasphemer. This little work shows him to be one of the most reverent of men. Of course, we know such defamer has never read "The Age of Reason," or any other book written by its author. Neither could such a one be persuaded to do so, but if every Freethinker could possess himself of a copy of this work, there is so little of it, and at the samc time so much in its substance, it certainly would be easy to persuade such a one to read it. It proves itself—no argument is required. Thomas Paine, if living to-day, would be eminently fitted to occupy any liberal pulpit.

Very littlc is said of the Infidelity of Thomas Jefferson by the Christian world. I am glad Mr. Remsburg has made his unbelief so apparent. In these days, when so much is said (and wisely and truthfully) of Jeffersonian democracy, it would be well to understand Jeffersonian religion. I think a true Democrat cannot, in the nature of things, be an orthodox Christian. This little memoir also proves itself, and needs no argument. In the two remaining "Fathers," Washington and Franklin, the same lack of Christian belief is apparent. Every device has been resorted to to get Washington into heaven, but without success—that is, if one must believe that he must be willing to go to hell before he is fitted for heaven. I hav not as much veneration for Washington as for Paine or Jefferson, but am perfectly willing he should be an inhabitant of the same place with all the unbelievers in the world of spirits. I suppose there will be no pursuit of fugitivs there. Of Franklin, who Theodore Parker used to say was the greatest man America ever produced, I am glad to see Mr. Remsburg has fairly placed him with the Infidels. What a grand set of men and women are already in that company! Let us do what we can to increase their number, and let me say to all Freethinkers that one very efficient way to do it is to scatter this pamphlet, "The Fathers of Our Republic," broadcast. LUCY N. COLMAN.

Syracuse, N. Y., Feb. 20, 287.

I hav been reading this last lecture, "The Fathers of Our Republic," with more than ordinary interest.

Everybody who knows Mr. Remsburg is well aware that he never hits wide of the mark, and always hews to the line of his subject. All his lectures are like bright coins from the mint, but this is a real gem, more precious than gold. In the time of battle arms are of more consequence than gold, and this lecture will prove a real weapon in the hand of every Freethinker engaged in the great struggle for equal rights and mental liberty.

Every reader of Christian literature knows how often Thomas Paine has been referred to as a "scoffer" and an "Atheist." Ever since his death, few sermons hav been considered complete without a reference to the "awful death of Tom Paine." In a recent sermon Talmage repeated the stale lie.

So, too, it has been claimed that the fathers of the republic were all Christiaus. Washington prayed at Valley Forge, and before the commencement of each battle of the Revolution in which he was engaged; therefore he was a Christian.

The convention which framed the Constitution was opened by prayer; therefore every member of the convention, and all who took a prominent part in the thrilling events of the Revolution, including Jefferson and Franklin, were also Christians—and therefore this is a Christian country.

No men hav been more lied about, vilified, and misrepresented than Paine, Jefferson, Washington, and Franklin. For these lies and misrepresentations the religious press and the clergy are responsible. With few exceptions, the church-going people hav heard Paine denounced as an Atheist, and Jefferson, Washington, and Franklin claimed as Christians.

Nothing would do more to break down the confidence of all right-minded people in the Christian press and the clergy than to know that it has lied about these moving spirits of the Revolution, and grossly perverted the facts of history, and that the Bible expounders (or pounders) in their zeal to build up the church hav lied to deceive the people.

This lecture is a full and complete refutation of these foul slanders and misrepresentations, and scatters them like chaff in a cyclone. What is more, there is no such thing as making a flank movement on the evidence. It nails these oft-repeated lies of the clergy to the counter as base coin.

In brief, it is like dropping a cannon-ball through a spider-web. Not a shred or shadow of these threadbare lies is left to giv them the semblance of truth.

Ministers will never stop their lies until the people become better informed in regard to these matters.

All know that Mr. Remsburg has done as much real, solid, and effectual work as any man in the lecture-field, and we are under renewed obligations to him for this last lecture.

Freethinkers can do the cause and Mr. Remsburg no greater service than to hav a half-dozen copies of this lecture doing missionary work in every neighborhood.

It forms a neat pamphlet of between forty and fifty pages, and is for sale at the Investigator office, Paine Hall, Boston.

JOHN PECK.

THE CONFLICT BETWEEN CHRISTIANITY AND CIVILIZATION.

It has been a genuin source of pleasure to me to read a pamphlet with the above title, written by W. S. Bell, 302 State st., Chicago, Ill., and sold at fifteen cents per single copy.

Brother Bell has put in a clear form his allegations against the arrogant assumptions of the Christian church, and proves beyond the peradventure of a doubt that this church has always stood in opposition to every reform that had for its object either the liberty of the mind or body from the chronic oppressions of tyrannical customs and superstitions.

W. S. Bell, in a concise and clear manner, in this instructiv pamphlet, allows history to tell its own story, and out of the writings of those who hav given to history its most enduring monuments of scientific truth and research, the Christian church and Christian religion is made to appear in its true light, as the tool of oppression, the enemy of progress, and the opponent of every principle or measure that has sought, or that now seeks, the universal establishment of those principles of justice and equity that would follow obedience to its boasted Golden Rule.

Could this pamphlet meet the sale its real merits deserve, it would do much to open the eyes of the blind, and would place at the command of lovers of truth, in concise form, an answer as complete to every false claim of Christians and Christianity as was Stephen Foster's "Brotherhood of Thieves; or, a True Picture of the American Church and Clergy."

This production of W. S. Bell's is just as clear cut and incisiv, though, of course, it lacks that peculiar "horse radish" bite and sting that none but Stephen K. Foster could impart. Pamphlets of this nature are frequently the best educators (especially in this hurried, bustling age) for the reason that very many will take time to read the small collections of well-written, well selected and compiled gems of truth and wisdom that would not take time to read any large, elaborate work or treatis on science or philosophy. In the hope that this little truthful missionary may reach the multitude with its words of truth and soberness, I giv my hearty commendation, GEORGE LYNN.

The grand old TRUTH SEEKER, the organ of the Liberals of the country, founded by D. M. Bennett, and "baptized," if not in his blood, in his sufferings in prison, is still activ and vigorous, and the publishing house connected with the paper is sending out the best of all the Freethought publications.

We acknowledge the receipt of the following books:

"Rational Communism: The Present and the Future Republic of North America." By a Capitalist. Price $1.50. This is a work of nearly 500 pages and deserves a full review, which we hope to giv it in the future. The whole world is now struggling toward co-operation in business, with Communism, brotherhood, affiliation, as an ultimate. The man who cannot see this is not an observer and cannot claim to be even intelligent. "Order of Creation." Price 75 cents. This work givs the articles in the famous controversy concerning the conflict between Genesis and Geology, by Gladstone, Max Muller, Professor Huxley, and others. "Little Lessons for Little Folks." Price 40 cents. This is one of "Aunt Elmina's" (Mrs. E. D. Slenker's) books for chidren, abounding in much useful information upon subjects in which the little people are interested.—Worthington Advance.

We hav received from THE TRUTH SEEKER office a copy of "Little Lessons" for children, from the pen of that charming authoress, Mrs. Elmina Drake Slenker, who has done so much toward making the road to knowledge for the "little ones" pleasant and inviting, for which she deserves the grateful and heartfelt thanks of all who hav the interest of the children at heart. "Little Lessons" is gotten up in handsome style, printed on good paper, large, clear type, bound in boards. Every page is full of interest, not a dull lesson in the whole book. Price 40 cents. THE TRUTH SEEKER, 33 Clinton Place, New York.—The Edgar Post.

How a Hoosier Went a-Hunting.

When the Indiana lawyer, Mr. Stotsenburg, had concluded his series of essays in the Indianapolis Sentinel, maintaining that Sir Philip Francis was Junius, the following fable appeared in the Seymour Republican, purporting to hav been spoken by the spirit of Sir Philip through a medium, and taken down in shorthand by W. H. Burr:

A Hoosier went a-hunting. He got no game. At last he spied a dead animal, with black and white fur. It had been shot by some other fellow, and killed before it could odorize. The Hoosier bagged it. Soon he met some schoolboys.

"See here, boys," said he, "what a funny looking fox I've shot."

"Fox!" said they. "Great Scott! Jerusalem! Julius Cæsar! Do you think we don't know a skunk when we see it?"

MORAL.—When you find a dead skunk don't bag it, but bury it.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

BY GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

News of the Week.

THIRTY-SEVEN men, out of a possible ten thousand, were arrested last Sunday for violating the excise law.

WILLIAM COOK, one of the seven men who organized the Knights of Labor, died in Philadelphia, Sunday, of heart failure, aged sixty-five years.

LAST SUNDAY'S papers reported that Henry Ward Beecher was dying. He had been stricken with apoplexy, and his left side was paralyzed. His family and friends had given up all hope of his recovery. Mr. Beecher lived through Sunday and Monday, though in an unconscious condition. Up to the hour of closing this page, news of his death has not reached this office.

WASHINGTON IRVING BISHOP, the alleged mind-reader, is in New York exhibiting wonderful tricks in psychology. Mr. Montague, of Boston, is here doing the same tricks, which he attributes to muscle-reading.

OLD Mr. Goodman, 76 years of age, a highly-esteemed citizen of Huntsville, Mo., got angry at his wife last Sunday, and struck her on the head with a boot and killed her. When he saw that she was dead, he opened an artery in his arm, and then hanged himself.

EMPEROR WILLIAM, of Germany, is 90 years old on the 22d inst.

THE burning of a steamer on the Tombigbee river, in Alabama, caused the loss of about twenty lives.

THE elections in New South Wales hav resulted in the return to the Legislativ Assembly of 83 free traders and 41 protectionists.

FATHER MCGLYNN has been invited to be the orator of St. Patrick's day. The pope has sent his benediction to the recalcitrant pastor.

THE resolution to submit to the people a constitutional amendment, providing for woman suffrage, has been concurred in by the House by a vote of 52 to 7.

CARRIE FEATHERSTONE, a hallelujah Salvation Army lass, was arrested in Brooklyn the other day. She stole $500 worth of jewelry from a person who had befriended her.

FATHER O'NEIL, a Roman Catholic priest of Brooklyn, was arrested in this city the other day for being drunk and disorderly. He was literally picked out of the gutter, having got into a fight and been thrown down.

TRADE dollars are to be redeemed by act of Congress. As these dollars are almost entirely out of circulation, the redemption will help no one but the speculators who bought them at a discount. The bill to redeem them is regarded as a corrupt job.

BRAUNSCHWEIG and Schenck, the two wild-mouthed Anarchists who were imprisoned with Herr Most for violent speech-making, were let out last week, and six hundred of their friends gave them a reception. The speeches made at the meeting were about the same as those for which the men were arrested.

DURING the illness of Mayor Hewitt, which has included all the time since his election, Henry R. Beekman, president of the board of aldermen, has been acting mayor. This official has made things very lively for dive keepers, illegal traffickers in liquor, and other evil-doers. It is not generally believed that Mayor Hewitt will be able to do any better.

IN the United States there are 2,269 breweries, which produce annually 460,832,400 gallons, or over seven gallons per head. In Germany there are 23,940 breweries, which produce annually 900,000,000 gallons, or over twenty gallons per her head. In Great Britain there are 26,214 breweries, which produce annually 1,050,000,000 gallons, or over thirty per head.

ABRAHAM EMIGRATES.—Gen. xii, 5.

Gems of Thought.

WHAT influence was it that brought freedom to the manacled slave toiling in the swamps of Georgia or the burning sun of Louisiana? Was it the Protestant church? Was it the Methodists, or the Presbyterians, or the Episcopalians, or the Baptists? Was it any or all of these? No. It was the men who ridiculed the infallibility of the pope, and laughed at the immaculate conception It was the Parkers and Pilsburys, the Garrisons and Phillipses, aided by a host of abolitionists—heretics every one. They read the first line of our grand charter of liberty, and then set free three millions of human beings.—D. M. Bennett.

HOMER saw that the story of Ulysses would not be probable if he represented so great a man as caught by mere songs; so they promis him knowledge, which it was not strange that a man desirous of wisdom should consider dearer than his country. And, indeed, to wish to know every thing of every kind, is natural to the curious; but to be attracted by the contemplation of greater objects, to entertain a general desire for knowledge, ough to be considered a proof of a great man.—Cicero's Chief Gold and Evil.

EVEN now, the great mass of the clergy are accustomed to refer to the fable of the Flood as though it were an actual event, while the more advanced theologians maintain that the Flood was confined to Asia Minor, and the animals carried into the ark were simply a few domestic animals, claiming that the Bible can be interpreted so as to harmonize with this view. They are shameless enough to get a new lease of life for their system by such a statement as this, when the language of the Bible is so clear, so unmistakable, so unequivocal, that no honest man can read the story of the Flood, and doubt that the author meant a deluge extending over the whole earth, and destroying all animals not saved in the ark. —Underwood's Lectures and Essays.

"THE only laws that we know," said Richard Fullerton, "are those which we are slowly finding out for ourselvs in the positiv sciences and that educated, and still to be educated, sense of justice, equity, and respect for humanity, which we embody in codes, and call concretely conscience. It is childish to talk of a devil who tempts us to do evil—humiliating to common sense and manhood to fear eternal punishment if we hav done evil—and what grosser superstition has the world ever seen than the Christian doctrin of God incarnate in man that we might all hav a better chance of heaven?—a better chance, mind you; not a certainty—and the whole universe disturbed that we might be less unfairly handicapped."—Mrs. Linton's Under Which Lord.

How dull it is to pause, to make an end,
To rest unburnished, not to shine in use!
As though to breathe were life. Life piled on life
Were all too little and of one to me.

Little remains: but every hour is saved
From that eternal silence, something more,
A bringer of new things, and vile it were
For some three suns to store and hoard myself.

And this gray spirit yearning in desire
To follow knowledge, like a sinking star,
Beyond the utmost bound of human thought.
—Tennyson's Ulysses.

O, FORTUNE! thou that givest unto each his portion in this dirty planet, bestow (if it shall please thee) coronets and crowns and principalities and purses and pudding and powers upon the great and noble and fat ones of the earth. Grant me that, with a heart of independence, unyielding to thy favors and unbending to thy frowns, I may attain to literary fame; and though starvation be my lot, I will smile that I hav not been born a king. (From a letter of date August, 1814, to be found in the third chapter of Life of Thomas Carlyle by James Anthony Froude.)

ATHEISM claims the right to think and the right to speak the thought, without any penalty being imposed upon the thinker. It denies that there is any subject so sacred that it should not be investigated; any assertion so authoritativ that it may not be tested. While Christianity proclaims that hell is the preordained punishment for unbelief in doctrins incapable of verification by experience, Atheism asserts that unbelief is a duty where evidence is insufficient, and that faith in dogmas relating to the unknown is foolish credulity.—Mrs. Besant's Gospel of Atheism.

IT may be questioned whether a single man, or even a single priest, preacher or churchman, ever fully "realized" the import of the doctrin that is spoken of as "everlasting punishment in hell." We know the names of single men whom the far-off contemplation of it drove to the madhouse. Nothing but dense ignorance, credulity, mental and moral apathy, wrapping human sensibility about as with the hide of a rhinoceros, enabled them to bear the suggestion of it, and still go on their way believing, hoping, and rejoicing. In proportion as men become intelligent, conscientious, and sensitiv, they throw the incubus off, though with it they cast over creed, church, scripture, and all the associations of religion. For reason is more than all.—Frothingham.

"DID Charley come to see you Sunday night, Ella?" asked Clara. "Why, no; it rained too hard. Did Fred come to see you?" "Certainly. He always comes—rain or shine." "He must be a rain beau, then."

A BOSTON man on the fated Montreal train ran into a saloon at Concord to take a drink and returned to the station just in time to see the rear end of the train as it passed out of the railroad yard. A few hours later his car plunged into the White River. And did that man go down on his knees and swear never to touch another drop? Not so. He took another drink and went back to Boston rejoicing.

A CASE OF REAL DISTRESS.—Bill Snort, of the Crosby County Clarion and Farmer's Vindicator, was in Austin yesterday, and a friend happened to remark that he ought to go and hear a prominent Austin clergyman. "Is he very eloquent?" asked Bill. "Yes, and he flings his arms about very liberally." "Flings his alms about very liberally, does he? Then you bet I'm going. There is no journalist in Texas who needs alms as much as I do."

BLOODY JIM: I am yet.

"I suppose, though, you hav become a dead shot."

"No, I've got an old pistol, but I never load it. I'm afraid it might go off."

"Yet you make your living robbing stages?"

"Yes."

"How do you manage?"

"I tell them to halt, fork over, and they fork."—Omaha World.

A GENTLEMAN owns a fine tract of cedar land not far from Austin, Texas, and a few days ago he was told that some negroes were cutting down the timber, so he rode out to see about it. To his astonishment he found a wealthy white neighbor, with a team and wagon, hauling off the timber. "Why, I am astonished, colonel," said the owner of the land. "I heard that a lot of negroes were stealing my timber, and here I find you, a white man, cutting my timber. You ought to be ashamed of yourself." "Well, to tell you the truth," responded the other party, "I hate to steal timber like a darky, but these cedar trees make such good fence rails that I concluded to drop all pride of race."

SHE KNEW HIM.

She sat beside me at the play
In all her girlish loveliness,
While in the box across the way
A dowager in gorgeous dress

Sat, while the diamonds glittered bright,
On wrinkled neck and shoulders bare;
"Ah, were those gems my own," I cried,
"I'd find for them a place more fair."

"Sweetheart," I whispered, "need I tell
Where I would hav those gems repose?"
She faltered not (she knew me well),
"Why, with your uucle, I suppose!"

I was honest then, old man—
I hope he's not going to stay!

Why, all New York seems here,
And all of the crowd are gay—
St. James street? Yes, I know,
But it might be old Broadway.
I've just been out for a walk,
And it had a bad effect,
For I met such a lot I knew,
And they gave me the cut direct!

Think, think, think,
How heavily time does hang!
Sometimes, do you know, I wish
I'd taken my chance with the gang!
Better the prison bars
And the convict suit of gray
Than the look of scorn that night and morn
Is eating my heart away!

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attentiv while the truth is being brought to his mind.

Notes and Clippings.

THE bill to allow women to vote in town and city elections was defeated in the New York legislature.

THE venerable Gladstone has informed his party that he will lead the opposition to the Irish Coercion bill in Parliament.

BOTH branches of the Maine legislature hav failed to giv the necessary two-thirds vote on the passage of the amendment to the constitution providing for female suffrage.

IT appears that the Rev. Mr. Mallory, who publishes a religious paper called the Churchman, at 47 Lafayette Place, speculated in oil and lost $30,000. He has now arrested his broker for forgery and fraud.

THE London Times reports that Captain Condor, of the Palestine Exploration Expedition, after four years' labor has succeeded in deciphering the Hittite inscriptions which orientalists hav been unable hitherto to read.

JAMES CATHCART, a Salvation Army captain, paraded the streets of Grand Rapids, Mich., after he had been ordered to desist. The authorities locked him up, and now he sues the mayor of the city for $10,000 damages.

AT a recent meeting in Baltimore of the Freedman's Aid Society, an organization for the education of Methodist ministers among the negroes of the South, Secretary T. C. Hartzell said that he had seen some old colored preachers hold the Bible upside down, and all they could do was to shout and pound the Bible; but he'd rather hear a man like that preach than a namby-pamby, pink-paper young man read a milk-and-water essay. The brethren shouted, "Amen."

THE Living Church holds that "we hav no right to sit down and speculate about a future probation, and while calculating the probabilities of God's mercy, become unmerciful ourselvs." Yet this is what Christians hav always done and are doing now.

IN a paper entitled "The Handwriting of the Insane," recently read in Philadelphia, Mrs. Henry Hazlehurst said that the giving way of the mind in an educated person was often shown in bad spelling, blotting, frequent erasures, the absurd use of parentheses, italicization, and underscoring in excess.

THIS may not be a true story, but it is interesting if true: A Chicago minister, preaching on "The Immortality of the Soul," stepped to the front of the platform, and, leveling a finger at the congregation, said, "You may lose your wives and get others; you may lose your husbands and get others; you may lose your horses and carriages and get others, but when you lose your souls it's Good-bye, John."

CHAPLAIN ALLISON of the Minnesota legislature in his prayer the other morning showed how intimate he was with the supreme being by the following familiar conversation: "And now, dear Lord, bless the reporters, whose nimble pens catch our every word almost before it is uttered. Like thyself, they are omnipresent, and almost omnipotent. If we take the wings of the morning and fly to the uttermost parts of the earth, they are there. They meet us in the jungles of Africa, they waylay us in the solitary canons of Colorado, and when at length we find the latitude of the magnetic pole, behold, they are there. May their light and goodness be equal to their power, and in the general assembly of heaven, let no reporter be excluded."

THE Rev. Alexander E. Duncan, a graduate of McGill University of Canada, who is taking a year's course of study at the Yale Theological Seminary, has made a formal complaint against Prof. John E. Russell, Winkley professor of Biblical theology, alleging that his teachings are heretical, in that he denies the divinity of Christ.

THE New York Sun says: "Edward Kuehl, of Omaha, whose body was cremated in Buffalo, had tried many religions without success. He was born a Jew, and married in that faith in St. Louis; then he went to Utah and became a Mormon, and married two wives. His first wife got a divorce; and pretty soon he got one from the other two, and joined a Protestant church in Omaha. This didn't suit him, and he became a Spiritualist; and after trying this he concluded to believe nothing at all, and so died."

A STATEMENT of the footings of the appropriation bills passed at the last session of Congress has been completed by the clerks of the Committees on Appropriations. It is as follows: Agricultural, $1,028,730; Army, $23,724,718.69; Diplomatic and Consular, $1,429,942.14; District of Columbia, $4,265,890.66; Indian, $5,226,897.66; Legislativ, $20,701,221.67; Military Academy, $419,936.93; Navy, $25,753,165.44; Pensions, $76,252,500; Post-office, $55,694,650.15; Sundry Civil, $22,382,490.96; Mexican Pension Deficiency, $6,900,000; Public Printing Deficiency, $107,000; miscellaneous appropriations (estimated), $3,500,000. Total of appropriations, $247,387,144.30.

THE Christian Leader says: "Intrinsically and essentially, orthodoxy is infernal—yes, that's the word, it is infernal. Millions of sincere and gentle souls profess it, but they know not what manner of spirit they are of No heathen dogma begins to rival in enormity this which our infatuated evangelical brethren are so zealous to retain."

THE forthcoming annual report of the New York superintendent of school buildings, will show that there are in this city 134 schoolhouses, valued at $8,453,500, and occupying an area of over 23 acres, with about 12 acres of flagged yards and sidewalks. They hav a street frontage of over 2 miles. The areas of the floors and roofs, together with the cellars, exceed 99 acres.

THE Rev. Dr. Holland, in a sermon in St. Louis, said: "Civilization has cushioned us with conveniences and made us soft. We are the children of luxury, and we must hav a luxurious creed, a church that assigns us no heavy tasks, a style of preaching that invites us to lounge in our pews as in barbers' chairs, where sins are neatly trimmed like side whiskers, and then sprayed with cologne water of amiable sentiment. So religion is used to sanctify a dudism of spirit more contemptible than any of the sins it fears to look in the face and smite—a boudoir piety without moral indignation, without courage, afraid of suffering, ready to faint at the first touch of a real cross."

Miracles and Miracle Workers.

What is a miracle? It is no miracle to cure the sick, the blind, the deaf, the lame. These are things of a common occurrence. If a man ever ascended from the earth bodily, as Elisha and Christ are said to have done, there can be no doubt about the miraculous character of such an event. Turning all the waters of a great country like Egypt into blood, and stopping the planets in their courses, were real miracles, if any such events ever took place. If a person has ever been brought to life after life had become extinct, it is safe to say a miracle has been performed.

I am afraid that very few people duly consider the consequences involved in a miracle, or the dire uncertainty of everything earthly if a miracle has ever been wrought.

If a single exception to the laws of nature could be established, what assurance could anyone have that any and every law might not at any time be violated? Instead of certainty and stability, he would find nothing on which he could depend.

In regard to the miracles of the New Testament, there is a little legerdemain which should be noticed, and which many, on account of early education, may fail to see.

It is common to state that the wonderful performance was witnessed by "many," or by the "multitude." But it should be borne in mind that the "many" or the "multitude" who are represented as witnessing the miraculous performance do not bear testimony.

If one should state that he saw a horse ascend out of sight, it would not give strength to the statement to say that a thousand men witnessed the phenomena, so long as the thousand do not corroborate the statement by the weight of their testimony. But there is another drawback in regard to the New Testament miracles.

The "many" or "the multitude" are not only as dumb as rocks, but nobody knows within a hundred years when these miraculous stories were first told, and, worse than all, nobody knows who first told them.

Latter-day Christians do not talk much about miracles, except those recorded in the Bible. Indeed, there are many who believe that those are the only ones ever wrought. But it is well known that in the early days of Christianity nearly all the church dignitaries could work miracles.

A man who could not cast out demons was thought to lack the spirit of Christ. Irenæus says that "all who are truly disciples of him, receiving his grace, wrought miracles in his name. They cast out devils, healed the sick, raised the dead," etc. He declared that "in the church are many endued with prophetic gifts—speaking with all kinds of tongues, laying open the secrets of men," etc.

Tertullian challenges the heathen magistrates to summon before their tribunals any person with devils, and says that "the evil spirits can be exorcised by any Christian whatsoever." This shows that devils were more plentiful in those days than they are now, and that Christians were well up in their devilish business.

But a very significant question arises right here. When the early Christians were given full power over the devil, how does it happen that he is still around to "loop" us into trouble now? Why did they not demand an "unconditional surrender?"

As we learn more of Christianity in an early day, we shall know more about miracles and wonders and wonderful men and women than is written down in the Christian's philosophy. Veronica, who was healed by touching the hem of Christ's garment, had a statue erected to Christ, and near the statue grew a certain unknown herb, "which was a certain remedy for all known distempers." This is attested by Eusebius. A single seed from that most wonderful herb might render nugatory every doctor's diploma in the land.

This woman followed Christ to the crucifixion and put her handkerchief to his face, on which Christ impressed his picture, showing that in addition to his other accomplishments he was a grand photographer. Why could he not have given us a picture of Joseph and Mary and Pilate, and the dead men who came out of their graves, and the two thieves on the cross? To-day one could scarcely fail to make a fortune out of such an art gallery.

The Christian does not stop to consider that if a thing is possible, it is no miracle. The miraculous is always the impossible. Neither Jesus Christ nor any of his apostles could do an impossible thing more than anybody else, even with God's help.

In an early gospel, entitled, "The Acts of Peter and Andrew," there is recorded one of the most remarkable miracles ever written down in any book.

It is related as follows: "After the needle had been brought, and all the multitude of the city were standing by to see, Peter looked up and saw a camel coming, and he ordered her to be brought. Then he fixed the needle in the ground and said with a loud voice [of course it must be loud if Jesus Christ heard him]: 'In the name of Jesus Christ who was crucified under Pontius Pilate, I order thee, O camel, to go through the eye of the needle.' Then the eye of the needle was opened like a gate, and the camel went through the eye of the needle, and all the multitude saw it. But there were some who did not believe. So another needle and another camel were sent for [the first needle could not be used because the eye could not be got back to its former size], and the camel went through twice, with a woman sitting upon it."

There is no sane person who believes that any such transaction ever occurred. But if the gospel containing this Munchausenism had been incorporated into the New Testament by vote of the councils, it would have been believed by all good Christians. The gospel containing this story was received and considered sound by all the early churches.

Can any Christian satisfy himself why he disbelieves the story as stated above, and yet believes that the planets were stopped in their course and that a man went up from the church contrary to the law of gravitation, and that children could be thrown into a red-hot furnace without being burnt, and a man could be brought to life after decomposition had commenced? But with the assistance of the great Spontagligasticus, who is clothed with power to render the impossible the possible, there is nothing but what the Christian can be taught to believe, however absurd or abominable it may be.

The camel trick was seen by the "multitude," and those who rose out of their graves were seen by the "many." There is the same dodge in both statements. Even if we had the testimony of the "multitude" and the "many," the laws of nature were the same then that they are to-day, and neither the "multitude" nor the "many" could make an impossibility possible. The "multitude" or the "many" might lie, or they might be deceived, or they might wish to deceive others, while the laws of nature are always constant and truthful, and render the idea of miracles entirely ridiculous.

If all the Christians in the world should tell me that they saw a troop of dead men arise out of their graves, I would not believe them. And it was just as much impossible for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle eighteen hundred years ago as it is to-day. True, the gospel containing the camel story was rejected, the one containing the account of the pedestrians from the graveyard was accepted, but this circumstance could not turn a big lie to the truth.

The Christian often attempts to show the inconsistency of the Infidel, because he believes historical statements, and at the same time rejects statements in the New Testament. But, as usual, the Christian falls into the pit which he has digged for another. The Infidel shows his consistency by making a distinction (and the greatest distinction, too, in the world) between the possible and the impossible.

Another great miracle is recorded of John in one of the rejected gospels. It is to the effect that while he was in Rome he was thrown into boiling oil, and it had no effect upon him. Now, the Infidel may believe that there is such an edifice as St. Peter's at Rome, although he has never seen it, because he knows that it is possible to erect such a building. But he knows that it is impossible for a man to be boiled in oil, and come out in good, serviceable condition. Can the Christian see the difference?

All of these gospels, whether accepted or rejected, were written in the interest of the church, and the object of all of these miraculous stories was the same, viz., to make them appear so very wonderful to the vulgar masses as to make them believe that they were more and beyond what could be produced by mortals, therefore written or dictated by the great Spontagligasticus, and of divine origin. This made it possible for a class of ecclesiastics to stand midway between the people and God, and to act the part of middle-men transacting business between two worlds.

The miraculous birth of Christ, his resurrection and ascension, and the miracles which it is said that he wrought, are all outside of and beyond the natural, and cannot therefore be true.

Clement, who wrote about the year 97, in his long epistle to the Corinthians says not one word about the immaculate conception of Jesus Christ, or of his miracles, or of his material resurrection. If these things had been believed in at the time that Clement wrote, would he not have spoken of them?

The truth is, the miraculous part of Christ's character was attached to him further on, when a hierarchy was to be built up, where ghosts, and demons, and a resurrected savior could be made to play a needed part.

It is a matter of great wonder why the Christian lays so much stress on the miracles of the New Testament. The miracles of the Koran are more numerous and even greater, and are equally well attested.

The miracles of Chrishna are similar to those of Christ, and more than a thousand years older, and, no doubt, were the source from which many features of the New Testament were borrowed. Buddha was also a great miracle-worker, and, whether certain writers are mistaken or not in regard to the Buddhistic features of the New Testament, one thing is certain, that the masses of the East believed that all great men could work miracles. Christ was no exception. Perhaps the easiest way to make the Christian see the folly of the whole miracle hallucination would be to introduce to him one of the greatest miracle-workers in the world. Waite says that "he was one of the most remarkable characters in history." I refer to Apollonius. He lived in the time of Christ, and performed greater wonders than Christ ever dreamed of.

The most astonishing miracles occurred at his birth. He was guided by angels, and was an interpreter of dreams and visions. He could converse with animals, and had the power of moving through the air, and kings and princes did him honor. At a feast, bread, fruits, wine, and every delicacy were brought without hands. This was certainly a greater miracle than turning water into wine. In an instant he went from Smyrna to Ephesus, and stayed the plague which was raging there.

At Athens he cast a demon out of a youth, and commanded the demon to give a visible sign, whereupon a statue began to shake and totter, and finally it fell to the ground. At a wedding he caused everything to vanish into the air, including gold and silver vessels, cup-bearers, and cooks.

Philostratus says this happened in the center of Greece, and that "many" were acquainted with the facts.

You see, my Christian friend, here is the evidence of the "many," so that the statement stands on just as good a foundation as your New Testament miracles.

At Rome he was accused of treason. The accuser came forward with a roll of parchment in his hand upon which the accusation was written. When it was unrolled it was a blank—neither sentence, nor word, nor character was there.

Apollonius met a funeral procession, and said, "Set down the bier." He touched the young woman and she overcame death which was upon her.

At Alexandria he pronounced a convicted man innocent whom he had never seen or heard of before. A further examination of the case showed that he was correct. Trees under which he passed saluted him in articulate words. When he was a hundred years old he was thrown into prison at Rome. One of the prisoners asked him when he would gain his liberty. "To-morrow," said he, "if it depends upon the judge; this moment, if it depends upon myself." To show that he could not be confined longer than he willed, he drew himself out of his irons and then put them back again. When summoned before the tribunal Domitian was so struck with the answers of Apollonius that he said, "I acquit you of the crime with which you are charged, but you must remain until I can converse with you." Apollonius replied, "You can detain my body, but not my soul," and vanished from the tribunal. When asked why he was called a god—"On account of being good," replied he.

On the same day he appeared to two friends, Damis and Demetrius, who were three days' journey apart. Demetrius could not believe that Apollonius was in the flesh. He stretched forth his hand and commanded Demetrius to feel of it and know that "I am in the flesh." At Ephesus, while talking to a vast concourse of people, he suddenly cast his eyes on the ground and cried, "Strike the tyrant, strike!" After a moment's pause he cried out, "Keep up your spirits, O Ephesians, for this day the tyrant is killed! At this very moment, I swear by Minerva, the deed is done." At that moment Domitian was being assassinated at Rome by Stephanus. The truth of this statement rests upon Dion Cassius and Philostratus.

He entered a temple at Crite, was taken for a robber and bound. At midnight he freed himself from his chains, and called the priests of the temple to let them know that he did nothing in secret. The gates of the temple opened for him and shut after him, and the temple resounded with the songs of many virgins. The burden of their song was, "Come to heaven, leave the earth, come, come."

He appeared to a man after death to let him know that the soul is immortal. For many centuries after his death, if he did die (for some writers deny his death), Apollonius was worshiped as a god. Temples were erected to his honor, and for hundreds of years pilgrimages were made to his birthplace as Mohammedans make pilgrimages to Mecca. Roman emperors treated his memory with all the honor due to the memory of an emperor.

Talmage's Tall Story Discounted Twelve Thousand Per Cent.

In Carnac, France, are Druidical remains, twelve thousand stone pillars, ranged in avenues (many others having been removed by peasants), supposed to be burial monuments on an ancient battlefield. The belief of the Christian natives is: "St. Cornelius, being (in the days when a bitter persecution was raging against the Christians) hard pressed by an army of pagans, fled to the sea-shore, but finding no boat to further his escape, he uttered a prayer, which suddenly transformed his ruthless pursuers into stone." I hav this account from the Leisure Hours, a London Christian magazine. The Brooklyn man can't tell a story worth a cent.

J. P. GUILD.

Mormon and Gentile Boycotts.

From the Salt Lake Tribune.

In 1863 the soldiers of General Connor, stationed at Fort Douglas, scattered out through the territory, and at various points discovered and located gold and silver mines. The next session of the Mormon legislature promptly passed a bill taxing the gross proceeds of the mines twenty per cent. It was vetoed, of course, by Acting-Governor Fuller. In 1866, Daniel H. Wells, as lieutenant-general of the Nauvoo Legion, issued a secret order, detailing men from the legion to repair to the avenues of approach to this territory for the purpose of turning back incoming prospectors for mines. In 1868, when the Union Pacific Railroad was rapidly approaching this valley, steps were taken by the Mormon leaders to get all mercantil business into their own hands. Six hundred small shop-keepers were broken up in business, and the so-called coöperativ stores were organized. That was done not only to destroy the business and drive out the non-Mormon merchants, but to leave no field for expected newcomers to occupy.

In 1869 they cast out of their church, and as far as they could, ruined them afterward, a score of their best men because they claimed the right to advocate the opening of the mines of Utah. Up to this time the Mormon people had escaped beggary, if not starvation, only because of the disbursement of money by the Overland stage line and by the United States government in the purchasing of supplies for its posts; also, by supplying the territories of Idaho and Montana in their early days with flour at a dollar a pound, and the fag-ends of old stocks of goods and groceries at similar rates. Out of the government money which built the railroad, they secured millions.

With the railroad came a new instalment of miners. Mining and smelting became an established and productiv business, supporting, in the main, the railroads, and inducing their extension in various directions. For more than fifteen years the mining and smelting and business interests incidental to mining and smelting hav disbursed in Utah from three to five million dollars a year. During these years almost every session of the Mormon legislature has endeavored to bite the hand that thus fed the Mormon people. Measures hav been introduced, perfected, and passed, designed to obstruct and cripple mining and smelting, and only failed of success because of the interposition of the gentile governor's absolute veto.

During all these years, and for more than fifteen years prior to these years, every obstacle that could be has been laid in the path of gentile establishment, progress, and success in Utah. All the tremendous power of the church over its membership has been brought to bear without a moment's intermission to force Mormons to boycott gentiles. Every kind of pressure—political, religious, business, social—has been brought to bear to force the Mormon people to boycott the gentiles. Spies, spotters, rounders, heelers, the city policemen, the church assassins, Mormon officers and courts of all grades and descriptions, ecclesiastical and secular, hav been employed remorselessly to force the Mormon people to boycott gentiles. "These vipers that we hav nursed in our bosom," says George Q. Cannon. This "all hell and the devil that is invading us," says Daniel H. Wells. "Cursed is the man," says Joseph F. Smith, "and I curse him in the name of Israel's God, who sells a lot or a farm or a house to a gentile." The blasphemous ruffian! Gentiles hav been followed by church assassins and beaten and shot to death and their bodies chucked into spring-holes. They hav been called out of their beds in this city and shot to death by the police. They hav been shot and sewed up in sacks, and thrown into the river for simply attempting to avail themselvs of their rights under the land laws. In former times, a gentile had no more show in Utah than "a cat in hell without claws," as the saying goes. Spies hav been stationed at the doors of gentile business houses to spot for destruction those Mormons who, at the peril of their lives and the bread of their families, still dared to buy a yard of cloth or a pound of sugar of a non-Mormon. And when the gentiles hav been driven to the point of sacrificing their all at cost, with the intention of getting out of this inhospitable hole, they hav been mockingly told that they could go as soon as they pleased, and the sooner the better, but that they couldn't get a dollar for their property. That was to be indirectly confiscated. There is no language that can adequately depict the extent of the ostracism, the malignity, and devilishness of the contumely, the vileness of the denunciation and abuse that hav been perpetually visited upon gentiles and Mormon apostates in Utah by the Mormon church for a third of a century. Of us and our morals, religion, and civilization they hav said: "Their civilization is the civilization of hell. Their religion is a failure. Their marriage is adultery. The teachers of their schools are prostitutes. 'Better send your children to hell than to gentile schools.' Their clergy are hypocrits, teaching for pay an unauthorized, a dead and damned religion. Their newspapers are sewers of falsehood, obscenity, and defamation. Their government is a despotism, its officers tyrants, bigots, persecutors, thieves, corruptionists; their institutions are of the devil; the first democrat was Lucifer, whom the eternal threw over the battlements of heaven into the burning pit; their God is a polygamist, their savior a sort of Mormon apostle come before his time, leading a bevy of abandoned women about Judea; themselvs in general a band of conspirators, seeking nothing in the world but to rob, waste, and destroy the poor Latter-Day Saints. Their government is to giv place to the Mormon government, their men to be wasted by wars, pestilences, and famins, their women then to be led captiv to people the harems of the Mormons."

All this may sound strong, but every observing person who has lived in Utah ten years, Mormon or gentile, knows that it is but a feeble representation of the facts. It is not too much to say that the hatred of the Mormons for gentile comers in Utah was never equaled in strength and fierceness by that of any sect of which history givs account. And it has found vivid expression and unrelenting effect in every utterance and act of the Mormon leaders toward gentiles and their interests since gentiles first came to Utah. It has been carried just as far as the Mormon leaders dared, in the early times, often to murder. To-day they carry it just as far as they possibly can and dare. What Mormon employs a gentile? or ever did? or would think of such a thing? Scheme after scheme has been devised within the last five years to enforce a general boycott. Lists of the proscribed gentiles hav been made and published, over and over, in black letter; meetings hav been held, secret meetings; fanaticism and hate stirred up; pledges made—all that human and superhuman (superstitious) power could do, aided by the complex organization of the Mormon church, has been done, to destroy gentile trade and business. So that to-day it is probable that it does not lie within the power of the Mormon church to further injure in a business way the gentiles of Utah. On the contrary, instead of their withdrawing Mormon trade from gentiles, the gentiles are gaining Mormon trade. They are more capable, and conduct business on business principles, instead of mixing it up with malignant passions and insane schemes to compass the impossible.

They hav put up with all this as best they could. Many gentile employers, perhaps all of them, hav given employment to Mormons as freely as to gentiles. They hav patronized Mormon stores and banks and manufacturers without a thought of retaliation for or reciprocation of the treatment accorded to them. It has never entered their thoughts to boycott Mormons as Mormons hav boycotted them. They came to Utah free men, they hav maintained their freedom—such is the extent of their crimes, such the sole cause they hav given for Mormon hatred, ostracism, and opposition. They hav steadily demanded that the Mormons submit to the just laws of this country, and giv over their idea of empire-founding looking to universal dominion. They do not, for themselvs, propose to be enslaved by or pay tribute to the Utah species of Mohammedanism. And they propose that the authority of the United States shall be respected in Utah as it is in the other parts of the Union. To that end they hav spared no effort, they will spare none. But to accomplish even this, dearer to them than life, they hav not, and they never will, stoop to Mormon methods. It is possible, however, that they will cease to furnish the Mormon church with the main part of the funds with which that church carries on its miserable contention against them and all that they cherish as sacred and of value.

About three months ago an organization called the Utah Loyal League was conceived by the gentiles, literally for purposes of self-defense. The preamble of its constitution reads as follows:

> Recognizing the necessity of organizing for self-defense that element in Utah whose existence is threatened by the pretensions and practices of the so-called Mormon church, it is proposed by the subscribers to form an association, open as to its general object and purpose, but secret as to its membership and proceedings, to be known as the Utah Loyal League, comprising a central league at Salt Lake City, and branch leagues at all available places in the teritory or elsewhere. In pursuance of this purpose, the following constitution is hereby agreed to.

Article 1 merely prescribes the relations of the central and branch leagues to each other. Article 2 contains the gist of the whole scheme. It reads as follows:

> Signing the following form of enrollment and paying dues as therein specified, shall be the only qualification of memberships of the Utah Loyal League. But canvassers for new members shall solicit none but such as are known to be in hearty sympathy with the end sought by the association, and no candidate shall be enrolled unless vouched for by some member of the League.
> FORM OF ENROLLMENT.
> The objects of the Utah Loyal League are to combine the loyal people of Utah, male and female, irrespectiv of politics, in opposition to the political rule and the law-defying practices of the so-called Mormon church; to oppose the admission of Utah into the Union until she has the substance as well as the form of republican government; to raise money to maintain agents in Washington or elsewhere to labor for these ends.
> Sympathizing with these objects, and believing organization to be necessary to attain them, I hereby enroll myself as a member of the Union Loyal League, and agree to pay fifty cents upon enrollment and fifty cents every month so long as I remain a member.
> And I promis upon my honor not to divulge the names of the members of the League, or any of the transactions of the League.

No boycotting in this, no coercion, no oaths to hav one's heart cut out and stuffed into his mouth if he does not join the league, stay with it for life, and obey all its behests, or if he betrays its secrets. It has no secrets; not a word has ever been said in its meetings, or an act done, that would reflect aught but credit on it if published. Scrubs hav got into the league—there was one such among the apostles—and hav tried to giv its secrets to the Mormon press. Over these things the Mormon press hav cackled like a hen that lays no eggs, but makes up for it in cackling. I hope they will publish the above; it was given to the press in substance three months ago by resolution of the league itself. The wider the publicity given to the objects of the league, the better for its purpose. I will say in passing that the league was a business men's child. It originated in the Alta Club, a business men's club; office-holders, politicians, and, as far as possible, professional men were excluded from prominence in it. Joseph R. Walker is president, Henry W. Lawrence chairman of the executiv committee, John E. Dooly chairman of the finance committee, and among the vice-presidents, and on these committees, are some of the strong business and mining men of the territory. When that most sluggish and conservativ of all classes—the money-making class—takes hold of a public question, no man of sense will question their belief at least that there exists a vital necessity for it. And no intelligent man, were he forty times a Mormon of the Mormons, will attempt to maintain that the objects of the league are not such as every good citizen ought to sympathize with and work for. If any should attempt to he could not maintain it. The Mormons ought to be more interested in the accomplishment of the objects of the league than anybody, since their accomplishment is all that can save the Mormon church, finally, from absolute and deserved extinction. But a Mormon of the Mormons would not decry the objects of the league. He would simply, stolidly deny the facts. We do not propose to answer lies. As to the facts; like all other men, we must be allowed to be the judge of the conditions and necessities of our own environment. And, like all other men worthy so to be called, we are willing to abide the consequences of our acts.

But this is a digression. The league has prospered and grown beyond the most sanguin expectations of its originators. In the mines and at the smelters, without any aid or even suggestion from the executiv authority of the body, it has taken on to some extent the form of a protectiv union against Mormon labor. Although it was not thought of, to my knowledge, it will be seen upon reflection that this was inevitable. It is not in the nature of man, upon being slapped in the face, to turn around and stand to be kicked. Any man who does it thereby acknowledges himself a coward, and earns and deserves the contempt of his fellows. A miner, we will say, joins the league. He is tolerably conversant with the treatment always and now meted out to gentiles by the Mormons. He will reason something as the writer of the following letter does (an actual letter, by the way):

> There are, I suppose, out of about one hundred men employed here, about twenty Mormons. The eighty gentiles will contribute (at fifty cents per month), if all join the league, forty dollars, while the twenty Mormons will pay in tithing $120, besides other assessments made upon them. Thus will the —— mine, owned and managed by loyal men, contribute at the least three times the amount to help the Mormon church that it will to oppose that institution. This should not be. It makes fools of us What? we giv forty dollars to fight the Mormon church, and $120 to the Mormon church with which to fight us? How long would a Mormon company allow gentiles to work for them under the same or under any circumstances? The Loyal League won't do unless it acts with the same weapons and the same earnestness that the Mormon church does. Excuse me for withholding my name. I hav given you facts, they speak for themselvs.

They do speak for themselvs, and for themselvs the miners, seizing the opportunity by the foretop, hav given this tendency to the league. It could not be helped, even if it were desirable. The employers, the owners, and superintendents of mines, could not help it if they wished. And for one, I am glad of it. Doubtless our mines and smelters in Salt Lake and Summit counties alone are paying out to Mormons five thousand dollars a day the year round, five hundred of which, if these workers liv up to their profession, goes to swell the coffers of the Mormon church, to maintain the Mormon lobby in Washington (which makes a national clatter and perfume not unlike that of a volley of o'er-ripe eggs thrown against a wall), to subsidize the pimps of the mercenary part of the press, possibly to corrupt venal Congressmen, and all to defeat the establishment of decency and good government in Utah. While we do that, our talk is vain, our pretensions idle, our sincerity more than doubtful.

But this is another digression. Probably (I do not know) half a dozen Mormons hav already been discharged from the mines through the establishment of the league. And it is astounding to hear the Mormon organs squeal. They do not like to be hoist with their own petard. They do not like the taste of their own medicin, even in the most homeopathic of homeopathic does. The bully! It has been belting a baby, so to speak, with brass knuckles, these thirty years. The baby has become a broth of a boy, and strikes back, more in fun than in earnest. The big bloat takes to a fence corner like a beaten cow and bawls for mercy! Let 'em beg, let 'em squeal, but let the good work go on. Let us act as we talk, or for the future keep still. I trust the miners will all join the league and never rest while a Mormon is employed in their respectiv camps. They hav got the organization, anyhow, since they are in the majority, if they all join, and can make what use of it they please. And if they don't and can't make it answer the purpose of a boycott on Mormon labor in the mines, they are fools to hav aught to do with it.

News and Notes.

Again I am at Longmont in front of the mighty mountains where Long's Peak towers to the sky, with its glorious crowns of snow. The friends here, like the hills themselvs, hav plenty of backbone, and hav no thought of retreat, whichever way the winds may blow. A large audience was not present at my lecture, but then it was appreciativ, and it was a pleasure to be with them. Mr. P. G. Ashe and family, Miss Annie, Mollie, and Mattie Ashe, gave us some delightful music, Mrs. Georgiana Rice a recitation on "Liberty," which stirred the pulses, and I gave my lecture, "The New God," and we had a good rally around the camp-fires of Freethought. I made my stay at the "Lone Ranch," the home of Mr. and Mrs. Rice and family, where sociability prevails. I met again our octogenarian Liberal, Mr. Simmons, who is almost ninety years of age, but who still looks forward and sees in death only a way of getting more life and vaster intelligence, and star-packed space never grows dim to his vision. I called at the comfortable mansion of Colonel Kelso, where with Mrs. Kelso he enjoys the paradise of progressiv life. One can be happy here, if anywhere, with these broad plains and shining hills, and love and thought to spread their banners in the morning sky. Colonel Kelso has just published his book, "Spiritualism Sustained," which I hav enjoyed reading, not because I expect to be converted to his view, but because I like to see the troublesome dilemma into which he so learnedly and skilfully puts our Christian friends by showing that the Bible after all is but a record of spirit manifestations, and so proclaims the unity of this life with the next, if such there be, and overthrows the very foundation of orthodoxy. If the colonel's arguments are valid, he strikes a most vigorous blow at ecclesiasticism and fanaticism, and brings the Bible into some common relation with humanity, so it is no longer the armory of despotism and superstition. If it shines with a mystic halo, it is human illumination after all, and not supernatural, and so I thank the colonel for his live book, and believe it will giv a better idea of the Bible than now commonly prevails.

Mr. George W. Way, George X. Young, John Hertha, and others, are among our allies at Longmont, whom it was a pleasure to greet.

I found a good welcome at Boulder from Dr. Ambrook, Joseph Wolf, Lemuel Mackintosh, Marius Smith, Fred Squire, Dr. Brace, A. J. Macky, Chas. Dabney, Eugene Austin, Ross Howard, and others, and the audience was quite large at my lecture on "Universal Mental Liberty." Dr. Ambrook is very activ, and it was through his efforts that we broke the ground for Freethought organization. There is a fine Liberal element in Boulder, and it can eventually be made a controling power. Joseph Wolf, who introduced me at the lecture, is full of the stuff of which reformers are made. He is a born pioneer. He was the first to push ahead the Greenback party in Colorado, in spite of "ten thousand foes." When he believes in a thing, he stands by it through thick and thin, and so he will make a radical who will never flinch from the logic of his thought. With such representativs as Mr. Wolf, Dr. Ambrook, and others, I hav no doubt of the success of our cause at this point.

I was pleased to meet Dr. L. Z. Coman, of Nederland, who came twenty miles from the snowy range to attend the lectures, and who knows no fear in the expression of his thought, even though the orthodox do threaten him with persecution. There are several stanch Liberals at Nederland—W. P. Hanna, W. B. Williams, etc.—and I hope some time to visit their lofty home.

The Unitarian Society here is quite Liberal, and I enjoyed very much my acquaintance with Rev. John Dutton, their minister, who is a scholarly and genial gentleman with a comprehensiv understanding of the intellectual drifts of the world, and is not at all bigoted in the presentation of truth as he understands it.

I enjoyed the hospitality of Dr. Ambrook and Mrs. Ambrook, whose home is attractiv with art and literature; and I anticipate a pleasant return to this delightful city, upon one side of which, within walking distance, cluster the splendid and picturesque hills, with mighty boulders, and on the other side stretches the vast plain, like a measureless ocean sweeping to the remote horizons. Sublimity and loveliness mingle in the entrancing panorama of this mountain spot.

Early on Saturday morning, the hills blazing like silver, and the plains luminous with soft gray expanses, mingling with the far-bending sky, I come again to Denver, Queen City of all this glorious land. Our friend Jamieson has been doing effectiv work here and at other places in the state, and I find our forces in excellent order, and the interest in Freethought is evidently on the increase. Unity church was filled to overflowing on Sunday, and a large number were obliged to go away for lack of room. Thomas J. Truss, John G. Jenkins, president and secretary of the Union; Miss M. J. Patterson, recording secretary; Mr. and Mrs. Charles Roth, Mr. and Mrs. Coplin, Mr. Sherman, etc., are generous and patient in their devotion to the work. There is a Secular Sunday-school established, which, in spite of many drawbacks, is improving. I am more than ever impressed with the importance of the work, and the necessity there is for better instrumentalities to teach our children the principles and practice of our philosophy of life. I hav no doubt that successful Sunday-schools might be established in many places if we had good text-books and good singing books. A good singing book is perhaps what we need more than anything else, for we cannot build up a social life without the aid of music and poetry. I hope the funds of the Union hereafter will enable the Liberals of the country to hav these needed instrumentalities, for the voice of the platform must be assisted by permanent local effort and advancement; and, as our treasurer in his last report suggests, we must hav literature—tracts, text-books, music books, etc., for the maintenance of our lines of progress, or we shall inevitably go back.

I am much encouraged with what has been done by the Denver Society, and what it proposes to do. It has able leaders, who make the best of their opportunities, and I believe we shall hav in this city a splendid example of Freethought enterprise.

Monday I came to Loveland, where N. R. Faulkner is our pioneer, who is determined to see what can be done, and start the ball. The success is quite assuring. The Opera House was filled last night to listen to my lecture on "Universal Mental Liberty," and the audience was attentiv from beginning to end. I expect to return here and complete the organization. O. E. Baffin, C. M. Currier, Burt Davis, C. N. Randall, George Lloyd, R. White, and others are among our friends. I was pleased to meet Mr. Guard—of the old guard, indeed, for he is nearly seventy years old, and has been on the frontier a tireless worker since 1850, and always a Freethinker. He bates nothing of youthful fire, and is a good example of enthusiasm and hope to those who hav not worn the harness so long and feel sometimes a little worn out and discouraged. To greet such a veteran of liberty makes one renew his spirit.

I was glad to meet again Capt. and Mrs. Wadlia and Eulah C. Stillwell, of Greeley, who came twenty-five miles across the plains to giv another welcome and aid our services with music. Capt. Wadlia has written and composed several songs, and they hav the true ring and melody. He gave a rendition of "The Sweet By-and-Bye" into "The Sweet Here and Now," and it makes a good Secular lyric. It was quite an addition to our lectures here and at Greeley to hav the vocal and instrumental music furnished by Capt. Wadlia and Eulah C. Stillwell.

This finishes my work in Colorado for the time being. I expect to halt here for another campaign in the fall. To-morrow I go on to Prescott, Arizona, where I expect to lecture on Sunday, March 13th, instead of at Denver. I shall be at San Diego March 17th and 18th; Los Angeles, March 20th and 21st; Santa Ana, March 21st, 22d, and 23d; Norwalk, March 24th and 25th; Tulare City, March 29th and 30th; Visalia, March 31st and April 1st. I hope to be in National City and San Bernardino near these dates, as I hav received calls to both for lectures. I shall be in San Francisco and Oakland April 3d to 10th; San Jose, April 17th and 24th; Stockton, May 1st and 8th; Sonoma, Sacramento, and other places in California, until June 1st. During the month of June, I shall be in Oregon; during July, in Washington territory, and in August return East by way of Baker City, Boise City, Salt Lake City, etc.

I was pleased to meet in Denver Mr. Smith, of Forks Creek; Alex. Campbell, of Elk Rapids, Mich.; Richard Day, of Alamosa, Cal., who came from a distance to attend the lectures, and whose cordial greeting was a delight indeed. I can now take my long jump to the Pacific coast with courage. I know I shall land amid a gallant company. I long for a look at the mighty sea and the Golden Gates.

A Well Deserved Word of Cheer.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll to W. Stewart Ross, Editor of the London Secular Review.

MY DEAR FRIEND: The Protestants denounce idolatry, and yet they hav made of the Bible an idol. They, in common with the Catholics, attribute a miraculous virtue to certain pieces of paper on which certain marks hav been impressed. Before these pieces of paper and these marks they not only bow, but, on this altar, sacrifice, with the utmost cheerfulness, the highest attribute of the human mind—the very manhood of man.

They not only enslave themselvs, but spend much of their time in making manacles and fetters for their children, and in denouncing those of their fellow-men who refuse to be enslaved.

These worshipers of the Bible speak in a kind of smiling contempt of the ancients, who derived great consolation from oracles so written, so worded, that they could not be surely understood; so written that the event prophesied, whatever it might be, would either in a literal or a spiritual sense be fulfilled. And yet the Bible is filled with just such oracles—with dark sayings that only seem to illumin the mind—with all that is vague, contradictory, and shadowy—to which any meaning can be given by fear or faith or hope.

These passages are like strange shapes, fragments of which, dimly seen by the terrified, alternately resemble monsters and friends. Curiously enough, the fact that this revelation called the Bible cannot be understood is regarded as one of the evidences of its divine origin. God's thoughts, they say, are not like the thoughts of men; consequently, contradiction becomes confirmation.

We who deny the supernatural origin of this book must admit that it was naturally produced. If it is not supernatural, it is natural; and it will hardly do for us to hold the Bible in contempt simply because it is not a supernatural book. We insist that the Bible was produced by man; that it reflects the ignorance, the intelligence, the aspirations, the belief, the morality, and the meanness of a large majority of the Jewish people, and that, like other records of other nations, it is a mingling of fact and falsehood, of folly and philosophy, of cruelty and mercy.

The Deists of the last century refused to worship this book; refused to kneel in its presence; refused to extinguish the light of the mind at its command. They attempted to show, and they did show, that the Bible is immoral, cruel, ignorant, and absurd. Having demonstrated this, they came to the conclusion that it could not hav been written by a being of infinit wisdom and goodness. In this they were certainly correct.

They also took the ground that nature has a creator, and that this creator is infinitly wise and good, and that this being could not, by any possibility, hav been the author of the Bible. In this they were mistaken. We are compelled to ask, Could not infinit wisdom and goodness just as easily command crime as permit it? Is it any worse to order the strong to slay the weak than to stand by, infinitly powerful, and refuse protection? Did not this God of nature create things as objectionable as the Bible itself? Is nature, taken altogether, any better than the Bible? If God did not command the Jews to murder the Canaanites, nature, to say the least of it, did not prevent the crime. If God did not uphold the practice of polygamy, nature did. If God did not inspire the errors and absurdities that we find in the so-called sacred book, they were all produced by nature. It will not do to relieve God of the responsibility by saying that certain crimes were natural productions, and, at the same time, insist that God is the author of nature.

The moment we deny the supernatural origin of the Bible we declare that nature wrote its every word, commanded all its cruelties, told all its falsehoods, and made all of its mistakes. It must hav been not only a natural, but a necessary production. There was and is no power in the universe that could hav changed one word that was not changed. All the mistakes in translation were necessarily made, and not one that was made could by any possibility hav been avoided. In other words, this book, like any other fact in nature, could not hav been otherwise than it is.

So we are driven to say that nature has produced all superstition, all persecution, all slavery; that nature has practiced every virtue, and has committed every crime. There is good in nature. It is nature in us that loves the truth, that admires courage, that sides with the weak, that pities the oppressed. It is nature in us that is touched by the beauty of form, the glory of color—that stands enraptured before the statue and the picture, and that listens entranced to the thrilling voice of song.

In man nature contemplates herself—approves or condemns her own actions—admires and despises, rejoices and regrets, fears and hopes. Nature is crime and criminal, justice and judge.

Infidels hav opposed the Bible not on account of the good things in it, but on account of the bad, and Christians hav upheld it not on account of the bad, but on account of the good. And, unfortunately, these Christians hav imagined that the doctrin of inspiration must be upheld in order that the good things in the Bible might be preserved. In this way they hav only succeeded in sanctifying the infamous. Throw away this doctrin of inspiration, and the Bible will be more powerful for good and far less for evil.

This book can be made to uphold almost anything that man desires. It is the consolation of every vice and the barricade of every crime.

A few years ago American Christians looked upon that book as the foundation and defense of human slavery; yet slavery is a crime that includes all others, and in comparison with which most others are virtues. The Bible was the word of God, and for that reason man was under obligation to obey. Had it been considered simply as the work of man, it would not hav been quoted to justify that which the intelligent men of the nineteenth century hold in abhorrence. Had the idea of inspiration been thrown away, all passages in conflict with liberty and science—with the recorded experience of the human race—would instantly hav become harmless. The Bible would not hav been considered as a guide for man, but simply as a collection of the opinions and mistakes of dead barbarians. The good passages not only would hav remained, but their influence would hav been increased, because they would hav been relieved of a burden.

No one cares whether the truth is inspired or not. The truth is independent not only of man, but of all the gods. And by truth I mean the place of man in nature—the relation he sustains to the all; the relation between things, and between thoughts and things; between acts and consequences, between conduct and condition. The perception of truth bears the same relation to the logical faculty in man that music does to some portion of the brain; it is a mental melody. This sublime strain has been heard by a lonely few, and yet I am enthusiastic enough to believe that it will be the music of the future.

For the good and the true in the Old and New Testaments we should hav the same regard that we hav for the good and true wherever they are found. For the false and infamous in the Old and New Testaments we should hav the same contempt that we hav for the false and infamous wherever they may be found. We who know how false is the history even of to-day—the almost numberless mistakes that men hav made who honestly endeavored to tell the truth—how hard it is, with all the facilities we hav, to get a truthful account of the simplest occurrence, must see that nothing short of inspiration—admitting for the moment the possibility of inspiration—could hav prevented the Bible from being filled with errors.

At last we are beginning to see that the "scheme of things" is hardly worthy of worship, and that the present should not bow in humility and awe before the mistakes and absurdities of the past. The wise men of the ancients were foolish. Their law-givers were cruel; their priests superstitious; their philosophers narrow and shallow; and, in the sands of that desert called the Past, there are no springs at which the present can quench its thirst.

We hav taken another step. We are now convinced that the God of nature—if there be one—is neither merciful nor cruel; that he can be neither softened by prayer nor bribed by sacrifice; that he cares neither for curses nor for tears. And if the God of nature is not worthy of worship, what must we say of nature? Why should we worship a something, call it what you will, that so arranged and planned this world that life forever feeds on life, that joy is only born of pain? Can we bow in thankfulness before this fact? Why should we worship anything—book or being? Any being worthy of worship could not want it. To want worship is to be unworthy of it. Worship must be worthless if the worthy cannot giv it, and the worthy cannot receive it. There can only be worship when one is unworthy enough to giv it and another unworthy enough to receive it.

One of the worst things about the Bible, one of the worst in the average religion, is that it demands the sacrifice of self-respect. Every man is compelled to admit, before he can become a Christian—before he is fit even for conversion—that he is wholly and thoroughly depraved in thought and act, in mind and flesh; and, in addition to this, he must giv up and throw away the fruit of his experience, observation, and reason. Voluntarily he goes back to the childhood of the race. He becomes a frightened barbarian—an anxious savage.

The religious world has denied the constitution of the mind by claiming that each man for himself does and can control his thought, and does and can, without regard to evidence, or what he thinks to be the truth, choose his creed and church. This idea founded the Inquisition. This idea justifies hell.

We all remember the condition upon which Antonio was willing that mercy should be rendered to Shylock—

> That for this favor
> He presently become a Christian.

This was in accord with the religious philosophy of that day. Antonio supposed that this could be accomplished by an order of the court, and millions of pious Englishmen are still of the opinion that the same thing can be done by an act of Parliament. These frightful inconsistencies should be denounced by every honest man.

The intelligent should hav the courage to follow your example. Every man should be taught that his fellow-men hav the right to know his honest thoughts.

You hav attacked the Bible from every side. You hav pointed out thousands of contradictions, so glaring, so absurd, that one is almost convinced that they were intentionally made. You hav shown the littleness, the weakness, the shamelessness, the uselessness of hundreds and thousands of falsehoods. You hav shown the cruelty, the heartlessness, and the impossibility of hundred and hundreds of others. You hav stripped robes from priests, and beneath these robes you hav found hypocrits, assassins—and honest fear. You hav plucked patriarchs by the beard, and hav compelled them to confess that they were polygamists, adulterers, and monsters. You hav compelled prophets to admit that they lived by exciting the hopes and fears of men, and that their threats and promises were equally nought; and you hav shown that, in this so-called sacred book, each crime can find a text and every infamy a flag.

You hav earned the thanks of all who really think. You hav hastened the coming of that day when there will be found in the world's creed this at least:

> Happiness is the only good.
> The time to be happy is now.
> The place to be happy is here.
> The way to be happy is to try to make others so.

And when that day comes, those who by thought or deed hav added to the sum of human joy will be saints, and on that calendar will be found your name.

Yours always, ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

The Printers Celebrate.

Before the Truth Seeker Company moved into its present quarters at 28 Lafayette Place, a three-story brick building, designed for press, composing, and editorial rooms, was erected in the spacious back-yard. The new composing-room is a vast improvement over the old one, being a large square apartment, with snow-white walls and ceiling, and broad windows all around it. The printers conceived that it would be the proper thing to herald their entrance into these quarters with such exercises as should make the occasion memorable; and, having nothing selfish about them, they also determined to invite their friends to share in the glories of the event. The TRUTH SEEKER printers are all members in good standing of Typographical Union No. 6. They are named as follows: Theodore R. Stevens, sometimes called "Pop," because he is father of the chapel; he has been in the office some ten years; John Clancy, an Englishman, known as "Bol," which is short for Bolivar; James Phair, who learned the trade here ten years ago, and who has since been connected with the Salvation Army, and got out of it not much the worse to all appearances; Will Colby, who has come to weigh two hundred pounds by sticking to a TRUTH SEEKER case for seven or eight years; Edward Gilmartin, familiarly called "Short," because he doesn't seem to hav got his growth, although ten years at the business; Thomas Moran, who walked into the office five or six years ago with his hat in his hand, and was taken on as office boy because he was polite; and George Howard, an "extra," who is just learning to leave the e off hav, giv, and liv. Besides these, George Macdonald, the foreman, carries a Union card. He entered the office and began sweeping the floor and running for pie in the fall of 1875.

THE TRUTH SEEKER printers achieved a reputation as entertainers when, a year or so ago, a chapel send-off was given to the young Hindoo, Amrita Lal Roy, on the occasion of his leaving America for India; and therefore when the following invitation and program was issued there was no lack of responses:

THE TRUTH SEEKER CHAPEL OF ENLIGHTENED PRINTERS ask you to join them, on the evening of Monday, March 7th, in the Festiv exercises incident to their Removal to the New Composing Room at 28 Lafayette Place.

THE HOOK.

PART I.

8:30—OPENING ADDRESS. - - - By Father Stevens.
8:31—Close of above Address.
8:32—Speech. - By Mr. Ed. King, if he is in the Audience.

PART II.

8:50—March. - To B. Klancy, said to be the Oldest Living Compositor.
N.B.—The Editor will Review the Procession.
9:00—Take out Copy for the Lanciers. (Saratoga.)

> Resign yourself to joy and mirth—
> The Band will play for all it's worth.

9:20—A Waltz. - - To W. Colby, who does not waltz.
9:40 (or earlier)—Wayback Quadrille.
10:00—Waltz Quadrille. - To Happy James, of the Salvation Army.—Sacred Music.

PART III.

> On with the dance; let joy be unconfined!
> No sleep till morn. Your favorit partner choose,
> And chase the glowing hours out of their shoes.

Virginia Reel. To be led by Anyone who Knows it.
Saratoga Lanciers. To the Ladies, who will Choose their Partners.
Jig Quadrille. To Mr. Somerby, Business Manager.

> Now take the partner nearest you,
> And "hoe it down." Hurroo, hurroo!

NOTE.—The Editor and other Refreshments will be found upstairs.
Waltz. - - - - - - - - To All the Craft.
Wayback Quadrille Again.
Ninepin.
Virginia Reel. Livelier than Before.
All join hands and sing "Auld Lang Syne." Hands around.

Everything went off to perfection. As many as sixty ladies and gentlemen were present. Two violins, a harp, and a concertina, furnished music, and when the Wayback Quadrille was called for twenty couples made the lookers-on envious because they couldn't dance. There is no knowing when quiet old Lafayette Place got such a waking-up before. People in the neighborhood came out on their roofs and stood in the cold just to look in at the windows. The best dancer in the Virginia reel was Mr. Charles Eckhard. Mr. Somerby entered into the spirit of the hour with an enthusiasm which he rarely exhibits, while Dr. Foote, Sr., made some of the young folks realize that they didn't know much about dancing after all.

The editor entertained in his rooms upstairs, and when a young lady was required to complete a set, that was the place to look for one. Cheer of the approved sort was afforded the guests at appropriate intervals. The wonder of the day was where so many beautiful ladies came from. The harper harped with his harp until 12:30, after which time Edward King made a speech involving the experience of Benjamin Franklin as a printer; Mr. McEllery gave Bill Nye's version of the address of Spartacus to the gladiators; Mr. John N. Bogert recalled some happy reminiscences; the gentlemen of the composing-room sang solos and choruses, and Mr. LeCompte played good old tunes on his violin. It is believed that everybody present had a good time, and departed with a high opinion of printers as hosts, especially THE TRUTH SEEKER chapel. The only regret expressed was that the filling of the room with the appliances of the trade would make a repetition of the occasion impracticable. The members of the chapel wish to hereby extend thanks to all who were there, and helped to make their modestly-planned reception a glittering success.

FROM Longmont, Col., Colonel Kelso writes: "The flag of Freethought is still waving over our lively little city, and our bombs, charged with the dynamite of reason, common sense, science, and historical facts, are keeping up quite a commotion in the ranks of ignorance, superstition, and intolerance. On Sunday evening, Jan. 30th, Lois Waisbrooker delivered a lecture on temperance to a full house in Library Hall. Though a stanch advocate of temperance in all things, she showed conclusivly that the so-called temperance cause is thoroughly dead; that after its unconditional surrender to the church it had been immersed by her in the filthy pool of Prohibition politics, until it was not only dead from suffocation, but damned with dirtiness. She showed that it is not so much the use of intoxicating drinks that leads people to poverty and wretchedness, as it is poverty and wretchedness that lead them to the use of intoxicating drinks. She showed that, instead of needing Prohibition laws to render the poor unable to drown their sorrows in the intoxicating bowl, we need the abolition of all those laws by which laboring men are made poor and sorrowful; by which they are made to crave intoxication. She showed that we need less laws and more justice. On the evening of the 2d inst., that 'little giant,' Samuel P. Putnam, lectured in the same hall to a rather small but appreciativ audience. His subject was, 'The New God.' I will not attempt even a brief analysis of this masterly lecture. I could not do it justice. It must be heard from Putnam's own lips. I wish it could be thundered into the ears of every man and woman of the whole country. On next Sunday evening I am to throw a 'Sunday Question' bomb into the ranks of the enemy. Should this bomb do good execution, you will probably be informed by some other pen of the fact."

Church and Fiddle.

M. BABCOCK'S REPLY NO. III. TO THE Y. M. C. A.

GENTLEMEN: Some few years since, a fiddle was added to the choir of one of our St. John's churches, and its pastor might hav well said, "We will commence worship by fiddling, and singing the praise of almighty God." Now, the fiddle has been looked upon as the devil's own instrument, and it would seem that when the fiddle went in, God stepped out and the devil stepped in, and ran the church to suit himself. Members began to quarrel. I published circulars of good advice and pointing out their mistakes, and then Rev. Richards, their pastor, sued me for $10,000, for saying, "He doesn't believe the Bible to be the word of God."

Now, it would seem that after forsaking the church God was with me and the devil with their pastor, for, in trying to beat me, he beat himself. In court, he swore that he did not believe in witches, but he believed that God said, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv." He swore that he believed every word of the Bible to be the word of God, and then admitted that he did not believe that the last half of the last chapter of Saint Mark in King James's edition is the word of God.

And by this he knocked the bottom all out of the Protestant Bible (which suits the Catholics), for if the last half of the sixteenth chapter of Mark is an interpolation, how are we to know that one-half of every other chapter is not an interpolation?

Notwithstanding the good man who was after my money swore that he did believe all of the Bible to be the word of God, the court held that he did not believe all of the Bible to be the word of God. So he got no verdict on that part of the charge. But upon one other little matter he got only one cent on the dollar of the sum for which he sued. He did not get one-quarter enough to pay his own costs, and yet the devil—if there is a devil—made some of the members believe that he had won so great a victory for the Bible and almighty God that they ought to—and they did—serenade the good man with a brass band.

And after this, the good man charged, not me, but one of his own members, with unchristian conduct. And during the great church trial, brother was against brother, sister against sister, and the devil was to pay. And, gentlemen, it was a worker of this church, who, acting as your agent, gave me your card asking why am I not a Christian. Christ never opened his worship with a fiddle; he never sued anybody for talking against his religious belief, nor hav I ever sued anybody for talking against my religious belief; but Rev. J. E. Richards sued me for $10,000. I am with Christ, but the pastor and his backers are against him.

Now, what I want to talk about is this. This reverend in court swore that he believed that God will say to those upon the left hand, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." And he could not say but possibly hell-fire may be hot fire, the same kind of fire we hav in our stoves. Now, here is a minister who, if he swore to the truth, believes in a hell, and he and I met almost daily for years, and yet he never warned me against that awful place! What kind of a man is such a man as that? Believing in hell, but would sooner see me in hell than try to save me! But that is not all. This believer in hell is the father of children, and Henry Ward Beecher said that any man believing in such a hell as this reverend gentleman believes in, who will permit himself to be the father of children, is himself a monster. You will notice that the reverend believes and he doesn't believe, and it must be very nice to know just when and how much to believe and how much not to believe of the book from which he reads and preaches on Sundays. And this good man, who sued me for money and for saying, "He doesn't believe the Bible promises to be good," in court swore that he did believe the promises to be good, and he "believed that he could remove a mountain with prayer, if it was God's will." But, then, why doesn't he try it?

He said that he never had tried to remove a mountain with prayer, which fact is rather against his belief. Now, for several days there has been a mountain of ice which has so dammed Grand river a short distance from here as to flood the village of Lyons, carry off houses, and cause the people to flee for their lives. In vain they tried to remove the ice with dynamite, and if there ever was a first-class opportunity for this good man to try the effect of prayer, it was when the waters were overflowing the village of Lyons.

But where, oh, where was this mighty man of great faith? Of the tens and tens of thousands who were there from abroad, ready and anxious to help, I hav not learned that this mighty man was with them. Can it be that he would sooner see them drown than go to their relief, or didn't he believe, and only swore that he believed as a means of getting my money? Now, gentlemen, if the Bible promises are good, you could hav removed that mountain of ice with prayer, and by not trying it you hav established yourselvs a set of unbelievers; and by the same book by which you damn others you must be damned. Now, if you, or Richards, or anyone ever did believe that a mountain could be removed by prayers, it only goes to show what fools we mortals be.

It is said that two officers, just before going into battle, invited another officer to join them in prayer. He declined to do so, and after the fight it was found that the two who had prayed were killed, while the one who refused to pray escaped without a scratch. And men pray and ask God to soften their hearts, but the hearts of church-members are no softer, on an average, than are the hearts of others. I hav just heard of a man who gave one hundred dollars to the church, but refused to giv anything to the poor woman who sat out in the cold upon the doorstep, and, with tears in her eyes, begged for a little help. Now, I do not say, nor do I believe, that all church-members are bad, but I do say that their prayers hav not made them, on an average, better than others.

Gentlemen, if you believe, as the Bible teaches, that Christ forgave the unbelievers who murdered him, you should not insult him by believing that he will damn me and others for our unbelief. That kind of logic won't do. Hoping that you yet may see the error of your ways and hav a better opinion of Christ, and instead of tying yourselvs to the Bible adopt the religion of common sense and humanity, I remain your well wisher, M. BABCOCK.

Concerning the Famous Six Days' Job, and Cain's Wife.

We read in the "holy book"—the reading of this book broke the heart of Baron Munchausen, and planted him in a too previous grave, the remarkable snake, fish, and ghost stories contained in said "holy book" laying so far over his own remarkable flights of imagination as to crush him with the gangrene of mortification and break him all up, he succumbing to the crash at one fell swoop, as it were—we read that the Lord was just six days in building and stocking heaven and earth, taking a rest on the seventh. Six days, eh? Regulation days, as we understand them, of twenty-four hours to the day, sixty minutes to the hour, sixty seconds to the minute, and the seconds of the same caliber as at present, I wonder? This query is pertinent because, later on, we read that to the Lord a day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as a day. Now, did the Lord work six days of twenty-four hours each—regulation hours, understand—or six days of a thousand years each? This is a puzzler for the pietists, many of whom say, with the immortal Toots, "It's of no consequence." Neither is it; but in a work for man's own belief and guidance—God's own chronicles at that—why wasn't the straight and correct tip given? A certain church paper of the present period tells its readers that, while many accept the regulation days, others incline to the opinion that the "six days" mean "six long periods of time;" and as much as says, "You can take your choice, brethren; you pays your money."

I think, however, that we must accept these days as we reckon days, for it says the Lord rested on the seventh day, and had the days been of the thousand-year variety, the Lord must hav neglected things, and we read in the Chronicles that he was very busy immediately after creation, and couldn't possibly hav rested a thousand years; vide his seances with Adam and Eve and others later on, long before a thousand years had elapsed.

Omnipotent and omni-everything, why needed the Lord to take a rest? Not that I begrudge him, for I like to take a rest myself at times, but it seems to reflect on his powers of endurance—let us be thankful it was not for a thousand years, if that would hav entailed upon us a Christian Sunday of like duration! Whew! think of it, mortal man—of a Sunday a thousand years long, and run on the Blue law Protestant plan!—the Catholics are more liberal with regard to Sunday, not objecting, in countries where the pope's toe is universally kissed, to cock-fights, bull-fights, and other cheerful and exhilarating amusements on the holy day. But think again of a Protestant Blue law Sunday a thousand years long! Holy smoke! isn't it enough to giv one the horrors of forty horse-power intensity? Don't let us think of such a Sunday again!

In the narrativ of creation, we learn that man was the last thing made by the Lord—to except the woman would be quibbling merely—and that he was made of the dust of the earth. I hav often wondered, the earth, sun, moon, and stars having been fashioned from nothing, why man needed to be made of dirt—very likely, though, the entire stock of nothing had been used up in the previous fabrications—unless it was to knock the conceit out of him, by telling him what he was made of when he got to riding too high a horse, as it were.

I know of some men to whom it must be gall and wormwood to think that man was an afterthought of the creator, and made out of dirt at that, for want of better material. Yes, indeed, gall and wormwood, so overloaded and top-heavy are they with triple X self-esteem. Take a high-up metropolitan hotel clerk, for instance; tell him he is made of dirt of the earth, and he would annihilate you if he could. Possibly this thought has a stand-off in the egotistical belief that he is fashioned after God's own image, as stated in the legend of creation in the alleged words of God himself. Very likely, with the hotel clerk, very likely.

If we go it blind on the polyglot, we must believe that God is a person built like man, and the prototype, in the matter of form, of man. This givs us a clear conception of God in the concrete, and in our mind's eye we can see him, picturing his face as we may, according as we look upon him either as a benevolent or a vengeful God.

The man who swallows the Bible entire, without "coppering" any of the statements therein, must believe in a personal God of an image after which man was fashioned. But there are Theists, parsons included, who "copper" here and there, and quite extensivly. They are not the true-blue receivers of the word, but take certain things as set forth cum grano salis. Some of these take no stock in a personal God, believing God to be a spirit, and not a person, yet these same switchers-off nearly all believe in a personal devil, man shaped, consequently God-shaped, but having horns, tail, and cloven hoofs. While they can giv up the personal God, they can't, or won't, giv up the personal devil. Queer, isn't it? Well, let them stick to the devil if it does them any good, and they are so fond of him. I wish them joy of their pet.

Reading on, we very shortly come to the Garden of Eden story, with its ever-to-be-remembered apple-tree and talking snake. The story, being familiar to everyone, need not be dwelt upon. Admitting it as a "ground-floor" fact, what must be thought of the being who, knowing the nature he had implanted in the man and woman just made by him, who knew beforehand that they would go for the fruit forbidden them, yet puts it within their reach, and leads them to their own destruction? Eating of this proscribed fruit, as reported, they were bounced from Eden, when everlasting trouble for man commenced, as the maker knew it would. It seems to me that this was a most unfair piece of business, to say the least, on the part of the Lord, and not to be reconciled with true goodness.

Bounced from Eden, Adam had to hump himself as a farmer. In course of time two sons were born to him, these being Cain and Abel; the first named the first born. Cain took up with farming, and Abel with sheep-raising. Cain brought an offering to the Lord—potatoes or something he had raised—but the Lord wouldn't hav it, but took Abel's offering, a nice fat lamb. This made Cain mad, and well it might, for he had offered the best he had to offer, and he up and went for Abel and knocked him out—dead as a herring.

This act is not to be defended, if his intention was to kill Abel. But there is no positiv proof that he intended to kill him. Mad, he pummeled him harder than he thought, and very likely was surprised when he found he had fixed him. To be sure, according to the report of the affair, he told the Lord, who asked where his brother was—as if the Lord didn't know—that he wasn't his brother's keeper, and didn't know where he was. But this proves nothing. He had soured on the Lord, and said the first thing that came to his lips. This act I don't think should stand as murder in the first degree against Cain, but manslaughter in the fourth degree.

But the Lord bounced Cain from his home and farm, and he skipped for the land of Nod, of which land no mention had previously been made. The direction and distance of this land from Cain's ranch are not stated, but without the slightest premonition this hitherto-unheard-of land is sprung upon the astonished reader, who, if he be a scripture-swallower, must accept the "land of Nod" without inquiry as to its location, thus proving himself a Christian of the true-blue order of architecture.

But the surprise of the "land of Nod" is nothing to that immediately after sprung upon us—the taking of a wife in said land by Cain! This is a surprise party whose dynamic force is beyond human comprehension. It would hav knocked me silly had not Byron long ago given the straight tip with regard to this wife episode. Now, the report that Cain went to the "land of Nod" and took a wife is not correct. The slugger—first on record—took a wife in the first instance, and then skipped out for the "land of Nod." And that wife—who was she? Why, she was Adah. And who was Adah? Why, she was Cain's sister, was Adah, and that's what's the maddah with Adah!

The world owes Byron—the poet-stalwart of the stalwart poets—a tremendous debt of thankfulness for clearing up the mystery of Cain's wife, even though the exposé was of unsavory character. But we all know that "in the beginning" there must hav been a good deal of sister-marrying, shudder at it as we may. Let us be thankful that there are now other fellows' sisters, and draw the pall of forgetfulness over the primeval days of the race fashioned of dirt, after God's own image. SI SLOKUM.

Mr. Reynolds in Ohio.

KENT, OHIO.—I arrived at Kent March 24th, ahead of my time, expecting to lecture Saturday evening, the 26th, but an impecunious theatrical troupe were, by lack of patronage elsewhere, driven into the town, and desired to make one Moore Miss, a last despairing effort to get car-fare home to New York. Mr. Kent, the owner of the hall, and his son, who cannot endure the thought of human suffering, if in their power in any way to alleviate it, generously helped them out by permitting them the use of the hall, and I gave way, the more willingly as the stormy weather made the railroad track a hard road to travel on foot.

I had a very pleasant acquaintance with the Liberals of Kent, and found some stanch old veterans, who "endured the cross and despised the shame" during the time "that tried men's souls"—the pioneer days of Abolition. Joseph Heighton and his brother Thomas renounced the Bible because it both taught and defended slavery. Joseph Heighton devoted himself and all he had to the cause of human freedom, and was ostracized, beaten, stoned, shot at, his cattle poisoned, his horses killed, his barns and his home burnt over his head, and he warned to quit the advocacy of Abolition, or he would be hanged to a tree on his own farm; and these outrages were perpetrated by avowed Christians, leading men in the churches, who thus desired to show their reverence and belief in the holy Bible. The brave old veterans hav lived to hear the church extol what it then condemned, and claim all the honor of achieving what it most zealously and desperately opposed.

Joseph Heighton's eldest son, Marius, inherits all the fearless independence of his father, combined with the gentle, loving nature of his mother, and despite his being the most zealous worker for Liberalism, he is loved and respected by all who know him. Thomas Heighton, a venerable, sturdy champion of reason, right, and truth, and his bright, cheery-hearted wife, are glorious specimens of Infidelity. If a good woman is a crown to her husband, then Thomas Heighton's wedding-day was his coronation day, and no mistake.

I would some of our policy Liberals, our mollusks, could realize the truth that a pure, honest, useful life and earnest advocacy of Secularism does not injure, but helps in business, and secures the respect of the community. Mr. L. G. Reed is an outspoken Infidel, carries on the largest grocery business in Kent, and has the respect and confidence of the entire community. Unsolicited, they selected him councilman, and I hav never yet found a man or woman who lived up to the principles of Liberalism, who practiced justice and mercy, and sought ever to promote the happiness of those around them (as does L. G. Reed), whose Infidel opinions injured their business in the long run, or lost them respect of the best citizens.

There is in Kent one loud declaimer, who talks, but fails to liv out Liberalism; who, taking advantage of others subscribing to THE TRUTH SEEKER, rushes into print as a champion of Freethought—but, like the deacon, what he givs "is nothing to nobody." Such characters meet with just contempt. I was glad to find only one of the kind in Kent.

It is unfair to the many grand, kind, noble hearts who all helped in the good work to omit to mention them, but there is limit to THE TRUTH SEEKER'S columns. But of the staid old stand-by, B. F. Conaway, through whose exertions the club of fifty—now nearly seventy-five—subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER was secured, I cannot but say I do most devoutly wish his glorious example might find followers in every town. It was a hopeless task to get subscribers to a Liberal paper, quite impossible—at least, that was the general opinion. But quiet, patient perseverance won the victory, as it always will, and the club was raised, the money paid, and the number still increasing.

On Sunday afternoon, the most fierce and savage storm prevailed, yet there was a goodly number present. In the evening the storm somewhat abated, yet raged quite furiously. Large attendance and most earnest attention; sold large quantity of Liberal literature. Monday the Liberal lectures were the town talk. In the evening the hall was crowded. I spoke on "Salvation—Secular or Christian, Which?" I called attention to the utter failure of the Christian scheme of salvation. The Bible declares, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die" (Ezek. xviii, 4). Christ came to save all who believe in him. What does he save from? Not from sin, for men and women continue to sin. Not from death, for men and women all around us die. Not, as churches allege, to save our immortal souls from eternal death, for the church itself claims our souls are immortal, and cannot die. Not from hell fire, for the church has discarded hell. But, if men needed salvation, could Christ save sinners? "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." Did Christ's soul die? The church says emphatically, No! Christ was God, his soul could not die. Then he could not pay the penalty, for the decree is, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." But the Bible and Christ declare his soul did die (Isa. liii, 10, 12; Rev. i, 18). Which are we to believe?

But, cries the Christian, "Christ came on earth to pay the penalty of man's sins. He was a willing sacrifice, and poured out his life's blood on Calvary's cross!" The New Testament declares (John xix, 33, 34) that Christ never poured out his blood willingly at all—he did not shed his blood. No blood was poured out on Calvary's cross until after Christ was actually dead (John xix, 34).

The Catholic priest, Rev. Geo. Leming (who, I am told, used up Colonel Ingersoll in debate), indulged in a debate of about an hour after the lecture, or rather gave a number of harangs, with the hope to drive away remembrance of the damaging facts I had proved in regard to the Christian plan of salvation. He denied that Christianity could ever land a man in jail; declared a man's blood would pour out after he was dead; that Christianity, in spite of all efforts of its foes, was greatly on the increase; that the church was the friend of liberty and of education, and a number of similar assertions, not once even attempting to prove anything he asserted. I was induced to giv one more lecture the next evening on "The Trial of Satan;" had immense audience and great enthusiasm. Once again was proved the advisability of giving three or more lectures, whenever possible, the influence and results so far exceeding those of one—deepening conviction, removing prejudice, and giving a permanent boom to the cause. I left the dear friends Wednesday morning, full of bright hope and glad enthusiasm, myself greatly cheered and encourag d by the success achieved. C. B. REYNOLDS.

Matters and Things.

It is only a few days ago that the "house" in Washington actually convened and did business without the opening services of a chaplain! Just think of it! One whole day that God Almighty did not know that there was a "house." There was none to nudge him, so to speak, into a respectful remembrance that there was a set of godless souls waiting for the overshadowing presence of the Holy Spirit before they could proceed with business! How unfortunate for the country! It was the first time in six years. It is gratifying to learn that the house is still there, and that the chaplain's salary still goes on.

And now comes Beecher, with these words: "A man who believes in hell is a candidate for the insane asylum." It is cheering that once in a while we hav a minister who will acknowledge that lunacy often arises from too much orthodoxy. Still, hell goes on by the preaching of the word, the asylums prosper, and "man will not think." We are like the old Calvinistic Baptist preacher, when preaching about the doctrin of universal salvation: "Brethren, we hope for better things."

Now, there comes a craft in sight! What is it? It is the old ship of Zion, and on board there appears the "old Mother of Harlots" and the Protestant child! Mirabile dictu! How they hobnob together! They are talking plans to get God into the Constitution and God into the schools. The lion and the lamb, the vulture and the sparrow. We hav heard that there was mooted the question of an alliance to effect the God question. Suppose the two powers forget their blood-letting till they get a firmer grip on superstitious mortality? Turn back the clock till the time of the Dark Ages, before the printing press was made; put the telescope under the bed; no light nor science wanted—the electric light need not apply. Prepare the Inquisition; restore the prophets, and let mental darkness reign. Put God in the Constitution—put him in the schools; put the orrery in the cellar, take the charts from the walls of the school-room; put up a picture of the holy Virgin, surrounded by a canopy of canonized saints—old St. Bartholomew, Constantine, and other devoted Christians.

A Christian tells us that God is everywhere. That is, he is the shape of all space outside of all material bodies. If so, he must be wonderfully elastic. As the heavenly bodies fly through space, he must change form as the spheres change places. Wonderful being! Wonderful nonsense these deluded superstitious dupes believe. God is like a lot of balls in a vessel of water. Shake the water, the balls move about, and the water represents God filling the universe. Yours during the war,

The Mortara Child Abduction Case.

Now when the jealousy and the strained relations of Germany and France, and also the complications of Italy in Abyssinia, are being made the occasions for renewed agitations and intrigues for the reëstablishment of the temporal power of the pope (agitations which will be set in motion by the energetic general staff of the church, the Jesuits, in the United States also, just as was done a couple of years ago for the recovery of the sequestered property of the Propaganda), it may be opportune to recall to the memory of the present generation an occurrence that has nearly been forgotten, but that produced, about a quarter of a century ago, the profoundest sensation of indignation and horror, and contributed as powerfully to the downfall of the temporal power of the pope as did Mrs. Stowe's "Uncle Tom's Cabin" to the abolition of slavery.

At the time when the emperor Napoleon III. had reached the zenith of his power, and the temporal power of the pope was defended against the Italian people by a strong French garrison at Rome, there lived in Bologna, one of the most important cities of the then Papal States, a wealthy Jewish banker, Mortara.

One night the Mortara family were aroused from their sleep by the appearance of a papal officer and a squad of sbirri (papal police soldiers), who showed Mortara a peremptory order issued by the papal authorities in Rome to carry his little five-years old boy to Rome for confinement in a monastery. This order resulted from the fact that when that little boy was an infant his Catholic nurse was induced secretly to carry the infant into a church and hav it baptized, the officiating priest binding the nurse to the most absolute secrecy. Mortara, seeing that resistance would be useless, gave up the child to the officer, but started also for Rome. There he procured an audience with pope Pio Nono, threw himself to his feet, and begged for the restitution of his child. But in vain; "Non possumus"—"It is impossible"—was the only answer he received. One may imagin with what feelings that father returned to the grief-stricken, bereft mother; and is it to be wondered that the fathers and mothers of the whole civilized world sympathized with them, and proclaimed a government that authorizes such barbarous practices unworthy of existence?

Mons. Fould, a friend of Mortara's, was at that time secretary of the treasury of Emperor Napoleon, and through Mons. Fould Mortara procured the intervention of the emperor. But even the voice of Napoleon was not powerful enough to bring about the release of the child. When, some twelve years later, the defeat of the French by the Germans caused the withdrawal of the French garrison from Rome, and permitted the Italian army to take possession of Rome, the Mortara parents anticipated the release of their child, and a joyful reunion. But what was their disappointment, when they found that the wily Jesuits had secretly removed their child to some foreign convent! When later on they discovered their then grown-up son in a convent in Belgium, he was so alienated from his parents that he would not recognize them any more, and felt even grateful to his captors for having him brought to salvation. And such a dangerous organization that approves of child abduction is allowed to gain more power every day in this republic! L. K.

A Sunday City.

From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Two things surprise all strangers who visit St. Louis.

One is to find all the saloons open on Sunday, the theaters giving performances, even matinees, the beer gardens crowded in season, the Sunday mail a municipal feature, and almost universal liberty as to the observance of Sunday.

The other cause of surprise is to find that the Monday police dockets are unusually light. There is no more Sunday drunkenness in St. Louis than in cities where saloons are closed on Sundays. There is less disturbance of the peace, and in St. Louis more workmen are ready for work Monday morning than in cities where their Sunday welfare is taken in charge by the law.

These are facts which we do not care to account for. They will not be denied by anyone who is acquainted with the condition of other cities.

After this satisfactory state of affairs has continued for a whole lifetime, the legislature in its wisdom proposes, without taking any vote of the people of St. Louis, to change it totally, to invent a long catalog of new offenses, to interfere with personal liberty and local self-government, to turn the innocent amusements of thousands and tens of thousands into causes of arrest and prosecution, and to excite all that quarreling and bad feeling which are invariably excited when the attempt is made to enforce Sunday laws in large cities.

Before such a Pandora's box of ills is opened for us, the voters of St. Louis should hav a voice in determining whether they want it or not.

St. Louis is doing well enough as it is, and it is always a good plan to let well enough alone.

The Unbelieving Judges of Ohio.

It is not generally known that the Bible is used for swearing in superior court judges, and for no other purpose in our courts. The Bible formerly used by this court for this purpose, and on which every judge of the court to that time had been sworn, was destroyed by the court-house fire.

Said Judge Peck to the Post:

"So far as I know, ours is the only court in the county or state which clings to this time-honored custom, but in some states the book is commonly used in this way."

"We do not administer the oath of office in that way in the common pleas courts," said Judge Robertson when asked about it. "It is a custom which should be abolished."

"Why?" was asked, with some astonishment.

"The administration of oaths by the use of the Bible presupposes that the person to whom the oath is administered believes that the Bible is the word of God. As a matter of fact, there is not a judge in this county to-day who believes that it is the word of God, or will hav the hardihood to say that it is a verbatim statement of God's word. Under that condition of things, it should not be used in this way. I will say, however, that the oath administered is nearly the same as that administered to the judges of Israel, and half our laws are right out of the books of Moses almost—hav come down to us, and hav been in common use from that day to this."—Cincinnati Post.

The Death of Henry Ward Beecher.

By this time all the world knows of the death of the greatest Christian preacher of this age. But whether orthodoxy or heterodoxy has the more cause to mourn is an open question. Orthodox in belief Beecher certainly was not. He would hav resented, probably, being told that he was an Infidel, yet no conservativ theologian thought of him otherwise than as one of those liberal preachers who damaged the cause of Christ by his liberal interpretation of the scriptures and rejection of the fundamental tenets of Christianity.

Mr. Beecher was born June 24, 1813, in Litchfield, Conn. When a boy of thirteen he wanted to be a sailor. His father, Lyman Beecher, apparently consented, but as he sent him to Amherst College, said, "I will hav that boy in the ministry yet." At college Henry Ward studied hard, but with his face to the sea. However, before the close of a year he became impressed at a revival, and turned his thoughts toward the ministry. His father had become president of Lane Theological Seminary, at Walnut Hills, near Cincinnati, and Mr. Beecher, after graduating at Amherst in 1834, went thither for his theological training. Before he finished his studies, he edited for some months the organ of the New School Presbyterian church, in the absence of Dr. Brainard. He condemned the pro-slavery rioters who destroyed Dr. Burney's press at that time. In 1837 he became pastor of a Presbyterian church at Lawrenceburg, Ind., and in 1839 he went to Indianapolis. In 1847 he took charge of Plymouth church, which was organized for him. He gave notice at once that temperance and antislavery were a part of the gospel that he should preach. His efforts drew public attention toward him, and almost from the first he had large audiences.

It was as an Abolitionist that Mr. Beecher first won world-wide and glorious fame, and recently, while in England, he was honored for that to such an extent that upon his return he told a reporter that the Englishmen must think he was the one man in this country who freed the slaves. When the fugitiv slave law was passed, he became one of the most prominent of the directors of the underground railroad company. His congregation were nearly all stockholders of the line, and the church has been called its Grand Central Depot. The deviation from the established rules of gospel preaching and the opening of the pulpit to political discussions caused much excited denunciation in orthodox circles. The pluck of the Plymouth pastor in those times of excitement was unquestioned. When Wendell Phillips failed to get a hall in New York and Brooklyn wherein to speak, because of the bitter hate for Abolitionists, Mr. Beecher threw open Plymouth church for him, and, as a disturbance was threatened, he had his trustees attend the meeting armed with heavy canes. In the Kansas settlement struggle, Mr. Beecher himself led a subscription to send Sharp's rifles and Bibles to Kansas. On June 8, 1856, on Sunday morning, it was announced that a gang from the vicinity of Washington Market intended to visit Brooklyn that evening, "to clean out the d——d Abolition nest of Plymouth church," and "lay out" Beecher. The church was strongly guarded by armed men, and although a bullet was thrown through a glass window at the pulpit, it created only a ripple of excitement.

In February, 1860, Bishop Faulkner, then a member of Plymouth church, returning home from Washington, brought a ten-year-old mulatto girl, valued at $900, and Mr. Beecher took the little slave-girl into the pulpit on Feb. 5, 1860, and asked for enough money to buy the child's freedom. When the contribution-box passed, Miss Rose Terry, a member of the congregation, drew a ring from her finger and dropped it in the box. Mr. Beecher put the ring upon the slave-girl's finger, told her that it was her freedom ring, and named her Rose Ward, after the donor of the ring and himself. On June 1, 1861, the congregation purchased the freedom of a twenty-year-old slave-girl named Sarah, and as the collection was taken up much jewelry was thrown into the box.

Mr. Beecher's popularity was greatly enhanced by a visit to England in 1863, and he was enthusiastically greeted on his return. He rapidly gained the reputation of the foremost pulpit orator of the country, and his salary was gradually increased to $20,000.

The first cloud upon Beecher's fair name was his marriage of Mrs. McFarland to A. D. Richardson, when Richardson was dying from a wound inflicted upon him by Daniel McFarland for seducing the latter's wife. This marriage created a great scandal, and was denounced as a free-love performance, as it was denied that Mrs. McFarland had a legal divorce. The second cloud was the Tilton scandal, which for six months of 1874–5 filled columns of the daily press. About the scandal the less said the better.

Mr. Beecher's position as a Congregational preacher was anomalous. He did not believe in the Calvinistic creed, and he voluntarily resigned from his official membership of the Congregational body. He had, though, a sort of india-rubber way of preaching heresy. Periodically he would publicly renounce some leading doctrin of the church, startling the whole Christian world, while the Infidels exulted. Then he would deliver a sermon which enabled the orthodox to catch breath, so churchly was it, while the heretics wondered if he was losing his senses. His sermons in which he denounced the doctrins of hell, the vicarious atonement, and the fall, were all folfowed by discourses more than usually conservativ.

But, notwithstanding this habit, there is no doubt that Mr. Beecher was at heart a social and theological heretic. For several years he enjoyed the friendship of Stephen Pearl Andrews, when the latter was startling the country by his radical lectures and writings. Mr. Beecher often visited Mr. Andrews, in those days, though after the Tilton-Beecher trial the two rarely met. The great preacher came to learn of the Pantarch, and to most of Mr. Andrews's statements of principles yielded the assent of conviction. On one of these occasions, when Mr. Beecher had allowed that his friend was about right in his Radicalism, Mr. Andrews asked him why he stayed in a pulpit when the doctrins of the church were so uncongenial. "I cannot help it," replied Beecher; "if I should come out I should be execrated by all my people. I should be an outcast. And I never could liv through it. I must hav sympathy and friends; it is my nature, and I cannot change it. You, Andrews, are strong, and don't care what the world says; in your position I should die."

We hav often heard Mr. Andrews repeat the story of the interview in which Mr. Beecher said this. It was about the last visit Beecher made to Andrews, for the noted scandal then became public, which doubtless led to the separation of the two great men. Mr. Andrews felt that Mr. Beecher was not true to principles honestly held, and he did not care to continue the acquaintance. And Mr. Beecher, like most people whose virtue is questioned, was not so bold as previously, when he felt that his reputation would carry him through any heresy he might entertain. Fifteen or twenty years ago it nearly cost a public man his good name to hav it known that he was a friend of Stephen Pearl Andrews. To-day, a great many are glad to say they enjoyed the acquaintance of the Pantarch.

But, with whatever failings he may hav had, Henry Ward Beecher has made the world better, broader, more generously tolerant, kinder, and more inclined to take a rational view of religion. The refusal of the Congregational ministers of Chicago to send a message of condolence to Mrs. Beecher when her husband lay dying, was an act that must cover the ministers with infamy. It cannot hurt the dead. Freethinkers will grieve at this new exhibition of Christian uncharitableness, and it will enhance their esteem for a man whom the Congregationalists feared and hated even though dying.

The Church's Felonies.

There is now a strong probability that the people of New York will not hav a convention to revise the constitution of the state during 1887. The late candidate for mayor of the Labor party believes this to be the fault of the Roman Catholic hierarchy. Maybe it is, but if so the hierarchy will gain little. Should a convention be held this year, we doubt if the people could be awakened to the importance of the question of providing in a new constitution that church property should not be longer exempted from taxation. By another year, possibly the people may find some interest in the matter. There are now in the legislature two bills bearing upon this exemption swindle which should not become laws. One is introduced by Assemblyman Crosby and incorporates the "St. Mary's Free Hospital for Children" and provides, of course, for exempting all its property. The other is introduced by Senator Plunkett, and includes as follows:

"Every building erected for the use of a college, incorporated academy, or other seminary of learning, every building for public worship, every public school-house, free hospital, court house, and jail, and the several lots wherein such buildings are situated, and the furniture belonging to each of them."

A third bill has been put through this session, but was vetoed by Governor Hill, which exempted about forty thousand dollars' worth of property belonging to a Young Woman's Association of Troy. All these assaults upon the state treasury hav had the effect of stirring up another senator—Mr. Dunham—and he is earnestly opposing so much exemption. He has burrowed in the tax offices and in every other office where he could obtain statistics showing the enormous increase in tax exemptions during the past few years and the corresponding increase in the tax thus thrown upon individual owners of taxable property. His investigations, says the correspondent of the New York Times, show a marked tendency toward soldering the relations between church and state, the state like a patient beast staggering along under an increasing load of church exemptions. Senator Dunham believes that all kinds of property should bear their proportionate weight of the burden of taxation, and thus by its general distribution lighten the load now thrust on individual citizens:

"The general statute and existing judicial decisions relativ to the exemption of property from taxation," says Senator Dunham, "are so broad and liberal that every deserving charitable or benevolent, educational, religious, and literary institution can easily obtain all the relief from taxation to which it is justly subject, and for that reason every measure designed to giv special exemption from taxation should be thoroughly considered." The claim that charity should be considered in the case of institutions he regards as flimsy indeed. "Let us consider," he says, "what New York city has done already for charity. It spent in the year 1886 $1,550,000 to support its department of charities and correction. It appropriated and paid to charitable societies, under the provisions of existing special acts, $1,205,000. It paid to charitable institutions out of the excise fund $550,000—a total of $3,305,000. In addition to this, there was exempted from taxation in that city last year, property of charitable societies, the assessed value of which, if taxed, would hav been about $30,000,000, which, at the rate of tax for that year (2.29 per cent), would hav produced $687,000. This amount of tax was an indirect appropriation to charities. The city of New York, therefore, paid to charities during the year just closed no less a sum than $4,092,000. Notwithstanding that the city of New York pays millions of dollars annually for charitable purposes, there is not a session of the state legislature but what foists or seeks to foist upon that city additional burdens by special legislation.

"There was exempt from taxation in the city of New York for the year 1886 real property, the assessed value of which, if taxed, would hav been $277,619,160, which is more than the assessed value of the real and personal property of any county in the state, except New York and Kings. It is more than the assessed value of the real estate in Albany, Erie, and Westchester counties combined for the year 1885.

"The church and charitable property in New York city exempt from taxation for 1886 was in round figures $75,000,000, a greater amount than the assessed value of the real estate of any county in the state, excepting Albany, Erie, Kings, and New York, and about three times the assessed value for 1885 of the real estate in any one of the counties of Broome, Cattaraugus, Chautauqua, Columbia, Livingston, Montgomery, Cayuga, Niagara, Oswego, Queens, Saratoga, St. Lawrence, Steuben, Ulster, or Wayne.

"It is high time that this wholesale exemption of property from taxation in the city of New York was restricted, if not stopped altogether, as it is becoming a very serious question. The greater portion of this property exempt, in fact, nearly all of it, is south of the Harlem river, on Manhattan Island, an island which contains, including all the parks, avenues, and streets, but a little over 12,000 acres. These costly charitable and religious institutions, with their ample grounds, which they probably would not hold if they were taxed, only tend to overcrowd and increase the rents of the taxable property in the city. These exemptions are an injustice to those who are compelled by circumstances to liv in the city, or who do business there."

It is a pity that in our Senate Mr. Dunham stands practically alone in seeking justice in taxation, but he has allies in a good portion of the press, and if the constitutional convention does not meet till 1888 it may be possible to arouse the people on the question.

No authority less than a constitutional prohibition can keep the thieving fingers of the churchman out of the state treasury.

The Star of Bethlehem.

A paragraph is going around through the press of the country carrying a prophecy that the so-called Star of Bethlehem will again make its appearance during the year 1887.

We first hear of the Star of Bethlehem in connection with the birth of Christ and the appearance of the seven wise men from the east. It may not be necessary in a brief examination of this question to inquire why, if the wise men saw the star in the east, they immediately went west; nor need we ask who these wise men were, since none would be able to answer. For Judea extends but a few miles east from Jerusalem, and beyond that is a desert inhabited then, as now, by barbarian Arabs who did not speak the language of the Jews, and it appears that these gentlemen had no difficulty in making themselvs understood in Jerusalem. They arrived, too, while the infant was still in the manger, so that their journey, with the means of conveyance then in use, must necessarily hav been short. Neither is it to the purpose to inquire why these wise men are mentioned by Matthew alone, nor what became of them, why we hear of them no more, whether they returned to their own land with the glad tidings or not. Why, if the star they saw was the Star of Bethlehem, and they knew it to be such, they should stop at Jerusalem, several miles north of Bethlehem, to inquire through the streets, "Where is he that is born king of the Jews?" we need not ask. A star that would lead them west to Jerusalem, and then turn a sharp corner and go south to Bethlehem, must, of necessity, hav pursued an erratic course. Stars, as Col. John R. Kelso points out in a consideration of this question, are of two kinds—fixed stars and planets. If a fixed star, it would not move at all; if a planet, it must hav had an orbit, circular or elliptical. It is the orbital motion of the planets that enables astronomers to calculate their recurrence with accuracy. The Star of Bethlehem was obviously not a fixed star, and since, as is equally obvious, it moved in neither a circle nor an ellipsis, how can its periodicity be determined?

The first astronomer to note the alleged recurrence of this star was Tycho Brahe, in the constellation of Cassiopœa, in 1572; and that the star which he saw was the star seen by the wise men rests upon a guess prompted by the superstition of that age. Three hundred years ago people were in the habit of believing almost anything except the truthful and the probable.

Tradition had it that the same star had appeared in 1257, and it took very little research in those days of blind faith to ascertain that, with some modifications, a similar star had illumined the Christmas of 942, etc. On the strength, therefore, of tradition and faith, Tycho Brahe fixed the periodicity of the star at 315 years, which is the difference between 1257 and 942. This would indeed giv 1572 and 1887 as the proper years for it to come again, but if we reckon backward toward the beginning of our era, dividing 1887 by 315, we shall hav a remainder of 312, which would necessitate the placing of the birth of Christ back three years B.C., or else calling the present year 1890.

It is a curious fact that while the believers in this Star of Bethlehem instance Brahe as authority for the fact that it appeared, that eminent astronomer himself did not share their belief. He says: "Nor is one to persuade himself that this star is like that one which appeared to the wise men of the east at the birth of our savior, for that one was not in the heavens among the other stars, but in a lower aerial region and near the earth."

As a final reason for not believing that the "Pilgrim" of 1572 will shine again in 1887, it may be said on the authority of scientific men that no star with a periodicity of 315 years is known to astronomy, and astronomy is the oldest of sciences.

A Pious Don Quixote.

Mr. George A. Sheridan has taken advantage of Colonel Ingersoll's world-wide reputation to try to make a little fame for himself. At the Atheneum on Washington Hights, last week, he delivered a "reply" to Ingersoll. Among other foolish things, he said this:

"The trained philosophers of Christianity could pierce Ingersoll's ragged armor as easily as a breath from the nostrils of Jehovah could scorch his Infidel soul into cinders."

Well, why don't they do it?

Christian Assurance.

In the Christian at Work of the 10th inst., Lewis E. Jackson givs the church accommodation of New York city. The list is as follows:

| Denomination. | No. of churches. | Sittings. |
|---|---|---|
| Baptists | 50 | 40,000 |
| Congregational | 7 | 5,600 |
| Friends | 4 | 3,200 |
| Hebrew Christian | 2 | 500 |
| Independent | 1 | 800 |
| Jews | 30 | 24,000 |
| Lutheran | 24 | 19,200 |
| Methodist Episcopal | 73 | 58,100 |
| African M. E | 8 | 5,000 |
| Free Methodist | 2 | 1,000 |
| Moravian | 2 | 1,000 |
| Presbyterian | 70 | 56,000 |
| United Presbyterian | 6 | 4,000 |
| Reformed Presbyterian | 5 | 3,000 |
| Protestant Episcopal | 84 | 67,000 |
| Reformed Episcopalian | 2 | 1,200 |
| Reformed (Dutch) | 28 | 22,000 |
| Roman Catholic | 61 | 58,200 |
| Unitarian | 3 | 2,400 |
| Universalist | 4 | 3,200 |
| Miscellaneous (comprising 8 denominations) | 34 | 27,000 |
| | 500 | 409,000 |

The number of Protestant communicants Mr. Jackson givs as follows:

| Protestant church organizations. | | Communicants. |
|---|---|---|
| 1 Baptist | 40 | 12,368 |
| 2 Methodist | 53 | 12,707 |
| 3 Presbyterian | 48 | 19,823 |
| 4 Protestant Episcopalian | 64 | 31,369 |
| 5 Reformed (Dutch) | 22 | 6,600 |
| Smaller denominations | 58 | 11,600 |
| | 285 | 94,467 |

This is a beggarly showing. New York city has a population of about a million and a half. Less than one hundred thousand of these, or only one in fifteen, it appears, are communicants of the Protestant churches. The Catholic church sittings are less than sixty thousand, but as the Catholic churches are filled several times on Sundays, that denomination must be allowed more church-goers. Probably a quarter of a million would not be a high estimate. But that would bring the church attendants of New York under four hundred thousand, or less than one in four of New York's population.

Yet this beggarly minority hav the assurance to imagin that they are divinely endowed with the right to control the rest of the people of New York.

Papal Benedictions Only Matters of Courtesy.

On Mr. Pecci's birthday the parishioners of Dr. McGlynn sent a cablegram of congratulation. The pope sent back the following message in Latin:

"Your telegram most acceptable was to the sovereign pontiff who returning thanks to the reverend McGlynn to you and to the faithful of the parish the apostolic benediction most lovingly imparts."

The receipt of this gave the faithful of St. Stephen's much joy, because they thought it indicated, by the inclusion of "Alumnus McGlynn," that the pope would restore the suspended priest to his parish, and sit down hard upon Archbishop Corrigan. Their joy has since been subdued to find the blessing only an empty compliment. Cardinal Simeoni has followed the blessing with this explanation:

"Behold the true origin of the blessing bestowed by the pontiff to the graduate [Dr. McGlynn], and to the faithful parish: The pontiff on the occasion of the anniversary of his creation and coronation received innumerable telegrams. To them all an answer was given according to custom, but only as a matter of politeness and compliment."

This dashes the hopes of Dr. McGlynn's followers, and sets at rest the controversy which had arisen over the pope's message. That the explanation adds to the market value of papal blessings we do not think is shown.

Editorial Notes.

A MASSACHUSETTS paper says that in some churches there is more rejoicing over one wealthy pew-holder who pays one hundred dollars, than over ninety and nine young converts who pay a dollar each. The cause of rejoicing is the extra dollar.

THE Methodist Year Book claims that the Methodist church in the United States has 4,000,000 members, with 11,000,000 others who are believers in Methodism. This givs that sect more than one-fourth of the population of the country. The church owns $103,000,000 worth of property—untaxed, of course.

JAMES A. BLISS, the Boston medium, has been arrested by the United States authorities for improperly using the mails. It is charged that he advertised to answer all sorts of questions in sealed letters, without breaking the seal, for $2, but when the money was sent the questioners received no reply. Mr. Bliss asserts his innocence, and says that as his trust is in God, he knows he shall be able to prove it.

NEW YORK city possesses at present either the most liberal officials it has ever had, or the most astute politicians. If a bill, drafted by the excise commissioners at the suggestion of Mayor Hewitt, becomes a law, the German vote will assuredly go to the County Democracy, for the bill provides that in the discretion of the excise commissioners they may issue special licenses for the sale of beer, wine, and ale after 1 P.M. on Sundays. This is the bill the Germans long hav wanted.

SPEAKING of Anthony Comstock, who has recently arrested the principals in a hog-guessing match in a little country village in this state, the New York Sun says: "The man is making an intolerable nuisance of himself. The next we hear of him he will probably be nosing around to catch people matching quarters or engaging in a chicken raffle, to stop boys at marbles, or arrest the girls who sell tickets for a grab-bag at a church fair. There is such a thing as making the world so proper that existence would be unendurable."

THE New York Herald grows sarcastic. The Rev. Mr. Duncan, of Chicago, recently said of his church that "it seems to be a rendezvous for the oddest lot of dried up, sour old Christians you ever knew. I've been pitching into them lately. I well know they are alive, if I can arouse a little spunk in them. What they will do with me I don't know. Fire me, perhaps." Quoting his remarks, the Herald observes: "Yes, 'fire me,' expresses it quite well. But when his exit is announced, it will read, 'The Rev. Mr. Duncan has been called to a wider field of usefulness.'"

PROF. ST. GEORGE MIVART, who is a Roman Catholic, has an article in the Forum to explain that "confidence in the perdurability of the [Roman Catholic] church" is sustained by the fact that the church changes its mind about things as often as occasion arises. In his own words (lest it should be thought that any paraphrase might misrepresent him): "Little by little the invincible advance of historical, as of other, science permeates and transforms the whole Catholic body, and ultimately reacts upon the supreme head." The infallibility of this church seems to rest upon the fact that it never acknowledges a mistake.

IN the annual report of the inspector of the Milwaukee House of Correction are some figures which will please our religious friends. During the year there were confined in the prison 1,624 persons, mostly of the male sex. They were of all nationalities and trades, though about one-half were Americans. In religion the sects were represented as follows:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Catholic | 796 | Universalist | 1 |
| Lutheran | 455 | Jew | 7 |
| Methodist | 64 | Quaker | 1 |
| Episcopal | 52 | Disciple | 1 |
| Presbyterian | 60 | Greek | 1 |
| Baptist | 20 | Infidel | 1 |
| Congregationalist | 6 | No religion | 155 |
| Reformed church | 4 | | 1,62 |

We are afraid the Methodist Advocate will think there are not enough Methodists and Congregationalists in the list, but Dr. Buckley must recollect that the northwest is settled largely by north of Europe people who take naturally to either Lutheranism or Catholicism. The figures are from the report as given by the Milwaukee Sentinel.

BY authority of the General Council of the International Federation of Freethinkers, and under the auspices of the National Secular Society, the International Freethought Congress for 1887 is appointed to be held in London on September 10th, 11th, and 12th. Freethinkers of all nations are earnestly invited to send delegates. The meetings will be held in the Hall of Science, 142 Old street, E.C. The secretary of the general council is M. Napoleon Navez, Rue de la Provence (Nord), Antwerp, Belgium. The arrangements in England will be made under the direction of C. Bradlaugh, 20 Circus Road, St. John's Wood, London, N.W., to whom communications should be addressed.

Letters from Friends.

NEW ERA, MICH., Feb. 22, 287.

MR. EDITOR: I may say in passing THE TRUTH SEEKER is improving, and the beauty of it is that its editor givs and takes blows with such good humor; and, "O Lawd Gawd Almighty come down on dat Heston, and don't send yo' son to squelch him. No boy ken do dat job." Right glad am I to see the Science Column. THE TRUTH SEEKER is just hell, and I would not hav it if it was anything else.

J. M. LOGAN.

BAVARIA, KAN., Feb. 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Not to flatter, or to appear as in any way a vain prompter, I wish to express my sincere and overflowing admiration for S. P. Putnam's lecture denominated, "Universal Mental Liberty." It was from beginning to end a clear-cut and concise statement of truths, every one a telling fact to one who is not so near dead in the sublimely ridiculous as to not permit himself to look upon an open, demonstrated truth.

A. K. MOTT.

PORT CLINTON, O., March 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10, and the names of five new subscribers, who, I feel quite confident, will remain with you during life.

I hav had my last year's papers bound, and they make a very handsome book. I am passing it around among my friends, and I hope soon to be able to send you some more names. Wishing you much prosperity,

I remain, W. S. FLAUGHTER.

GREENWICH VILLAGE, MASS., Feb. 22, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $1. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER some time, and like it very much, pictures and all, and am sorry that some professing to be Liberals feel such a tender regard for the old superstitions of the church as to be grieved by the pictures. In my opinion they are doing a vast amount of good by showing the inconsistencies of the Christian theory to those who would not take the trouble to read.

CHANDLER M. POWERS.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., Feb. 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $5 for books.

I take nine papers. I would not part with the glorious old TRUTH SEEKER for all the papers in Christendom. I hav each volume handsomely bound, and contribute a portion of the same, with many other bound volumes of Freethought works, to the city free library, where I trust they will be read by many truth seekers. I rejoice over the pictures by Watson Heston. They are just the thing to open the eyes of the blind. Long liv Watson Heston. He is doing a good work. Go on with the pictures.

I must say a word in praise of the political outlook. A strike with the ballot is the only effectiv way for labor to gain its rights in this country. When the wage slaves learn to apply the ballot to their interest, then, and not till then, will their wrongs be righted.

R. BUTTERFIELD.

WAYNESBURG, PA., March 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $3. The orthodox here hav had a devil of a time with a young student by the name of Day. The young man does not believe the whale swallowed Jonah, and they do not want such young men in the school for fear they might prevent some other student from being a preacher. There are but five outspoken Liberals in Waynesburg. I was the first one to introduce THE TRUTH SEEKER in the town. My son, H. Clay Luse, went to college for three or four years, and he did not attend church as much as they would hav liked him to do. Finally he quit the school, they having threatened to expel him from college. He is now helping Mr. Watts to run a paper in Toronto, Canada. It is starting off very well. I hope it may be a success. The Secular thought papers are hard to run. That kind of doctrin is unpopular. Success to all Liberal papers.

SAMUEL LUSE.

OGDEN, UTAH, Feb. 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: It is with much sorrow I hav to inform you of the departure from earth-life of our late friend and fellow-worker, Robert Wilson.

He was an old acquaintance, and strongly attached to the cause of the Secular Union, and had made a lecturing tour in southern Utah with good effect. He worked hard in the cause of the rights of labor and of freedom from the power of priesthood of the Utah saints, and with all the efforts of a true friend of the masses subjected to that power, and against the powers of the church and Christianity in general.

He was a Knight of Labor, and had fulfilled several missions in this vicinity, and worked with indefatigable zeal for the rights and progress of that order, and was just appointed to take charge of a coöperativ institution of that body, when he took ill suddenly and died in two days after. The Knights of Labor took charge of his body, and his remains were respectably attended to on Sunday, the 20th inst., with all the honors and respect of that brotherhood, while his widow and family were waited upon and consoled in a more substantial way than by words of condolence.

He had grown to be a substantial and earnest worker in the cause of emancipation from religious and political bondage, and his loss will be severely felt by all his brother-laborers for the general good of humanity.

He passed away on the 15th inst., in the fifty-sixth year of his age. He was so earnest in his mission that he did not wish to leave his work in its present stage, and reluctantly yielded to the inevitable.

I had intended to be present at his funeral, and had prepared an address and some suitable selections for the occasion, but was unable to be there, in consequence of a severe cold I received the day before, which deprived me of the power to speak loud enough to be heard.

He was an intimate acquaintance, a friend and neighbor for over twenty years, and will be much missed and lamented by,

Yours truly, JOHN A. JOST.

KINGSTON, N. M., Feb. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2.50 for your valuable paper, which I think the grandest educator of the age. Mine is the only number of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER taken at this place. I hav tried to get the newsdealer here to keep them, but he was afraid he might lose some orthodox custom, should they see a copy of so Liberal a paper on his tables. There are very few outspoken Liberals in this community. We need a few lectures from Putnam, Reynolds, or Watts. Although not yet cursed with any church, we hav been overrun with sky-pilots, some four reverends being among us at one time. And how they tried to cut each other's throats! It was really amusing for an outsider to watch them. So far their presence here has amounted to naught, except to get one of them into quite serious trouble. He has left us to our sins, and the country would be well rid of all his kind.

I loan my paper, when I can, to parties who I think are thirsting for truth and knowledge; but I find it rather an up-hill business trying to convince people of the error of their ways who hav had superstition trotted into them while upon their mother's knee. You know yourself how hard it is to unlearn what we hav learned amiss.

J. C. BURGE.

LINCOLN, ILL., March 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: On Saturday, the 26th inst., I went over to Minier to hear J. E. Remsburg discourse on the themes that go with liberty. At Atlanta I fell in with James Tuttle, a sentinel on the front outposts for fifty years, who now rejoices that he sees the army coming at last. He has been a reader of your paper from the first number in Paris, Ill. On arriving we were happy to meet Dr. Nicolay, Jacob Schaff, Mr. Briggs, and a host of others, who had everything ready for a lecture. We found Mr. Remsburg, a trim, black-headed, gentlemanly man of thirty-nine—an earnest, persistent, patient, and engaging speaker, who has his subjects, points, and facts in wonderful readiness, and he had large and intelligent crowds. Hearty responses were given, when, with biting sarcasm, he held up the skeleton of the church with her "False Claims." "The Fathers of the Republic" were seen, as it were, when their portraits were presented. "The Apostle of Liberty" was listened to with close attention. "Bible Morals" opened wide their eyes on Monday night. The universal verdict was that the lectures paid every one who listened.

Yours, A. R. CRIHFIELD.

GREELEY, COL., March 2, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $9. The pictures in your paper are of great benefit to children, as well as a pleasure. My eldest son, who is eight years of age, is very much interested in them, and always asks questions until he understands the characters thoroughly. His teacher in the public school is a stanch Methodist, and takes particular pains to instruct the children accordingly; but I told the little boy to tell her that I did not desire him taught superstition, as he could learn better about the Bible at home.

A few days ago his teacher was catechizing the school, and asked, "Who were the first people that inhabited the Garden of Eden?" The little Infidel, being the first to raise his hand, immediately answered, "Adam and Eve." She asked him, "How do you know?" His answer was, "I read it in THE TRUTH SEEKER." She asked "Who tempted Eve to Eat of the fruit?" and he again answered, "The serpent." She looked at him in surprise, and asked from whence he gained his information. He replied, "We read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and it has pictures of all of those things in the Bible." She had nothing more to say. Let the good work go forward, for the children of to-day will be the men and women of the future.

EULAH C. STILLWELL.

MONTPELIER, IND., March 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a careful reader of your paper for several years, and noted the tyranny and persecution that reformers hav received, and the desire expressed by Brother C. B. Reynolds that Liberals should organize and combine to protect each other from such persecution. The brother is now experiencing the need of such aid. Less than one year ago I had our school-house locked almost in my face by a Sunday-school teacher at the adjournment of their school for fear I might say something that would not suit their orthodox views. For want of organization the Liberal element may be compared to dry, fallen leaves blown pell-mell by a whirlwind, orthodoxy disrespecting and calumniating their character and motivs without proper regard for truth, gagging them and cramming its dogmas into them at every opportunity. I hav for several years seen the necessity of more closely organizing the Liberal element irrespectiv of Materialism, Spiritualism, or any other ism except free, untrammeled search for fact or truth, and progression. The reformer has all manner of falsehood, fraud, and corruption to contend with; therefore I am in favor of a secret order with initiation fees and monthly dues—secret because we hav to deal with fraud and deceit; and fees and dues to insure a treasury on which we can depend, and know what our resources are.

I would recommend that our business meetings be secret, all other meetings public; that it be made a school to teach each other to liv in harmony with the law of our existence here, teaching the idea of a higher manhood and womanhood and the harmonious blending of nature's laws when demonstrated as science; these as the true morality.

A life insurance I think is not practicable, because the necessary dues to support the insurance would be so heavy that the average Liberal cannot pay them and meet other expenses. We need our means now to educate ourselvs to not need legacies for the future generations, but wide-awake, just, and honest self-reliance.

A proper appreciation of the true principle or genius of human liberty and equality is the best legacy our children can inherit. I hav no desire to run things were I capable, but would like to see attained a more thorough, helping, and activ organization of Liberals generally, and would like to hear from others interested in the subject. I cannot treat in detail in this brief article, but wish to call attention to the subject, feeling that it is one that more than almost any other should claim the attention of reformers.

WILLIAM ALLEN.

COLUMBUS, KAN., Feb. 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read with great pleasure J. E. Remsburg's lecture, "The Fathers of Our Republic," and would advise everyone to buy and read it. It proves most conclusivly that not only Paine, but Jefferson, Washington, and Franklin were Freethinkers, and Deists, or Atheists. It proves that they were world-wide humanitarians, and that they all, more or less, despised and rejected priestcraft and religious bigotry, and that their spirit and purpose was to keep church and state entirely separate, and, as Dr. Franklin said, "Let every tub stand on its own bottom." Dr. Franklin's expressions of his contempt for the inhuman absurdities of orthodoxy are very clear, comprehensiv, and striking.

Mr. Remsburg's logical deductions from and comments on the authentic and historical quotations from each of these great men, in his clear, comprehensiv style, are seldom surpassed.

I am impressed that if the truth was known about the opinions of several other lesser lights (fathers of our republic), it would prove that they, too, were more or less heretical, and that orthodoxy holds them under "false claims."

J. H. COOK.

NEW HARTFORD, IOWA, Feb. 21, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 19th M. Burgess and Milton Thornburgh object to the illustrations, and D. Louis Bodge objects to what he calls "that dreadful bobtailed spelling of hav, giv, and liv," and wants your readers to vote on it. I giv my vote to leave out all the silent letters possible, but think your taking a few words at a time is probably better than to make a wholesale slaughter of the nuisance at once. Fool spelling has got to go under. The time was when we could not plow without a plough; and the time will soon come, I hope, when a man will laf and not disturb the meeting, as he does now when he laughs. As to the illustrations, if Mr. Burgess and Mr. Thornburgh will take the pains to show their papers and watch the result, they will find one average illustration will drive more superstition out of a man in a minute than they could by talk in two hours. Mr. Heston's illustrations always speak for themselvs, leaving no chance for argument, and they are the grandest thing ever thought of for missionary work, as a wayfaring man, though (better tho) a fool, invariably tumbles to the racket. I never had a man ask to borrow my paper until since the illustrations appeared; now they borrow it and show it to their friends, and the result is more Infidels. Let me thank THE TRUTH SEEKER and Mr. Heston for the good the illustrations hav done, and are doing, and ask that never less than two a week be given us.

MEL PIERCE.

LEXINGTON, KY., March 16, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am weary of presenting facts to Christians; I would rather send them where they will, I trust, be further investigated. A late writer (Lilly) states that St. Augustine gloried in the fact that the date of the downfall of the Roman empire was that of the triumph of Christianity. I glory in the circumstance that the noble Romans, neither in tempest or sunshine, were known to stoop to put a man on the rack for the sake of his religious opinions. When Alaric entered Rome, he found one man worshiping Hercules and another Apollo, as his judgment dictated. St. Augustine attributed the reform of his own character to the perusal of the works of Cicero, Plato, and the Stoics, though, like other crack-brained persons, he finally went over to Plotinus (a weak philosopher), to the Neo-Platonists, and Christianity. The Stoics hav taught the world the stern principles of truth and morality; how to preserve the dignity of human nature from shipwreck; how to liv and die with a mild intrepidity which Christians know not how to imitate.

Emerson hints that when the blood is loth to leave the arteries—when the mind passes gently from feeling to form—then the noblest acts and demonstrations appear, but it cannot be denied that the true religion of nature, which furnishes the purest and sweetest conceptions, arises when no passionate flush of strength clouds the brain, whose holiest dreams spring from the pressure of poverty and sorrow. A gentle, useful life will then be substituted for fanaticism. We have found a pure region. There is no temptation there, no cloud of error or vice darkens that pure sky forevermore. Miss Gibson wishes to behold the arrest of an impostor. I would not dare to obstruct the course of free speech. The simpletons who listen to impostors might as well be locked up in a school where they could be taught the difference between error and truth.

The "Catholic curse" caused some excitement here, and some were kind enough to say that no such anathema was used by that church. But I turned to the twenty-eighth chapter of Deuteronomy, which settled the question. Means to a useful end and morality for all is creed sufficient for all men who hav bid a final farewell to the sphere of monkeydom. Take notice that Mr. Parkes, of this county, employs monkeys as hemp-breakers in preference to negroes. A great professor, standing high in the Kentucky University in the face of these facts, declares that monkeys hav no thirst for knowledge—that idiots hav that thirst for knowledge. I wonder if an idiot could break hemp to Mr. Parke's satisfaction. He has not the thirst which makes a good hemp-breaker. Respected savants, who write for THE TRUTH SEEKER, delay not one moment; leave everything! Hasten to this seat of learning, and sit at the feet of this illustrious sage, who has given printed publicity to this opinion. But such purposeless analysis would not suit Emerson. He would prefer a useful synthesis in the shape of a man or monkey, who could earn and faithfully work for a living.

FRUITLAND, MICH., Feb. 13, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send two dollars to apply on THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I am in my sixty-fourth year, and am trying to open up a new farm in a heavy timbered country. In August, 1885, I was struck by a log and had my knee dislocated, and hav not done a day's work since. In October last I was prosecuted by one of God's holy saints for $2,000. The circumstances are these: I was the owner of a harmless shepherd dog which the holy man's daughter took every opportunity of teasing and abusing on my own premises till he finally bit her; hence the prosecution. I am an outspoken Infidel; everyone knows it for miles around; but I hav heard of only two persons who take his part, and I must giv the Wesleyan Methodists, of which sect he is a member, the credit of being opposed to him in his unjust prosecution.

I like THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I was shocked to see that you should espouse the cause of the infernal Chicago cutthroats. They and their ilk are mostly escaped jail-birds of Europe, the very offscouring of the earth. They claim that the world owes them a living, but being too lazy and shiftless to earn it themselvs they seek to get it by murdering and robbing the honest, industrious, hard-working people of this country. It is with deep sorrow and shame that I saw you espouse their cause. I believe you hav thereby injured your paper hundreds of dollars, and set back Liberalism for a score of years at least. It can't be for the reason that you like to take the part of the poor and down-trodden, for the very same class hav been robbing, murdering, and maltreating the poor, honest, hard-working, docil, and long-suffering John Chinaman for years, and you hav never yet raised your voice or pen in his behalf, to my knowledge. If that is being a Freethinker, then I am not one. I am sorry THE TRUTH SEEKER has departed from its original design, which was, as I understood, to advocate the cause of Freethought in religious matters; but you seem to hav left that mainly to others, and hav gone to dabbling in politics and several other kinds of ics, for all which I am profoundly sorry. But I will quit scolding. You doubtless think you are right and I think I am. It is merely a difference of opinion between us. THE TRUTH SEEKER is yet the best paper published; there are many very good things printed in it, so I will take it a while longer. I hav not seen anything of the hair-snake controversy for a long time. I hav seen numbers of these snakes in the state of Pennsylvania. They were always called living horse hairs by everyone, and were believed to be such by all. They certainly looked like it. There was one circumstance in regard to them that seems to substantiate the theory, and that is that they were always seen in mud puddles in the road a few days after a shower of rain in the heat of summer, and at no other time or place.

Yours truly, JOHN SHUEY.

OAKLAND, Feb. 11, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In reading THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 5th, I find an article from the San Francisco Argonaut which makes mention of the savior's cross. It tells us the piece of rotten wood, or rather the sacred splinter, or portion of it, was obtained by the archbishop of St. Francis's church. I am truly glad to know that it has the miraculous power of reproducing; should multiplication fail, I should be entirely out of splinters, as I am the possessor of a piece of the true cross, as well as other sacred relics. I will simply mention a few of them. My husband and I attended a masquerade ball recently. He sustained the character of a priest, and consequently had a large number of sacred relics for sale for the benefit of the Catholic church. He had the backbone of a snake that St. Patrick drove out of Ireland; also the finger-nail of St. Veronica, and the pencil that Adam wrote the names of the animals with; also St. Peter's key, and the piece of money found in the fish's mouth by St. Peter; one hair from the beard of Mohammed; nails from the ark and first tabernacle; brick from the tower of Babel; whalebone from the whale that swallowed Jonah, and last but not least, a piece of the true cross, and prayer-book with the picture of the holy mother of God to protect him. The reporters took it in as a huge burlesque. The highest price on those relics was one thousand dollars, the lowest twenty-four dollars.

We are expecting a rich treat when Samuel Putnam comes to Oakland; we need a Liberal lecturer here so much, to sustain our cause for liberty and humanity. I am glad that Mr. Reynolds's case was postponed. I should think that the baboons of Morris county would be ashamed of their actions toward him. We attended the Paine celebration in San Francisco, which was a grand success—good music and the best of speakers engaged for the occasion.

The cartoons are fine; long liv Watson Heston. He must certainly hav a bright intellect, as well as a great deal of moral courage, to illustrate the teachings of the holy Bible, book divine, just in the way and manner he does. We put the pictures in our scrap-book, and I must confess it is one of the most Radical scrap-books I hav ever seen. I hav often shown it to my Christian friends, as I am a very outspoken Agnostic at all times. What little light I hav received I do not propose to hide under a bushel. I am convinced that if I believed in a personal God, and devil, and burning hell, I should hav more friends, but I prefer nothing but solid facts, and we hav that in our library. Books are good company.

I am much pleased with John Peck's writings. He might be termed a whole bushel, unless he turns Spiritualist, like Col. John Kelso. I, for one, cannot find facts strong enough to sustain a belief in Spiritualism, but Kelso seems to sustain it by the Bible. I hav read his "Deity Analyzed," but his latest production I hav not seen as yet. I wish you success in your battle for truth and liberty in this religiously superstitious land of ours. My husband talks of visiting New York next August. I don't suppose he will be long in finding the office of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER.

MRS. A. H. SCHOU.

BOUNTIFUL, UTAH, Feb. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3, which you will giv me credit for on my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Circumstances will not permit at present, or I would send more. I am doing all I can to help Freethought along. I hav a good hall, which at any time is open to a Freethought lecturer. I am in hopes that friend S. P. Putnam will giv us a call on his trip West. I think we can get a good houseful, but I am sorry to say that many of our Freethought people as a rule are very backward in helping the cause of Freethought. Here in Utah people hav been so badly deceived that it is a difficult thing to get them to assist in financial matters, and the only way to get these people to work with us is to prove to them that our cause is just, our intentions good, with the hope of breaking the bond of priestcraft, and willing at all times to help out anyone in the mud.

Now, in order to show the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER how the so-called Infidels in this country are looked upon as being beyond redemption, and held up to the world as of the lowest class—too low to be charitable or to do one kind act for their fellow-man—I will giv them an idea how some of our Christian people show their willingness to help their fellow-man when in the mud. I do not wish to hav it understood that I hav no faults, but we hav a motto, "Do unto others as we would they should do unto us," and I hope all Freethinkers will observe this. I was raised in the Mormon church, and not being willing to uphold the doctrins of Mormonism, I was excommunicated from priestly circles, and ever since hav been boycotted to the fullest extent. A pretended friend of mine came along one morning on his way to the city, with a large pair of horses. He stopped and asked me if I was not ready to let him baptize me, as it would make a better man of me. I told him if I could only believe that baptism would be the cause of my becoming a better man, I would willingly receive the baptism. At that he left me on his way, little thinking that I was soon coming behind him. We had not been far on the road, when we overtook a young man, with a load of hay, stuck in the mud. This good saint who was so anxious to baptize me, and a number of others, passed the young man by without offering assistance; but as soon as I came along—the Infidel, who was thought by all to be the last one to lend a helping hand—I pulled him out, although the young man was a member of the church. Not that I had a better team than the others, for it was not so good. One horse was a colt that had never pulled on a load, and how he would act I could not tell. It happened that a lady friend was riding with me, and made the remark, "Why did not some of the brethren with good teams lend a hand?" I told her that in my travels if there was anyone in the mud, I or some other Infidel was always ready to lend a helping hand. At any rate, I hitched my team on the front of the team with the load of hay, and getting three good pulls, the load came out. The young man thanked me, and I drove away. The next day this same saint, in company with a number of others, wished to know if he should baptize me for the remission of my sins and the reception of the Holy Ghost. I said, "No; not a man of your stamp, who would pass by his fellow-man in the time of need. Your baptism," said I, "would not do me any good, and as for the reception of the Holy Ghost, if that is the kindness you are filled with, I hav no use for it."

LAKE CITY, IA., Feb. 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to say a few words in connection with the very remarkable article appearing in your paper of the 19th inst. under the signature of the Rev. S. B. Hurlbut. His statements appear honestly made, in all candor. But, pardon me, dear readers, if I cannot accept his last statement as true. I'll state what I know about snake bites and cancers. I know what appeared to be simple medicins hav cured cancers when the blood was perfectly pure, and no reliance was placed in faith. I know simple remedies hav cured the worst of snake bites. I will giv a case in point. I once had a colt bitten by a copperhead snake, the worst case of poison ever known in that country. After it was swollen from foot to body, and a blubber formed at the breast larger than a peck measure, cracking in all shapes, with a greenish, bloody liquid oozing therefrom, a neighbor man called in to see the colt. It was then extremely bad. Said he, "Why do you not cure it?" "Because it is past all redemption." "Not so; it can be cured, and that easily." "Very well, you can hav the colt for one dollar." "I do not want your colt, but go, and go quick, and get plenty of the spirits of turpentine and saturate all swollen parts effectually uutil cured." I went without faith, simply to please a kind neighbor. I returned with the medicin, made two applications, and all poison disappeared in four hours, and never reappeared, as is common in such cases. Many persons were cured in the same way—simply saturated raw cotton and put to the wound, or, if on finger or toe, put the wound in a vessel of turpentine, and as sure as the Lord made "little potatoes" a cure will be effected, faith or no faith. I had no faith in regard to my colt, and I know the colt could not hav had. Had he been placed in fire his sufferings, to all appearance, could not be greater than they were while the turpentine was drawing out the poison. But people say if the application is made soon after the bite there is no great pain attending the cure. All the reverend gentleman has said is easy enough to believe until we come to the leg-setting business—that is a stunner. It puts me in mind of a good, noble, kind-hearted man I knew nearly fifty years ago. No man had more friends; kind in sickness and a good neighbor. But alack! and alas! he would look you square in the face with those pretty soft eyes of his for hours, and tell you all about having been bewitched, and what a vast amount of milling he had to perform as a horse, and the various ways he had undertaken to find out who was bewitching him; all to no avail. The first thing he would know after the bit would leave the mouth he would be standing in his yard in his night clothes. Now, this man was deceived, or trying to make people wonder—which? Now, if all be true we hav heard, there is no man living or dead could do more at healing the afflicted than one of our Iowa men. He claimed no supernatural power, nor asked for faith, but he was almost a walking galvanic battery. He used no medicin, but when sick enough he died like other men. Now, Rev. Mr. Hurlbut, are you very sure the old black lady's leg was broken square off? It may be true, as you state, when the laws of nature are reversed, but not until then. If you can do what you claim in the way of healing a broken limb, you can make your millions in Iowa. Yes, come at once! Stop not to preach, teach, or pray, but come right along; it is now toboggan time with us. I send you a dollar for Heston. The picture of his "Saint Triumphant" is worth at least five dollars. Were I rich I would surely help Heston. We are having a revival here now. I shall take some pains to show them one saint at least.

BELVIDERE, ILL., Feb. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I believe that the best place for preaching the gospel of Freethought is within the enemy's camp. It is very well to express our opinions in Liberal papers, but the trouble is, it is only Freethinkers who read them, and so the shots fired fall short of the game. I hav had at different times some of my Freethought views published in our county papers. I had to be very careful in my language, to avoid harsh expressions, to be as polite and gentlemanly as possible, for I hav learned that if I did not do so, they would not be printed, or if they were it would arouse the rage of church people to such a degree as to prevent my getting access to the papers again. The fact is, the church has got a first mortgage on nearly all our secular papers. In consequence of the views published, I hav had some replies, one from one of our most intelligent and influential citizens. He presented me with Professor Fisher's reply to Robert G. Ingersoll, and begged me to read it carefully, for its logic was unanswerable. I asked him if he had read Ingersoll's article, that called forth Fisher's reply. He said he did not remember; he did not know that Fisher's was a reply to any argument of Ingersoll's. Would you believe it, the church people hav printed Fisher's reply to Iugersoll without Ingersoll's name being mentioned, or any intimation in it that it is a reply to him. I asked my friend if he thought it honest to present the case in that shape—would it not be more honest to print both articles in the same book, and leave the reader to judge between them? Was it honest to keep dark about the other article? He replied that he did not think it proper for Christians to lend their aid in spreading Infidel literature. I accepted his book thankfully, and promised to read it carefully if he would promis to read Ingersoll's. "For, you see," says I, "there can be no danger, for Fisher has the last word, and, as you say, knocks Ingersoll all to smash." Well, he promised to read Ingersoll's, and I took Fisher's reply home, and did read it carefully, and must say that it is the best defense of Christianity of any work that I hav read. I do not know whether there is any published reply to it or not. If there is not, I think it would be worth while for some able thinker to reply to it. Christians hav several times called my attention to it, from which I conclude that it is widely circulated among them. My friend's wife had written marginal notes and interlined passages on nearly every page to call attention to its strongest points. To follow her example, and for fear that my friend would fear to read Ingersoll's argument—for there is where the greatest trouble is, Christians are afraid to read Freethought literature—I wrote the following on one of the blank pages of the book containing Ingersoll's and Black's arguments:

Men of sound intellect, and earnest, honest seekers for truth in these enlightened days, demand that both sides of a case should be patiently and honestly heard. When the question of God or no God, Christianity or Infidelity, or any other question of like nature comes before them, when they perceive a disposition in the advocates of one side to suppress the arguments of the opposit side, and insist that only their arguments should be listened to, it is evidence to them that those advocates are interested in the success of fraud, that their case is a dishonest one; for it is a fact indisputable that it is only fraud that dreads to hear the opposit side. Truth always courts, invites, and welcomes investigation.

Investigation is ever an enemy to fraud;
Investigation is ever a friend to truth.
Hear all sides and truth will prosper;
Hear only one and fraud will triumph.

When I handed him the book, I called his attention to the above. On reading it he acknowledged its truth, and—well, I think he is going to read the book. If he does, and has got any brains, he is lost to the church of which he is a prominent and influential member.

I inclose a copy of some verses that were published in the Belvidere Standard four weeks ago. In them you will perceive that I hav asked some very important questions of the clergy. Strange to say, I hav had no answer from any o them yet. I am afraid that it is because I neglected to offer a pecuniary compensation. If that is the reason, to remedy it, I am going to offer a reward of $500 for an answer to those questions. If that fails, I will then begin to think that they cannot answer them, or else they are so rich that they don't need any money.

Correspondence.

BAKER CITY, ORE., Feb. 14, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write my first letter to you. I am seven years old. I study reading, spelling, writing, geography, and arithmetic. I do not go to school; mamma teaches me at home. We liv in Pocahontas mining district, about eight miles from town. I like the Children's Corner in THE TRUTH SEEKER splendid. Sister Pearl joins in sending good wishes.

Your little friend, RENA ETHEL BAISLEY.

ELK GROVE, CAL., Feb. 19, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Encouraged in seeing my first letter in print, I will try to write a second. We hav a nice school, and some of the children are little Freethinkers, like me, but the most are hide-bound Methodists. Inclosed you will find $1, for which you will please send me your book, the "Story Hour." We get THE TRUTH SEEKER Thursday or Friday, and we all laugh at Mr. Heston's funny pictures. We all like them very much. I hav no brothers and sisters, but I hav a papa and mamma, both Freethinkers.

I will close with love for you and the children. SUTTON F. COTTRELL.

HAGERSTOWN, WAYNE CO., IND., Feb. 15, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I am a Freethinker, and a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will write a few lines. There are several Freethinkers here, but some are afraid to own it. I was in hopes we could hav a lecture here this winter, but failed to hav it. Samuel P. Putnam wanted to deliver a lecture or two. How I do wish we could hav had them, but those persons who had the means were afraid if they would do much toward a lecture it would be hard on their business, and those persons who hadn't the means would freely giv if they only could. We had three lectures here—the first two were delivered two years ago, by Charles Watts and Samuel Putnam; the third lecture was delivered over a year ago by John E. Remsburg. I never enjoyed myself any better than I did at those lectures. I wish we could hav a lecture here every week or so. There are four churches here. It seems so strange to think that people will believe such stories as there are in the Bible! I think that Freethought is one of the greatest beliefs in the world, yet how many hav been put to death on account of it—a business that would be carried on to-day if the churches had the power! I would so much rather talk than write, but as we cannot talk, I will just write, but I hope we may meet in the near future. I think I shall hav to close for this time, or I will take up too much of your time. I hope to hear from you soon. Yours sincerely,

ANNA M. PIPHER.

[We heartily reciprocate the wish that we shall some day meet and become acquainted. The children of the Corner are very dear, and we think much of them all.—ED. C. C.]

AUSTIN, NEV., Feb. 14, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I go to school. I am in the Second Reader. I study spelling, writing, and reading. And I liv away off in Nevada, in among the silver mines. Some of them are very deep. I am a little girl nine years old, and this is my first letter. It was my little brother who wrote last time, and I thought I would like to write, too. Please excuse bad spelling. I will do better next time. So good-bye from

Your loving friend, ALLIE MOSS.

JAMESPORT, MO., Feb. 21, 287.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a letter to the Children's Corner to try and form acquaintance with the truth seekers. I scarcely ever go to church. I don't believe in ancient tradition. It has too much cruelty and superstition. I had rather depend on the laws of nature. I am twelve years old. I went to school this winter. My teacher's name was Mr. Brookshier. I study reading, spelling, arithmetic, writing, and geography. My father is a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and has been for nine years. I am just finishing the "Story Hour." I think it is noble. We all like the Children's Corner, and THE TRUTH SEEKER also. For fear of wearing your patience, I will close. This is my first letter, and I hope it will not find the way to the waste-basket.

Your true friend, LENEA A. EADS.

HOLDEN, MO., Feb. 20, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I told you in my other letter that I am a happy little girl nine years old, but maybe you hav forgotten me. We are all Liberals (I mean our family). Pa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Freethinker's Magazine. I like to read all the little letters in the Children's Corner. I do want to tell Stella Anderson that what she wrote about the sisters treating her so badly in a Catholic school sounds very unreasonable to me. My brother (aged ten) and I hav been attending a Catholic school here for two and a half years, and they are so kind to me and to all that I love them dearly, and don't like to hear them misrepresented. They never ask any but Catholic students into their chapel or to study the catechism. I study orthography, reading, grammar, second part geography, and music. Effie Miller, my good little friend, and I played a duet at our last commencement, and we were much applauded; but I think that was because we are such small performers on the piano. But I must close my letter, with words of love and cheer for you and all your readers.

CORA LEA CARTER.

SALEM, ILL., Feb. 17, 287.

TO DEAR MOTHER WIXON: I take the liberty to call you so because I feel that I am one of the many hundreds of little chicks that hover beneath thy broad and encircling wings of liberty, truth, and science.

I'm highly delighted with the Science Column. If there is anything I do like, it is natural science. I like to read of the great ages which rocks teach.

My father dug a well last fall to the depth of forty-two feet of solid sandstone, with the exception of nine feet of earth. We found embedded into the deep, solid rock a small rock bearing the resemblance to a suspender having ridges running the entire length, and also inch lines running crosswise. My supposition is that it is an ancient rule. The piece blown out was about ten inches in length—we do not know the exact length. We also found several pieces bearing the resemblance of hickory nuts and walnuts.

I would like some of our older friends to giv me a little light in regard to this measure, if they hav any knowledge in regard to whether the ancients ever used any such measures, and about the length of time it has been deposited there.

We hav a society here that has been running for about ten years, callen the Tironian Literary Society. I repeated Colonel Ingersoll's "Lay Sermon." Some of the older members of the society say that it is the grandest piece ever spoken in the society. Next night I am going to read them an essay on the brain. I am also memorizing the "Decoration Day Oration," delivered in '82, as some of the members think there is no one capable of delivering an oration. Oh, how I would like to hav several of his orations to recite to the society! Would that I were able, I would hav his entire works.

Wonder when Mr. G. E. Macdonald is going to visit his old home in New Hampshire, or hear of another Ben Stackpole. The piece has been read at the society, and also many other pieces taken from THE TRUTH SEEKER, that "terrible Infidel paper."

As I hav the opportunity of spreading the light of liberty in the society, I intend to do what little I can in my weak and humble way. I think the scales are falling from their eyes.

With this I will close, fearing I hav taken too much of your valuable space.

Yours for truth and liberty for all,
RUFUS O. WILLIAMS.

P.S.—I would like to ask if there is any one that knows the words to the song, "James Bird?" If so, I would like them to be kind enough to send it to me. R.O.W.

Seven Ages.

Those who hav made the earth a study, looking carefully at its every phase and formation, at all the different layers that make up its crust from top to bottom, examining the curious fossils that lie in different portions of the same, hav marked out seven great ages or divisions of time belonging to the earth's most wonderful and interesting history.

We all want to know all about the world we liv in, and the division of its varied ages in their order renders the learning of them comparativly easy.

Each age has a title to distinguish it from the others.

Let us see now if you can call them in their order:

Azoic, Silurian, Devonian, Carboniferous, Reptilian, Mammalian, Age of Man.

That is just right. Now we will see how well you can tell the meaning of the seven ages.

The first, or Azoic—what does that mean? Azoic is a Greek word; a means "without," and zoë "life"—without life. It means that ever and ever so long ago there was a great, hissing, steaming, surging ocean sweeping over the new, infant earth, and not a speck of animal or vegetable life anywhere about. All was still except the stirring waters.

They, the waters, were working like yeast, you say. Yes, to raise the world. There were minerals and rocks then, and that was all, with here and there a bit or strip of land.

Following this came the Silurian Age.

The learners and explorers found so many fossil mollusks in that part of Wales inhabited by the Silures, a tribe of ancient Britons, that they named this time Silurian—the age of mollusks. And mollusks, you know, are little, soft, jelly-like creatures living inside of hard and bony shells. If we could hav looked over the earth then, we would hav seen various kinds of rocks, mud flats, barren sands, limestone, shale, and sandstone, and the water swarming and alive with lobster-like creatures, mussels, and other mollusks.

The third period is what? Devonian. Right. Where does this name come from? Devon, in England.

Yes. Insects came along then, and fishes—oh, lots and lots of them. And they had wonderfully beautiful scales, very hard and horny.

Different kinds of shells and lovely corals also abounded, and long strings of ribbon-like sea-weed trailed along the shores. Grass had commenced to grow then, too, rushes and straggling, shrubby-like trees, and some ferns and handsome mosses.

Well, then, what was the next great period? Carboniferous. Right again. And what does that long word mean? The Age of Coal. Yes. So much of it there was that this seems the most appropriate title that could be given it. And, oh! how wild and rich everything was growing then—spongy bogs, and reeds, swamps, and great tree-ferns! The earth was like an immense hot-house, without the flowers; the air moist and warm and teeming with carbonic acid.

In the waters were other kinds of fishes, and on the land new animals and reptils.

Leaves and mud and trees all sank together, hardening into the great coal-beds from which we derive so much light, warmth, and comfort.

Upon this age stands the Reptilian. Of course, you can readily tell why it is called thus. Because there appeared so many reptils, in the water and on the land, at that time—and they were monsters, with big, protruding eyes, wide mouths, and some of them had wings and could fly.

Next, when the earth seemed to be well prepared for their advent, came the Mammals. You know what "Mammal" means, for you hav had that word in another exercise.

The Mammalian Age discovers such great animals—I expect we would be frightened to meet such to-day.

The megatherium was a monster of a creature, with very long claws, and its head and neck were much like the head and neck of the sloth.

Were there any plants then?

Oh, yes; and they were somewhat similar to those of our present time. The earth was calm and cool, like one recovering from a fever, and then came

THE AGE OF MAN.

And is the earth finished? you inquire.

By no means. Work is still going on, the earth is still changing, and man is continually progressing, learning more and ascending ever to higher degrees of knowledge.

We can only in these exercises briefly touch upon very interesting and instructiv matters, which you are to continue as you grow older.

Shakspere tells of the Seven Ages of Man, and perhaps you can recite the words, which are as follows:

All the world's a stage
And all the men and women merely players:
They hav their exits and their entrances;
And one man in his time plays many parts,
His acts being the seven ages. At first the infant,
Mewling and puking in his nurse's arms;
Then the whining school-boy, with his satchel,
And his shining morning face, creeping like snail
Unwillingly to school: and then the lover,
Sighing like furnace, with a woful ballad
Made to his mistress's eyebrow: then a soldier,
Full of strange oaths, and bearded like the pard,
Jealous in honor, sudden and quick in quarrel,
Seeking the bubble reputation
Even in the cannon's mouth: and then the justice,
In fair round belly, with good capon lin'd;
With eyes severe, and beard of formal cut
Full of wise saws and modern instances;
And so he plays his part: The sixth age shifts
Into the lean and slipper'd pantaloon;
With spectacles on nose, and pouch on side,
His youthful hose, well saved, a world too wide
For his shrunk shank, and his big manly voice,
Turning again toward childish treble, pipes
And whistles in his sound. Last scene of all,
That ends this strange, eventful history,
Is second childishness, and mere oblivion,
Sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything.

S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—Into how many ages is the earth divided? Name them in their order. Define Azoic. What of the Silurian age? Could we hav looked over the earth at that time, what would we hav seen? Name the third period. Whence comes the name Devonian? What creatures were living at that time? Name the next great period. What is the meaning of carboniferous? What was the earth like then? Of what is the coal composed? Name the next age. Why called Reptilian? What of the Mammalian age? What great monster of an animal flourished at this time? When came the age of man? With the advent of man was the earth completed? Recite the "Seven Ages of Man."

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE BIBLE.
SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.
SPIRITUALISM A NECESSITY IN GOD'S GENERAL GOVERNMENT.
SPIRITUAL MEDIUMSHIP.
OBJECTIONS TO SPIRITUALISM ANSWERED.

Like all THE TRUTH SEEKER'S publications, the mechanical execution of the work is all that could be desired. Good paper, clear type—in short, a neat little volume.

The primary object of the work, as its title indicates, is to sustain Spiritualism, but the absurdities of the Christian religion, and the abominations of the old Jew book, get a terrible shaking up. The book contains much to interest every intelligent reader. . . . Colonel Kelso has done much acceptable work in the cause of Freethought and Liberalism all over the land. Send for his new book—read it—put it into the hands of every Christian; it will teach him that the way of the fool is foolishness. Every Liberal who reads it will certainly find his "Spiritual" strength renewed.—John Peck.

"Alexander the Good."

Died December 23, 286.

If thou art stanch without a stain,
Like the unchanging blue, man,
This was a kinsman o' thy ain—
For Mathew was a true man.
—Robert Burns.

Is not majesty majestic off, as well as on the throne?
Is the brightest star less bright because its brightness is unknown?
And the Macedonian tyrant, hailed the chief of ev'ry state
That his wickedness could ruin, in his carnage was he great?
In the greatness of thy goodness, Alexander, and the shame
His—not thine—hath it dishonored as thy honor graced a name?

Men are born, and men are living, men are dying, men are dead,
Rain, and mist, and dews descending, rivers running, oceans fed;
Light and darkness, sun and shadow, summer, winter, heat, and cold,
Bud and blossom, leaf and forest, sandy grains and mountains bold,
All are coming, all are going in the great harmonious strife,
And the everlasting dying is the everlasting life.
If the sunshine woo the ocean, and the ocean seek the sky,
If the sky with kindly coldness send it weeping, to supply
Earthly thirst and earthly verdure, it will find its way again
Down the rills that jump the hillside, through the lines that cut the plain,
To the parent sea, whose bosom, heaving with a mighty joy,
Welcomes back the truant changeling change were powerless to destroy.

In their ceaseless fermentation, dust and moisture, heat and light,
Raise the oak and send the eagle daring in his fearless flight,
And the friction of the passions, striving in the living clay,
And his restless aspirations in their agonizing play,
Rear the man above the meanness of the levels lower down,
Till the stars are known and counted, and their lustre gilds his crown,
Till the eagle's flight is measured, and the wind that sweeps the main
To the skyward peak computed in the "throbbing of his brain."

But the oak shall waste and crumble, and the wings of flight shall fail;
Worlds shall burn and worlds shall darken—ashes float in ev'ry gale—
Gain is loss and loss is increase—gold and drops again unite,
When the fires of dissolution reassert their flaming might;
Earth was robbed and man developed, patient, tender, wise, and brave,
Earth demanded restoration—in her bosom find his grave.

More than this the priest will tell you; more than this he does not know,
And his noblest thought of endless life is endless in its woe;
More than this the curtained seeress in her frenzy may imply,
But the soul distrusts the soothing that deigns to cheat the eye;
More than this the little children in their merry prattle say,
But the music of their laughter, sweet and holy, dies away;
More than this, my Alexander, could thy longing wish divine?
And thy honest faith was honest, but thy reasons are not mine.

Alexander, Alexander, hear me, hear me! I am lost
In the maze of bloom and beauty, in the wreck of blight and frost,
In the order and confusion, in the music and the noise,
In the worth that is not valued, in the overvalued toys.
Tell me truly, tell me plainly, was thy soul a living breath?
Is the true life everlasting more than everlasting death?
From the silence comes no answer—he is gone. We must confess
That our knowledge is a phantom of the things we cannot guess;
Childlike, we may say, "A unit is a single thing, or one,"
But the units of a unit are the atoms of a sun.
Upward, downward, eastward, westward, northward, southward, what are these
But the finite limitations of illimitable seas?
Pain and pleasure, grief and triumph, in the pict ure of a day
Are the light and shade as fleeting as a wintry blast in May,
While a universe, conspiring in its utmost stress of power,
Paled the rosy cheek of youth, and dyed the velvet of a flower.

What are words that say so little? What are words that say so much?
How they deluge all our thinking! How our thoughts elude their touch!
How they foil our dearest wisdom! How they wound us where we bleed!
How they mock us with compassion that our sorrows do not need,
When the highest revelation to the understanding heart
Is the speechless overflow of nature drowning all her art!

Alexander, youth's companion, brother, father, when the boy
Left the dreamland of his boyhood, he did not forsake the joy
Handed down by thee, and given as a token from the sphere
Where thy rapture caught the proverb, "Man deserves our kindness here."
And the Alexander in him means a weakness crowded out,
For a strength that was not nativ barricaded the redoubt
Of a knight that was not valiant, and he made a bolder stand,
When a double warmth went thrilling from the pressure of thy hand,
Reaching up to those above thee, reaching down to those beneath,
Ever finding joy, but never finding all thou wouldst bequeath.
Aged, poor, toilworn, and anxious, hopeful, faithful, proud, and free,
Reverence lifted up thine eye, but worship did not bend thy knee.
God was love, or God was nothing; love was all that was not vain;
Life a battle-field, and victory—being fit to liv again.

Alexander, had the parting left thee lingering here behind,
Thy farewell would be the prelude to a greeting. Thou wouldst find
All the past in all the future, and the hour I can not reach
With my blinded straining vision would be present in thy speech.
"We shall meet again," is dearer than, "We part to meet no more,"
For its fondest, truest meaning is that we hav met before.
And the hope without the promis, and the prayer without the trust,
Burst resistless from my heart, and are not smothered in thy dust.

FRANK FELT.

The Lay Sermon.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Comments on Colonel Ingersoll's "Lay Sermon," recently published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, being in order, I will offer a few thoughts that it suggested to my mind. The thought comes to me that "everybody is as he must be, simply because the conditions to which he is subjected enable and compel him to be as he is." If it is desirable that he should be otherwise than as he is, he should be subjected to conditions that will enable and compel him to be as he should be. That cannot be effected by Anarchism or Individualism.

The assertion that "to do right should always be dictated by the highest possible selfishness," is simply Bibleism. The colonel being a novice in that craft, I shall help him out a little. The Bible assumes that God made man for his own honor and glory, which is a purely selfish purpose. And he will put all things under him, and be all and in all, which is a purely selfish and supremely grasping ambition. Nevertheless, it should make man coequal with God, and joint ruler in the kingdom of God, which should be the highest honor that human ambition can aspire to. It is notorious that all enterprises of men are undertaken to serve the selfish ambition of their projectors and promoters. Nevertheless, all the good that the world has realized through the agency of man is the result of his selfish enterprises. Therefore selfishness is the source of all the good we hav ever realized, or can reasonably hope for in this world, or any other. Moreover, selfishness is indispensable to self-preservation. Without it we should not be well preservcd, nor well worth preserving, for if we take selfishness out of man, we shall take all the ambition out of him, and he will not be worth a cent. Better subject him to conditions that will enable and compel him to do by others in all things as he would hav others do by him. Then human selfishness will be a mutual blessing, instead of the mutual curse, to the human race, that the fundamental principle of our present civilization tends to make it.

If great wealth is the mother of crime, abject poverty should be the mother of virtue and innocence. If great wealth is the mother of crime, Dame Nature should be regarded as the mother of all abominations. Happily she is not a dog in the manger, but distributes her wealth with a bountiful hand, and invites all to partake freely, without money and without price. But human invention, that is called a Christian civilization, subjects us to poverty and want in the midst of wealth and plenty. "Graineries bursting, and famin looking into the doors of the poor! Millions of everything, and yet millions wanting everything and having substantially nothing." The colonel thinks "there is something wrong there." So do I, and regret that he has not suggested a remedy that has in it the promis of efficiency. Nature provides but one remedy; if we reject it, we shall not find another by guessing.

In the most primitiv state of human existence on this planet the individual should necessarily hav been a law unto himself, and might was the only recognized law of right. That was Anarchy, and it made Collectivism a necessity for the mutual preservation of the weak against the strong; Collectivism made government a necessity, and government is tyranny. Therefore, when the Colonel asserts that "Anarchy is a reaction from tyranny," he makes the slight mistake of putting the cart before the horse.

He "would not take an inch of land from any human being that belongs to him." Does an inch of land belong to any human being except by the law of might? The law of our being givs no right but of possession to the ground we stand upon. Nevertheless, the colonel insists that "if we ever take the land, we must pay for it, and not rob anybody." Those cannot pay for land who hav nothing to pay with; and it is as much robbery to compel others to buy land for them as to take the land, without compensation, from those who claim to own it. Therefore, I shall suspect the colonel of pleading a "crooked" cause, and making crooked work of it.

The assumed state right of eminent domain is evidently based on the assumption that might makes right. The state, being supreme, assumes the right to take, either with or without compensation, as the state shall elect, whatever is assumed to be required for the common good. The state Socialists base their demands upon that assumed state right, and the colonel virtually admits that their position is well taken. So does Blackstone. So do all jurists of note or intelligence. Nevertheless, I shall neither suspect nor accuse them of being Socialists, but shall award them the merit of having the moral courage and self-respect to admit a self-evident fact.

The colonel evidently has no more confidence in "free soil" as a panacea for social ills than I hav, for he again inquires, "What remedy, then, is there?" and refers us to the ballot. The law should settle these questions between capital and labor—many of them; but he expects the greatest good to come from civilization, from the growth of a sense of justice. What civilization or sense of justice can he reasonably expect so long as private wealth is the power behind the throne; greater than the throne in monarchical countries, and the power upon the throne, and omnipotent everywhere, in democratic countries?

A few workingmen recently assembled for the purpose of publicly discussing questions of interest and importance to themselvs, were brutally assaulted by a gang of ruffians armed with clubs and revolvers. A bomb was thrown by an unknown person who was permitted to escape. Seven men were sentenced to be hanged for expressing their views on the subjects of the colonel's essay; and like outrages are as liable to be committed everywhere else in this country as in Chicago, unless the spirit of them is crushed in the bud by an outspoken and plainspoken protest against such ruffianism in the name of law and order, and notwithstanding their attempt to intimidate press and people. Nevertheless, the colonel exultingly assures us that we hav a free press, free speech, and the protection of person. I think he should "take the cake" for cold irony and grim satire!

He exhorts us to become home-owners. That will require years of the most stringent self-denial, which he denounces as unjust. Then the conditions to which we are subjected are unjust, and he has suggested no remedy, as I can see, that has in it the promis of efficiency. Probably it will not be prudent for him to. Nevertheless, he has promised to do what little he can to hasten the day when this earth shall be covered with homes, and when "by the fireside of the world shall sit happy fathers, and mothers, and children." I think he will do but little indeed to facilitate that happy event, unless he improves his method of doing; but I will offer the foregoing in evdence that his effort will be likely to do some good, though of a somewhat negativ kind, where the seed falls upon well-prepared ground. Therefore, I shall cheerfully recommend a careful perusal of his essay by all who need enlightenment on the subject, and they are legions.

J. A. TUTTLE.

"The New God."

Putnam's last epic, "The New God," is a marvel of strong argument, vivid illustration, pungent thought, and brilliance of expression. The author's ideas are strikingly original, and his fresh, novel, and epigrammatic treatment of his subject adds a charm which is as indescribable as it is ineffaceable. Its whole tenor is bold, trenchant, iconoclastic, and Atheistic, and the only infelicity I find is in its title, which should rather hav read, "No God," instead of "New God," as the writer admits that "to think God is to annihilate him; to attempt to prove his existence is to reveal his nonentity." Still, there is so little to criticise and so much to praise that Putnam is almost to be envied for the possession of rare genius to so epitomize divinity. The lecture is a Secularist's apotheosis of humanity; it is both episode and apolog; it is also a grand oratorio of aphorisms.

Obituary.

DIED.—At De Fumiak Springs, Fla., Feb. 24th, of inflammation of stomach and bowels, Mrs. Lydia L. Curtis, wife of E. F. Curtis, of Farmington, Ohio, and mother of Mrs. E. I. Lord and H. A. Curtis. Her remains reached home Tuesday. Funeral services were held at her residence, conducted by D. M. King, of Mantua, Ohio.

Mrs. Curtis had been in poor health for some time, and it was thought a trip to Florida might prove beneficial, but such was not the result.

She had been a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for many years, and when leaving home thought she could not get along without it, and had it forwarded to her at Florida. She was also a great admirer of Ingersoll, and was never happier than when reading articles from his pen. C. L. C.

DIED.—On Saturday, Feb. 26, 1887, at 1:30 A.M., Frankie Annette, daughter of J. A. and Elizabeth Cutshall, in the ninth year of her age. Funeral from her parents' residence, No. 30 Strawberry Lane, Allegheny City, Pa., Monday, Feb. 28th, at 10 A.M. The exercises will be conducted by the Pittsburgh Secular Union.

The above is a copy of the notice published in the daily papers of this city. At the appointed time, Harry Hoover and Thomas Grundy, of the Pittsburgh Secular Society, Prof. Wm. Seymour, of Philadelphia, and other Liberals met at the house of mourning. The ceremonies were opened by Mr. Hoover reading a poem entitled, "Man's Mortality." Professor Seymour, assisted by several ladies, followed by singing a beautiful selection from Ayres's "Book of Forms." Mr. Grundy delivered a touching address, stating the Secular views of life and death, and extending sympathy to the bereaved family. After the singing of another selection, Mr. Hoover spoke of the superiority of Secularism over orthodoxy in the hour of trial, and cremation over interment in the article of death. He closed by saying:

Our consolation of Secularism is that it robs death of half its terrors, and frees the mind from the harrowing fear of an endless hell. 'Tis said that not a pebble can be dropped in the ocean, or the air stirred by a butterfly's wing, but what the impulse given is felt around the world. So with dear little Frankie. The sun of her brief life had hardly risen until it set in death; but this brief time has sufficed for her to touch the tender chords of feeling, and set in motion sweet influences that shall echo down the ages and tincture many a life yet to be. Her life was a blessing to her parents, and her memory, like a sweet incense or the voice of a singing bird, will dwell forever in their hearts. I am glad indeed that our bereaved friends hav the good sense and moral courage to depart from the common custom of consigning the remains of friends to the charnel vault or festering grave, and hav adopted the method approved by science, reason, enlightened sentiment, and good taste. How consoling to know that the loathsome worm will never touch her tender cheek, but that her dear remains, purified by fire, inclosed in a beautiful casket, can be added to the household treasures, her sacred dust ever near!

The cremation took place at Samson's crematory, 6th ave., Pittsburgh, and was witnessed only by the family and immediate friends.

R. STALEY,
Pres. Pittsburgh Sec. Society.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

E. H. ABBOTT, of Buffalo, N. Y., supreme secretary of the Royal Templars of Temperance, is defaulter to the extent of $5,000.

THE religious ceremony of a marriage was performed between Christine Nilsson, the great singer, and Count Miranda, at Paris last Saturday. The two hav been married for some time.

THE Rev. Charles W. Ward, who shot his wife and himself in the Episcopal rectory in Englewood, N. J., three weeks ago, is said to be nearly out of danger. Mrs. Ward also is recovering.

MRS. NEEBE, wife of Oscar Neebe, one of the condemned Chicago Anarchists, died and was buried last week. George Schilling conducted the funeral services. Neebe was not permitted to attend.

THE bridge over a street in the suburbs near Boston gave way as a train on the Boston and Providence Road was passing over it, and six cars, containing over two hundred people, fell fifty feet to the ground below. Nearly forty persons were killed, and as many more received serious injuries.

THERE was a most disastrous accident on the Third avenue elevated railroad in this city last week. The road was blocked by a fire on the Bowery. A number of the bolder among the passengers left the trains and started to walk to the nearest station along the narrow plank walk that fringes the track. The line of trains began to move, and one of the walkers climbed to the rear platform of a car and clung there, and as the train moved on his projecting body swept the walkers from the narrow path to the street below. Three men were killed and seven serlously injured.

Gems of Thought.

IT may safely be decided that all religions are of human origin, and that all past and existing systems are more or less modifications of the primitiv system.—D. M. Bennett.

FOR our purposes the simple fact that a naked world is possible, nay, actually exists (under the clothed one), will be sufficient. Much, therefore, we omit about "kings wrestling naked on the green with carmen," and the kings being thrown, "dissect them with scalpels," says Teufelsdrockh, "the same viscera, tissues, livers, lights, and other life-tackle, are there; examin their spiritual mechanism, the same great need, great greed, and little faculty; nay, ten to one but the carman, who understands draught-cattle, the running of wheels, something of the laws of unstable and stable equilibrium, with other branches of wagon science, and has actually put forth his hand and perated on nature, is the ore cunningly gifted of the two. Whence, then, their so unspeakable difference?" From clothes.—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

HATH not a Jew eyes? Hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? Fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same summer and winter as a Christian is? If you prick us do we not bleed? If you tickle us do we not laugh? And if you wrong us shall we not revenge?—Merchant of Venice (Act 3, Scene 1).

WE are sure that God made our reason and our hearts. We cannot be so sure that he is the author of the Bible. So that, if we find insoluble discord between the two, there can be little question which must and ought to yield.—T. Starr King's Eternal Punishment.

IO VICTIS.

I sing the hymn of the conquered, who fell in the battle of life;
The hymn of the wounded, the beaten, who died overwhelmed in the strife;
Not the jubilant song of the victors, for whom the resounding acclaim
Of nations was lifted in chorus, whose brows wore the chaplets of fame;
But the hymn of the low and the humble, the weary, the broken in heart,
Who strove and who failed, acting bravely a silent and desperate part;
Whose youth bore no flowers in its branches, whose hopes burnt in ashes away,
From whose hand slipped the prize they had grasped at, who stood at the dying of day
With the work of their life all around them, unpitied, unheeded, alone;
With death swooping down on their failure, and all but their faith overthrown.
While the voice of the world shouts its chorus, its pæan for those who hav won;
While the trumpet is sounding triumphant, and high to the breeze and the sun
Gay banners are waving, hands clapping, and hurrying feet
Thronging after the laurel-crowned victor, I stand on the field of defeat.
In the shadow 'mongst those who hav fallen, and wounded, and dying, and there
Chant a requiem low, place my hand on their pain-knotted brows, breathe a prayer,
Hold the hand that is hapless and whisper, "They only the victory win
Who hav fought the good fight and hav vanquished the demon that tempts us within;
Who hav held to their faith unseduced by the prize that the world holds on high;
Who hav dared for a high cause to suffer, resist, fight—if need be to die."
Speak, history! Who are life's victors? Unroll thy long annals and say—
Are they those whom the world called the victors, who won the success of the day?
The martyrs, or Nero? The Spartans who fell at Thermopylæ's tryst,
Or the Persians or Xerxes? His judges or Socrates? Pilate or Christ? —W. W. Story.

WHOEVER, through moderation and constancy, is at rest in his mind, and in calm possession of himself, so as neither to pine with care, nor to be dejected by fear, nor to be inflamed with desire, coveting something greedily, nor relaxed with extravagant mirth—such a man is that identical wise man whom we are inquiring for, he is the happy man to whom nothing in this life seems intolerable enough to depress him, nor exquisit enough to transport him unduly.—Cicero's Tusculan Disputations.

A BONNY sight is always a bonny sight when the cost of it does not come out of one's own pocket.—Mrs. E. Lynn Linton.

LET us hav courage. Priests hav invented a crime called blasphemy, and behind that crime hypocrisy has crouched for thousands of years. There is but one blasphemy, and that is injustice; there is but one worship, and that is justice.—R. G. Ingersoll.

Odds and Ends.

A JERSEY CITY father became awfully jealous because a reporter added to a baby-arrival item, "Thanks to Dr. Blank."

SMITH: "Who is that gentleman you were talking with just now?" Brown: "He claims to be a titled Englishman of distinguished family, but I doubt it." Smith: "Why?" Brown: "Because he didn't ask me to lend him any money."

THE squaw of a chief of the Sioux
Eloped with a red-headed Jioux;
The pair in Dubuque
The husband o'ertuque,
And he made a nice how-dioux-yioux-dioux.

A FORMER minister of Stewarton, in Ayrshire, used to preach the same sermon (on "The Ten Virgins") year after year in a neighboring parish on the Monday after the communion. At length an old clerical friend gave him a pretty strong hint to choose a fresh subject by expressing his belief that "his ten virgins must now be pretty auld maids!"

FIRST Charleston lady: "Ise gwine ter chutch to tank de Laud dey ain't no mo' erfquakes. Ain't yo' gwine too, my sister?" Second lady: "No, no, my sister, I no gwine! Will you attend de brick chutch?" First lady: "De brick chutch fo' tru', but don' yo' trus' de Laud?" Second lady: "I trus' de Laud, aw my sister, I trus' um, but I neber fool wid um."

OMAHA man: "Seems to me you folks badly need civilizing." California man: "Eh! How so?" "I saw in the paper the other day that a stranger in Oakland visited every bookstore in hopes of buying a Bible, and could not find one in the place." "Oh, that's on account of the climate." "Climate?" "Yes, folks are so healthy there they never think of Bibles."

EPITAPH ON AN AUTHOR.

The heroes he drew
Were true to the life,
His narratives through
With morals were rife,
His life and work blended
So well, it is not
Strange his tale ended,
He rests in a plot.

A CHICAGO drummer says that when he was in Iowa recently he wanted a tobacco box, and in a cigar store bought a tin one and put it in his pocket without opening it. When he did open it he found that it contained a whisky cocktail. "You can find whisky in almost anything you buy over there," he is said to hav said. "It's always turning up in unexpected places. Iowa is a Prohibition state."

ONE of the many tales of the late Sergeant Ballantine now rife points a moral for the consideration of Lord Selborne, and the advocates of the expurgation of law reports. Mr. Ballantine was examining the petitioner for divorce, and asked, "When you entered the room what did you see?" "I had rather not say," replied the witness, "in the presence of ladies." "Ladies!" ejaculated the sergeant, looking around at a fashionably dressed crowd with ears intent and eyeglass ready, "do not you know that they come here for the very purpose of hearing what you had rather not say? Pray do not disappoint them."

MINISTER (to boy who is digging for worms): "Little boy, don't you know that it is wrong to work on Sunday, except in case of necessity?" Boy (going on with his digging): "This is a case of necessity. A feller can't go fishin' 'thout bait."

A SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher asked her scholars each to learn a verse, to recite at the next anniversary meeting, appropriate for the occasion. They all came prepared the next Sunday, and all went off well till it came to the last, a very little boy, in whose ear the teacher whispered as he came up: "Now, speak out loudly, Johnnie." Johnnie, reluctantly dropping his money in the box, shouted out, "The fool and his money are soon parted!"

THE Hotel Register recently said: "A hotel in Pittsburg is managed by a Mr. Barrell. Prohibitionists will hardly stop at that house." Whereupon the Havre de Grace Republican suggests that "he would be a good man to stave off creditors." Or a good man for a confidential adviser, provided the Barrell doesn't leak. A Western editor suggested that the hotel now had a "bung up good man," but that editor is dead now. His life might hav been spared if he had said the Barrell was "hooped up" for business, or something of that kind, but he didn't, and a brick fell fatally on him.

A DISTINGUISHED literary man of Oakland stood up in the police court to answer to the usual charge of vagrancy. "I object, your honor," he said, with dignity, "to this persecution of gentlemen who follow the profession of letters, and——" "I understand," interrupted the judge, "you were found sleeping under a doorstep; that you hav no visible means of support, and that you hav been seen under the influence of liquor." "What of it?" cried the prisoner, "though I am as poor as Richard Savage when he made his bed in the ashes of a glass factory; as drunken as Dick Steele, who was full nine-tenths of his time; as ragged as Goldsmith when he was on his fiddling tour; as immoral as Byron, as dirty as Sam Johnson, as——" "There, there," cried his honor impatiently, "I've no doubt your associates are a disreputable lot, and I shall deal with you in such a manner as to cause them to giv Oakland a wide birth. Sixty days with hard labor. Mr. Clerk, furnish the constable with the names of the vagabonds mentioned by the prisoner."

THE KIND OF SUNDAY REST THE CHURCH OFFERS THE WORKINGMAN.

Notes and Clippings.

CARDINAL GIBBONS has got his red hat. So has the hand-organ man's monkey.

THERE are in the postal department at Washington two employees appointed by Andrew Jackson in 1831. Their names are Inze Lawrenson and James H. Marr, aged respectivly 84 and 81.

SOME Catholics in Detroit, Mich., raised a riot last Sunday over the deposing of their priest by the bishop. A half-dozen policemen were battered and bruised, but none was fatally injured.

BEECHER'S successor has not yet been found. To attempt to fill his place with any of the general run of pulpit-whackers would be, as some one has expressed it, like trying to wad a cannon with a doughnut.

GLADSTONE said in a recent speech that should Ireland extend her request for home rule beyond self-government in affairs exclusivly Irish, subject to unquestionable supremacy of the imperial Parliament, he could no longer promote her cause.

THE Springfield Union is informed from trustworthy sources that a syndicate has been formed in New York to buy up Europe, Asia, Africa, East Boston, and New Jersey, and annex them to New York city, under the title of the Consolidated Earth.

MAYOR HEWITT has appointed as president of the board of health a Mr. Bayles, who is not only a Knight of Labor, but has been quite activ in the order in northern New Jersey. He is author of a published plan for adjustment of the labor question, and was talked of in Orange and Newark as a workingmen's candidate for congress.

THE Rev. Joseph Cook says it would hav been better for Beecher if he had died twenty years ago. The New York Herald adds that it would hav been ten dollars in the Rev. Mr. Cook's pocket if he had never been born. It is safe to bark at a dead lion.

MR. FREDERICK HARRISON has been traveling in France on foot and stick in hand, with an occasional lift by the road in diligences and carts. He givs it as his opinion that no man or woman that he saw in the least desired war, or even thought about it.

CHARLES F. FREEMAN, the religious fanatic of Pocasset, Mass., who in May, 1879, slew his daughter as an offering to God, has been pardoned by the governor and council. But who can pardon the promoters of the religion which is responsible for his insane act?

A DISPATCH from Rome says: "Cardinal Taschereau, of Montreal, has succeeded in taking the matter of the Knights of Labor before the holy office. It is probable that the decision will ratify the condemnation of the order in Canada, and forbid any extension in the United States."

SOME time ago the Rev. Samuel D. Hinman was a missionary among the Indians of Dakota. Bishop Wm. H. Hare investigated him and his mission, and made charges of shocking conduct against Hinman. The latter sued the bishop for slander, and got a verdict in his favor. The bishop appealed the case, and the decision was reversed. Now the Rev. Mr. Hinman has moved for a retrial of the case, and by the time the matter is finally settled it is believed that both the priest and his bishop will hav been proved to be rascals.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, in a recent letter on savages, says that "the early Britons readily lent money on the promis of repayment in the next world." Sir John is right. As noted by Colonel Ingersoll, the church has always been willing to swap off treasures in heaven for cash down. It's a good deal like finding money.

ALFRED STINIT, of Corvallis, Or., cannot trust himself in the presence of liquor, and has published this card in the local papers: "I hereby notify all persons within this state that they must not giv or sell me any intoxicating drink under any consideration. If they do, I shall prosecute them to the full extent of the law."

IT is said to be the opinion of those qualified to judge that the Supreme Court of Illinois will confirm the decision of the court below in the case of the condemned Anarchists. If this decision is reached, the sentence can not be affirmed and the day of hanging fixed before the first Tuesday in September. A hearing of the arguments for a new trial began at Ottawa, Ill., on the 17th.

APPLICATION has been made to the treasury department in Washington for the free entry at San Francisco of a joss for a joss-house in that city. Free entry is claimed on the ground that the joss comes under the classification of images and regalia for religious associations. The joss is 150 feet long, and is composed of wood, paper, tinsel, and metal. The officials are in a quandary, as the tariff on gods is a new and unsettled question.

THERE are many institutions in this city of a real or quasi charitable or educational character, and some which do not partake of that character at all, whose property is exempt from assessment, but so far as these take care of real objects of public charity they are paid for doing so out of the public funds to the full extent of the cost of the service. Through the exemption of church property the people do hav to pay toward the support of all churches, without reference to their own belief in the teachings of any of them, or their sympathy with the particular work in which they are engaged. When a costly church is built by a rich congregation for the direct benefit or gratification of its own members, and for the promotion of a faith or a work in which they are specially interested, there is a forced contribution from the community, from which no one can escape, for the purposes of that particular organization, through this exemption from all share in public taxation. There is no limit to the amount of wealth that may be thus devoted to propagating the faith and promoting the objects of a religious organization without any tax upon the property which it holds. There is no reason why large plots of valuable land, buildings for uses that are mainly social, or which are made remunerativ, and costly and highly ornamented edifices for the gratification of the tastes and sentiments of those who use them, should be wholly free from taxes, while the humblest home of the poorest worker has on that account to pay an increased share to the public revenues. It is a matter which should be more closely looked into than anyone has heretofore ventured to look into it.—New York Times.

Some Interrogation Points.

From the North American Review.

A new party is struggling for recognition—a party with leaders who are not politicians, with followers who are not seekers after place. Some of those who suffer and some of those who sympathize hav combined. Those who feel that they are oppressed are organized for the purpose of redressing their wrongs. The workers for wages, and the seekers for work, hav uttered a protest. This party is an instrumentality for the accomplishment of certain things that are very near and very dear to the hearts of many millions.

The object to be attained is a fairer division of profits between employers and employed. There is a feeling that in some way the workers should not want—that the industrious should not be the indigent. There is a hope that men and women and children are not forever to be the victims of ignorance and want—that the tenement house is not always to be the home of the poor, nor the gutter the nursery of their babes.

As yet, the methods for the accomplishment of these aims hav not been agreed upon. Many theories hav been advanced, and none has been adopted. The question is so vast, so complex, touching human interests in so many ways, that no one has yet been great enough to furnish a solution, or, if anyone has furnished a solution, no one else has been wise enough to understand it.

The hope of the future is that this question will finally be understood. It must not be discussed in anger. If a broad and comprehensiv view is to be taken, there is no place for hatred or for prejudice. Capital is not to blame. Labor is not to blame. Both hav been caught in the net of circumstances. The rich are as generous as the poor would be if they should change places. Men acquire through the noblest and the tenderest instincts. They work and save not only for themselvs, but for their wives and for their children. There is but little confidence in the charity of the world. The prudent man in his youth makes preparation for his age. The loving father, having struggled himself, hopes to save his children from drudgery and toil.

In every country there are classes—that is to say, the spirit of caste, and this spirit will exist until the world is truly civilized. Persons in most communities are judged not as individuals, but as members of a class. Nothing is more natural, and nothing more heartless. These lines that divide hearts on account of clothes or titles are growing more and more indistinct, and the philanthropists, the lovers of the human race, believe that the time is coming when they will be obliterated. We may do away with kings and peasants, and yet there may still be the rich and the poor, the intelligent and foolish, the beautiful and deformed, the industrious and idle, and it may be, the honest and vicious. These classifications are in the nature of things. They are produced for the most part by forces that are now beyond the control of man—but the old rule, that men are disreputable in the proportion that they are useful, will certainly be reversed. The idle lord was always held to be the superior of the industrious peasant, the devourer better than the producer, and the waster superior to the worker.

While in this country we hav no titles of nobility, we hav the rich and the poor—no princes, no peasants, but millionaires and mendicants. The individuals composing these classes are continually changing. The rich of to-day may be the poor of to-morrow, and the children of the poor may take their places. In this country the children of the poor are educated substantially in the same schools with those of the rich. All read the same papers, many of the same books, and all for many years hear the same questions discussed. They are continually being educated, not only at schools, but by the press, by political campaigns, by perpetual discussions on public questions, and the result is that those who are rich in gold are often poor in thought, and many who hav not whereon to lay their heads hav within those heads a part of the intellectual wealth of the world.

Years ago the men of wealth were forced to contribute toward the education of the children of the poor. The support of schools by general taxation was defended on the ground that it was a means of providing for the public welfare, of perpetuating the institutions of a free country by making better men and women. This policy has been pursued until at last the school-house is larger than the church, and the common people through education hav become uncommon. They now know how little is really known by what are called the upper classes—how little after all is understood by kings, presidents, legislators, and men of culture. They are capable not only of understanding a few questions, but they hav acquired the art of discussing those that no one understands. With the facility of politicians they can hide behind phrases, make barricades of statistics, and chevaux-de-frise of inferences and assertions. They understand the sophistries of those who hav governed.

In some respects these common people are the superiors of the so-called aristocracy. While the educated hav been turning their attention to the classics, to the dead languages, and the dead ideas and mistakes that they contain—while they hav been giving their attention to ceramics, artistic decorations, and compulsory prayers, the common people hav been compelled to learn the practical things—to become acquainted with facts—by doing the work of the world. The professor of a college is no longer a match for a master mechanic. The master mechanic not only understands principles, but their application. He knows things as they are. He has come in contact with the actual, with realities. He knows something of the adaptation of means to ends, and this is the highest and most valuable form of education. The men who make locomotivs, who construct the vast engins that propel ships, necessarily know more than those who hav spent their lives in conjugating Greek verbs, looking for Hebrew roots, and discussing the origin and destiny of the universe.

Intelligence increases wants. By education the necessities of the people become increased. The old wages will not supply the new wants. Man longs for a harmony between the thought within and the things without. When the soul livs in a palace, the body is not satisfied with rags and patches. The glaring inequalities among men, the differences in condition, the suffering and the poverty, hav appealed to the good and great of every age, and there has been in the brain of the philanthropist a dream—a hope, a prophecy, of a better day.

It was believed that tyranny was the foundation and cause of the differences between men—that the rich were all robbers and the poor all victims, and that if a society or government could be founded on equal rights and privileges, the inequalities would disappear, that all would hav food and clothes and reasonable work and reasonable leisure, and that content would be found by every hearth.

There was a reliance on nature—an idea that men had interfered with the harmonious action of great principles which if left to themselvs would work out universal well-being for the human race. Others imagined that the inequalities between men were necessary—that they were part of a divine plan, and that all would be adjusted in some other world—that the poor here would be the rich there, and the rich here might be in torture there. Heaven became the reward of the poor, of the slave, and hell their revenge.

When our government was established, it was declared that all men are endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights, among which were life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. It was then believed that if all men had an equal opportunity, if they were allowed to make and execute their own laws, to levy their own taxes, the frightful inequalities seen in the despotisms and monarchies of the Old World would entirely disappear. This was the dream of 1776. The founders of the government knew how kings, and princes, and dukes, and lords, and barons had lived upon the labor of the peasants. They knew the history of those ages of want and crime, of luxury and suffering. But in spite of our Declaration, in spite of our Constitution, in spite of universal suffrage, the inequalities still exist. We hav the kings and princes, the lords and peasants, in fact, if not in name. Monopolists, corporations, capitalists, workers for wages, hav taken their places, and we are forced to admit that even universal suffrage cannot clothe and feed the world.

For thousands of years men hav been talking and writing about the great law of supply and demand—and insisting that in some way this mysterious law has governed and will continue to govern the activities of the human race. It is admitted that this law is merciless—that when the demand fails, the producer, the laborer, must suffer, must perish—that the law feels neither pity nor malice—it simply acts, regardless of consequences. Under this law, capital will employ the cheapest. The single man can work for less than the married. Wife and children are luxuries not to be enjoyed under this law. The ignorant hav fewer wants than the educated, and for this reason can afford to work for less. The great law will giv employment to the single and to the ignorant in preference to the married and intelligent. The great law has nothing to do with food or clothes, with filth or crime. It cares nothing for homes, for penitentiaries or asylums. It simply acts—and some men triumph, some succeed, some fail, and some perish.

Others insist that the curse of the world is monopoly. And yet, as long as some men are stronger than others, as long as some are more intelligent than others, they must be, to the extent of such advantage, monopolists. Every man of genius is a monopolist.

We are told that the great remedy against monopoly—that is to say, against extortion—is free and unrestricted competition. But, after all, the history of this world shows that the brutalities of competition are equaled only by those of monopoly. The successful competitor becomes a monopolist, and if competitors fail to destroy each other, the instinct of self-preservation suggests a combination. In other words, competition is a struggle between two or more persons or corporations for the purpose of determining which shall hav the uninterrupted privilege of extortion.

In this country the people hav had the greatest reliance on competition. If a railway company charged too much a rival road was built. As a matter of fact, we are indebted for half the railroads of the United States to the extortions of the other half, and the same may truthfully be said of telegraph lines. As a rule, while the exactions of monopoly constructed new roads and new lines, competition has either destroyed the weaker, or produced the pool which is a means of keeping both monopolies alive, or of producing a new monopoly with greater needs, supplied by methods more heartless than the old. When a rival road is built, the people support the rival because the fares and freights are somewhat less. Then the old and richer monopoly inaugurates war, and the people, glorying in the benefits of competition, are absurd enough to support the old. In a little while the new company, unable to maintain the contest, left by the people at the mercy of the stronger, goes to the wall, and the triumphant monopoly proceeds to make the intelligent people pay not only the old price, but enough in addition to make up for the expenses of the contest.

Is there any remedy for this? None, except with the people themselvs. When the people become intelligent enough to support the rival at a reasonable price; when they know enough to allow both roads to liv; when they are intelligent enough to recognize a friend and to stand by that friend as against a known enemy, this question will be at least on the edge of solution.

So far as I know, this course has never been pursued except in one instance, and that is in the present war between the Gould and Mackey cables. The Gould system had been charging from sixty to eighty cents a word, and the Mackey system charged forty. Then the old monopoly tried to induce the rival to put the prices back to sixty. The rival refused, and thereupon the Gould combination dropped to twelve and a half, for the purpose of destroying the rival. The Mackey cable fixed the tariff at twenty-five cents, saying to its customers, "You are intelligent enough to understand what this war means. If our cables are defeated, the Gould system will go back not only to the old price, but will add enough to reimburse itself for the cost of destroying us. If you really wish for competition, if you desire a reasonable service at a reasonable rate, you will support us." Fortunately, an exceedingly intelligent class of people does business by the cables. They are merchants, bankers, and brokers, dealing with large amounts, with intricate, complicated, and international questions. Of necessity they are used to thinking for themselvs. They are not dazzled into blindness by the glare of the present. They see the future. They are not duped by the sunshine of a moment or the promis of an hour. They see beyond the horizon of a penny saved. These people had intelligence enough to say, "The rival who stands between us and extortion is our friend, and our friend shall not be allowed to die."

Does not this tend to show that people must depend upon themselvs, and that some questions can be settled by the intelligence of those who buy, of those who use, and that customers are not entirely helpless?

Another thing should not be forgetten, and that is this: there is the same war between monopolies that there is between individuals, and the monopolies for many years hav been trying to destroy each other. They hav unconsciously been working for the extinction of monopolies. These monopolies differ as individuals do. You find among them the rich and the poor, the lucky and the unfortunate, millionaires and tramps. The great monopolies hav been devouring the little ones.

Only a few years ago the railways in this country were controled by local directors and local managers. The people along the lines were interested in the stock. As a consequence, whenever any legislation was threatened hostil to the interests of these railways, they had local friends who used their influence with legislators, governors, and juries. During this time they were protected, but when the hard times came many of these companies were unable to pay their interest. They suddenly became Socialists. They cried out against their prosperous rivals. They felt like joining the Knights of Labor. They began to talk about rights and wrongs. But in spite of their cries, they hav passed into the hands of the richer roads—they were seized by the great monopolies. Now the important railways are owned by persons living in large cities or in foreign countries. They hav no local friends, and when the time comes, and it may come, for the general government to say how much these companies shall charge for passengers and freights, they will hav no local friends. It may be that the great mass of the people will then be on the other side. So that after all the great corporations hav been busy settling the question against themselvs.

Possibly a majority of the American people believe to-day that in some way all these questions between capital and labor can be settled by constitutions, laws, and judicial decisions. Most people imagin that a statute is a sovereign specific for any evil. But while the theory has all been one way, the actual experience has been the other—just as the free-traders hav all the arguments and the protectionists most of the facts.

The truth is, as Mr. Buckle says, that for five hundred years all real advance in legislation has been made by repealing laws. Of one thing we must be satisfied, and that is that real monopolies hav never been controled by law, but the fact that such monopolies exist is a demonstration that the law has been controled. In our country, legislators are for the most part controled by those who, by their wealth and influence, elect them. The few in reality cast the votes of the many, and the few influence the ones voted for by the many. Special interests, being activ, secure special legislation, and the object of special legislation is to create a kind of monopoly—that is to say, to get some advantage. Chiefs, barons, priests, and kings ruled, robbed, destroyed, and duped, and their places hav been taken by corporations, monopolists, and politicians. The large fish still liv on the little ones, and the fine theories hav as yet failed to change the condition of mankind.

Law in this country is effectiv only when it is the recorded will of a majority. When the zealous few get control of the legislature, and the laws are passed to prevent Sabbath-breaking, or wine-drinking, they succeed only in putting their opinions and provincial prejudices in legal phrase. There was a time when men worked from fourteen to sixteen hours a day. These hours hav not been lessened, they hav not been shortened by law. The law has followed and recorded, but the law is not a leader and not a prophet. It appears to be impossible to fix wages—just as impossible as to fix the values of all manufactured things, including the works of art. The field is too great, the problem too complicated, for the human mind to grasp.

To fix the value of labor is to fix all values—labor being the foundation of all values. The value of labor cannot be fixed unless we understand the relations that all things bear to each other and to man. If labor were a legal tender—if a judgment for so many dollars could be discharged by so many days of labor—and the law was that twelve hours of work should be reckoned as one day, then the law could change the hours to ten or eight, and the judgments could be paid in the shortened days. But it is easy to see that in all contracts made after the passage of such a law, the difference in hours would be taken into consideration.

We must remember that law is not a creativ force. It produces nothing. I raises neither corn nor wine. The legitimate object of law is to protect the weak, to prevent violence and fraud, and to enforce honest contracts, to the end that each person may be free to do as he desires, providing only that he does not interfere with the rights of others. Our fathers tried to make people religious by law. They failed. Thousands are now trying to make people temperate in the same manner. Such efforts always hav been and probably always will be failures. People who believe that an infinit God gave to the Hebrews a perfect code of laws, must admit that even this code failed to civilize the inhabitants of Palestine.

It seems impossible to make people just, or charitable, or industrious, or agreeable, or successful, by law, any more than you can make them physically perfect or mentally sound. Of course we admit that good people intend to make good laws, and that good laws, faithfully and honestly executed, tend to the preservation of human rights and to the elevation of the race, but the enactment of a law not in accordance with a sentiment already existing in the minds and hearts of the people—the very people who are depended upon to enforce this law—is not a help, but a hindrance. A real law is but the expression in an authoritativ and accurate form of the judgment and desire of the majority. As we become intelligent and kind, this intelligence and kindness find expression in law.

But how is it possible to fix the wages of every man? To fix wages is to fix prices, and a government, to do this intelligently, would necessarily hav to hav the wisdom generally attributed to an infinit being. It would hav to supervise and fix the conditions of every exchange of commodities and the value of every conceivable thing. Many things can be accomplished by law. Employers may be held responsible for injuries to the employed. The mines can be ventilated. Children can be rescued from the deformities of toil—burdens taken from the backs of wives and mothers—houses made wholesome, food healthful—that is to say, the weak can be protected from the strong, the honest from the vicious, honest contracts can be enforced, and many rights protected.

The men who hav simply strength, muscle, endurance, compete not only with other men of strength, but with the inventions of genius. What would doctors say if physicians of iron could be invented with curious cogs and wheels, so that when a certain button was touched the proper prescription would be written? How would lawyers feel if a lawyer could be invented in such a way that questions of law, being put in a kind of hopper and a crank being turned, decisions of the highest court could be prophesied without failure? And how would the ministers feel if somebody should invent a clergyman of wood that would to all intents and purposes answer the purpose?

Invention has filled the world with the competitors not only of laborers, but of mechanics—mechanics of the highest skill. To-day the ordinary laborer is for the most part a cog in a wheel. He works with the tireless—he feeds the insatiable. When the monster stops, the man is out of employment, out of bread. He has not saved anything. The machine that he fed was not feeding him, was not working for him—the invention was not for his benefit. The other day I heard a man say that it was almost impossible for thousands of good mechanics to get employment, and that in his judgment the government ought to furnish work for the people. A few minutes after, I heard another say that he was selling a patent for cutting out clothes, that one of his machines could do the work of twenty tailors, and that only the week before he had sold two to a great house in New York, and that over forty cutters had been discharged.

On every side men are being discharged and machines are being invented to take their places. When the great factory shuts down, the workers who inhabited it and gave it life, as thoughts do the brain, go away and it stands there like an empty skull. A few workmen, by the force of habit, gather about the closed doors and broken windows and talk about distress, the price of food, and the coming winter. They are convinced that they hav not had their share of what their labor created. They feel certain that the machines inside were not their friends. They look at the mansion of the employer and think of the places where they liv. They hav saved nothing—nothing but themselvs. The employer seems to hav enough. Even when employers fail, when they become bankrupt, they are far better off than the laborers ever were. Their worst is better than the toilers' best.

The capitalist comes forward with his specific. He tells the workingman that he must be economical—and yet, under the present system, economy would only lessen wages. Under the great law of supply and demand every saving, frugal, self-denying workingman is unconsciously doing what little he can to reduce the compensation of himself and his fellows. The slaves who did not wish to run away helped fasten chains on those who did. So the saving mechanic is a certificate that wages are high enough. Does the great law demand that every worker liv on the least possible amount of bread? Is it his fate to work one day, that he may get enough food to be able to work another? Is that to be his only hope—that and death?

Capital has always claimed and still claims the right to combine. Manufacturers meet and determin upon prices, even in spite of the great law of supply and demand. Hav the laborers the same right to consult and combine? The rich meet in the bank, the club-house, or parlor. Workingmen, when they combine, gather in the street. All the organized forces of society are against them. Capital has the army and the navy, the legislativ, the judicial, and the executiv departments. When the rich combine, it is for the purpose of "exchanging ideas." When the poor combine, it is a "conspiracy." If they act in concert, if they really do something, it is a "mob." If they defend themselvs, it is "treason." How is it that the rich control the departments of government? In this country the political power is equally divided among the men. There are certainly more poor than there are rich. Why should the rich control? Why should not the laborers combine for the purpose of controling the executiv, legislativ, and judicial departments? Will they ever find how powerful they are?

In every country there is a satisfied class—too satisfied to care. They are like the angels in heaven who are never disturbed by the miseries of earth. They are too happy to be generous. This satisfied class asks no questions and answers none. They believe the world is as it should be. All reformers are simply disturbers of the peace. When they talk low, they should not be listened to; when they talk loud, they should be suppressed.

The truth is to-day what it always has been—what it always will be—those who feel are the only ones who think. A cry comes from the oppressed, from the hungry, from the down-trodden, from the unfortunate, from men who despair and from women who weep. There are times when mendicants become revolutionists—when a rag becomes a banner, under which the noblest and bravest battle for the right.

How are we to settle the unequal contest between men and machines? Will the machine finally go into partnership with the laborer? Can these forces of nature be controled for the benefit of her suffering children? Will extravagance keep pace with ingenuity? Will the workers become intelligent enough and strong enough to be the owners of the machines? Will these giants, these Titans, shorten or lengthen the hours of labor? Will they giv leisure to the industrious, or will they make the rich richer and the poor poorer?

Is man involved in the "general scheme of things?" Is there no pity, no mercy? Can man become intelligent enough to be generous, to be just; or does the same law or fact control him that controls the animal and vegetable world? The great oak steals the sunlight from the smaller trees. The strong animals devour the weak—everything eating something else—everything at the mercy of beak, and claw, and hoof, and tooth—of hand and club, of brain and greed—inequality, injustice everywhere.

The poor horse standing in the street with his dray, overworked, over-whipped, and under-fed, when he sees other horses groomed to mirrors, glittering with gold and silver, scorning with proud feet the very earth, probably indulges in the usual Socialistic reflections, and this same horse, worn out and old, deserted by his master, turned into the dusty road, leans his head on the topmost rail, looks at donkeys in a field of clover, and feels like a Nihilist.

In the days of savagery the strong devoured the weak—actually ate their flesh. In spite of all the laws that man has made, in spite of all advance in science, literature, and art, the strong, the cunning, the heartless, still liv on the weak, the unfortunate, and foolish. True, they do not eat their flesh, they do not drink their blood, but they liv on their labor, on their self-denial, their weariness, and want. The poor man who deforms himself by toil, who labors for wife and child, through all his anxious, barren, wasted life—who goes to the grave without ever having had one luxury—has been the food of others. He has been devoured by his fellow-men. The poor woman living in the bare and lonely room, cheerless and fireless, sewing night and day to keep starvation from a child, is slowly being eaten by her fellow-men. When I take into consideration the agony of civilized life—the number of failures, the poverty, the anxiety, the tears, the withered hopes, the bitter realities, the hunger, the crime, the humiliation, the shame—I am almost forced to say that cannibalism, after all, is the most merciful form in which man has ever lived upon his fellow-man.

Some of the best and purest of our race hav advocated what is known as Socialism. They hav not only taught, but, what is much more to the purpose, hav believed, that a nation should be a family; that the government should take care of all its children; that it should provide work, and food, and clothes, and education for all, and that it should divide the results of all labor equitably with all.

Seeing the inequalities among men, knowing of the destitution and crime, these men were willing to sacrifice, not only their own liberties, but the liberties of all.

Socialism seems to be one of the worst possible forms of slavery. Nothing in my judgment would so utterly paralyze all the forces, all the splendid ambitions and aspirations that now tend to the civilization of man. In ordinary systems of slavery there are some masters, a few are supposed to be free; but in a Socialistic state all would be slaves.

If the government is to provide work, it must decide for the worker what he must do. It must say who shall chisel statues, who shall paint pictures, who shall compose music, and who shall practice the professions. Is any government, or can any government be, capable of intelligently performing these countless duties? It must not only control work, it must not only decide what each shall do, but it must control expenses, because expenses bear a direct relation to products. Therefore the government must decide what the worker shall eat and wherewithal he shall be clothed; the kind of house in which he shall liv; the manner in which it shall be furnished, and, if this government furnishes the work, it must decide on the days or the hours of leisure. More than this, it must fix values; it must decide not only who shall sell, but who shall buy, and the price that must be paid—and it must fix this value not simply upon the labor, but on everything that can be produced, that can be exchanged or sold.

Is it possible to conceive of a despotism beyond this? The present condition of the world is bad enough, with its poverty and ignorance, but it is far better than it could by any possibility be under any government like the one described. There would be less hunger of the body, but not of the mind. Each man would simply be a citizen of a large penitentiary, and, as in every well-regulated prison, somebody would decide what each should do. The inmates of a prison retire early; they rise with the sun; they hav something to eat; they are not dissipated; they hav clothes; they attend divine service; they hav but little to say about their neighbors; they do not suffer from cold; their habits are excellent, and yet, no one envies their condition. Socialism destroys the family. The children belong to the state. Certain officers take the places of parents. Individuality is lost.

The human race cannot afford to exchange its liberty for any possible comfort. You remember the old fable of the fat dog that met the lean wolf in the forest. The wolf, astonished to see so prosperous an animal, inquired of the dog where he got his food, and the dog told him that there was a man who took care of him, gave him his breakfast, his dinner, and his supper with the utmost regularity, and that he had all that he could eat and very little to do. The wolf said, "Do you think this man would treat me as he does you?" The dog replied, "Yes; come along with me." So they jogged on together toward the dog's home. On the way the wolf happened to notice that some hair was worn off the dog's neck, and he said, "How did the hair become worn?" "That is," said the dog, "the mark of the collar—my master ties me at night." "Oh," said the wolf, "are you chained? Are you deprived of your liberty? I believe I will go back. I prefer hunger."

It is impossible for any man with a good heart to be satisfied with this world as it now is. No one can truly enjoy even what he earns—what he knows to be his own—knowing that millions of his fellowmen are in misery and want. When we think of the famished we feel that it is almost heartless to eat. To meet the ragged and shivering makes one almost ashamed to be well dressed and warm—one feels as though his heart was as cold as their bodies.

In a world filled with millions and millions of acres of land waiting to be tilled, where one man can raise the food for hundreds, millions are on the edge of famin. Who can comprehend the stupidity at the bottom of this truth?

Is there to be no change? Are "the law of supply and demand," invention and science, monopoly and competition, capital and legislation, always to be the enemies of those who toil? Will the workers always be ignorant enough and stupid enough to giv their earnings for the useless? Will they support millions of soldiers to kill the sons of other workingmen? Will they always build temples for ghosts and phantoms, and liv in huts and dens themselvs? Will they forever allow parasites with crowns, and vampires with miters, to liv upon their blood? Will they remain the slaves of the beggars they support? How long will they be controled by friends who seek favors, and by reformers who want office? Will they always prefer famin in the city to a feast in the fields? Will they ever feel and know that they hav no right to bring children into this world that they cannot support? Will they use their intelligence for themselvs, or for others? Will they become wise enough to know that they cannot obtain their own liberty by destroying that of others? Will they finally see that every man has a right to choose his trade, his profession, his employment, and has the right to work when, and for whom, and for what he will? Will they finally say that the man who has had equal privileges with all others has no right to complain, or will they follow the example that has been set by their oppressors? Will they learn that force, to succeed, must hav a thought behind it, and that anything done, in order that it may endure, must rest upon the corner-stone of justice?

Will they, at the command of priests, forever extinguish the spark that sheds a little light in every brain? Will they ever recognize the fact that labor, above all things, is honorable—that it is the foundation of virtue? Will they understand that beggars cannot be generous, and that every healthy man must earn the right to liv? Will honest men stop taking off their hats to successful fraud? Will industry, in the presence of crowned idleness, forever fall upon its knees, and will the lips unstained by lies forever kiss the robed impostor's hand?

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

The Liberal Club.

THE TRUTH SEEKER moved week before last, and the man with the badge-pin got so weary hollering while others lifted at the thousands of pounds of types, imposing-stones, and other bric-a-brac, that instead of going to the 439th meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club, he stayed at home to rest. Sustained intellectual effort must be followed by a period of relaxation. Such information regarding the above meeting as is here afforded was derived from the lady secretary.

The lecturer of the evening was Mrs. Isabelle Hinton, who spoke to the query, "What is Socialism?" It was one of those fortunately very rare occasions when President Wakeman was not on hand to call the meeting to order, and that duty devolved upon Deacon Dean, who got along with it quite well. Concerning what followed, the secretary says: "Mrs. Hinton opened her address with an appropriate poem—at least, what could be heard of it in the back part of the room was appropriate, but, being more a musician than an elocutionist, she seemed to forget that, in reading, emphasis should be regulated by the sense, and not by meter, as with the accent in music. So, not unlike Colonel Dawson, the speaker allowed the stress of voice to fall somewhat too monotonously upon syllables and words by measure, and then allowed her voice to drop almost to indistinctness in uttering other words of the greatest importance." Having made this technical and Delsartian criticism of the style of the discourse, the secretary proceeds to consider its matter: "The lecturer spoke more of results that would be attained by the institution of Socialism than of the specific methods, in detail, by which these results may be reached. One never before having heard of Socialism would hav known but little more about it at the end of the lecture than at the beginning." As the Liberal Club audience is somewhat acquainted with the subject, however, her omission to tell what Socialism is, instead of what it may possibly aim at, was not seriously felt. The lecture lasted half an hour, during which time President Wakeman arrived, and furnished occasion for applause.

Dr. Kinget complained that the speaker had not done justice to the subject. Monopolists, tyrants, bosses, and other rulers must be eliminated by universal coöperation. Of Dr. Kinget's remarks the secretary observes: "The doctor forgets that in any and every movement there must be a leader."

Mrs. Leonard expressed her surprise at Dr. Kinget's lack of comprehension.

Mr. Leavitt said that Socialism was one of some thirty reforms which he was interested in. Among the others were graduated taxation, land limitation, greenbacks, and the shutting off of immigration to this country. To the latter reform Mr. Leavitt had determined to devote all his great powers as an orator and writer. Those who read this in foreign parts should hasten to America before Mr. Leavitt gets in his work and closes our ports.

Mrs. Florence Kelly Wishnowetzki was next introduced by the Chair, with some difficulty, as "all the way from Russia." Mrs. Wishnowetzki said that joke was too far fetched, as she was from Philadelphia. The lecture to which she had listened was of too general a nature, and had not added to the sum total of her knowledge of Socialism.

Mr. Sutherland maintained that, as Professor Denslow had pointed out in a recent lecture, Socialism is a return to barbarism, because all savage tribes are social in their customs. The secretary here comes to the relief of Socialism as follows: "Mr. Sutherland is evidently unaware of the potency of a principle or law known to students of Integralism as the antithetical repetition of the lowest in the highest; that is, that the lowest, the stages of barbarism, will reappear in the highest stages of civilization, but they will appear 'with a new spirit and a different purpose.' Socialism was and is, in a measure, prevalent in the barbaric stages; so are the habits of breathing and eating. Is it logical to reason that if we breathe or eat now we shall return to barbarism? Just as logical as to say that Socialism is barbarism. Dismiss your fears, Mr. Sutherland," proceeds the secretary; "you need not anticipate impossibilities. The government of the United States is nearer Socialistic than that of almost any other country, and its course is the true course of evolution, for the Socialist believes that the administration by the whole for the good of all is for the fittest to survive."

Dr. Weeks and Herr Oppenheimer followed, making some good points, and then came the closing speech of the evening, Colonel Hinton answering in behalf of Mrs. Hinton. "The only thing which marred what he said," comments the secretary, "was his tendency to attack the person holding an opposit opinion instead of the opinion itself." Nearly everybody, he said, agreed that the railroads and the telegraph, as well as the post-office, should be in the hands of the government. Why not, then, the land and the means of production and distribution?—remembering always that government means the whole people—in the hands of all for the good of all.

The 440th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club was marked by the return of Mr. Isaac Cohen to its platform.

Dr. Edwin V. Wright, who was expected to address the meeting on "Dangers of the Republic," failed to appear at the proper time. This in no wise disconcerted the president, who, in opening, merely announced the facts in the case, and observed cheerfully that the club would, as in so many previous instances, draw upon its own inexhaustible resources. The audience would please to nominate its speaker. The names of Cohen and Eccles were immediately suggested. Herr Oppenheimer was present, and gave visible tokens of being willing to make a speech, but he was overlooked. The Chair asked Dr. Eccles to make the overture, as he would be more likely to take the orthodox side and thus stimulate discussion. Dr. Eccles was sustained by applause as he took the platform. It was always supposed, he said, by the general public that some danger to our republic is imminent. Some see danger in Anarchism, others in Socialism; they balance each other. Catholicism and Freethought also pair in an innocuous manner. Monopolies are all blessings, and are capable of becoming greater blessings. At the same time, monopolies are curses. Such is the nature of truth; whatever is good is bad, and the better it is the worse it is when turned to a bad end. We are apt to be extremists and see only one side of truth. Socialists who would suppress all small monopolies would substitute therefor a national governmental monopoly. Monopolies would be harmless if they were kept in subjection during their incipiency. We should hav such a law passed that any monopolist who lowers his rates in competition to kill a rival shall keep his prices down after the rival is dead, and thus kill himself. Dr. Eccles's speech was quite satisfactory.

Mr. Cohen then took the floor. It was very gratifying to see him there again, as he has been absent for a good while. He informed his friends that he had recently been a resident of the city of Washington, and consequently could speak with confidence of United States affairs. He regretted that Dr. Eccles had been so non-committal in his remarks, and had said nothing positiv eyether one way or the other. Mr. Cohen said eyether twice, so that the audience would see that he did not say eether, which has passed out of use. Mr. Cohen did not believe the government was in danger, because the people were able to get along all right without any government. He had been in rural districts where they didn't know we had such a thing as a government, and didn't care to know. Mr. Cohen believed in protection as against free trade, because under free trade a strike would hav no show of success, as manufacturers would import instead of manufacturing. Dr. Eccles evidently misunderstood the nature of Socialism. It did not propose to put industries in the hands of the present government, but the government would be changed to fit Socialism. The speaker believed all monopolies were evils. He also discussed the pension and appropriation bills, and the Interstate Commerce bill. Mr. Cohen shows signs of having studied the congressional methods of expression, and has contracted an ornate style of oratory. He discourses fluently of the splendors of the Roman empire, and knows as much as any one about the cause of its fall. A speech or sermon nowadays which contains no reference to the fall of the Roman empire is not considered a finished effort.

Mrs. Hallock, who had hardly succeeded in deferring her criticism until Mr. Cohen had finished his speech, was the next speaker. She said the greatest monopoly was the monopoly of the weaker sex by the stronger. All other evils can be traced to this one. Women are never elected to Congress, and yet they hav to suffer for the sins of that body. "Aren't you ashamed of yourselvs?" she inquired.

Colonel Hinton said that the paramount and overwhelming danger is the divorcement of the citizen from the government—the contempt of the rich and the indifference of the poor. No one with any capacity of observation can deny that such is the state of affairs in the United States.

Mr. Sutherland was glad to hear that things were no worse. He did not believe governments could conduct enterprises as profitably as individuals. He had taken observations in the navy yard at Brooklyn, and never saw half the employees there working at once. The greatest danger to government is corruption in politics.

Mr. Flynn, a new member, said Dr. Eccles had amused him. Mr. Flynn endeavored to rebuke the club for not accepting the Bible for authority, and then quoted from that aged book a saying that is nowhere between its lids. Then he said that the proper place for woman was by the fireside. The lady secretary desires to know what business Mr. Flynn has to form an opinion upon that subject. It is women's duty, she holds, to stay by the fireside or not, just as she chooses, and men hav no voice in the matter whatever.

Dr. Eccles closed the debate.

A member purchased a TRUTH SEEKER of last week, and, when he found there was no report of the previous meeting, desired his money returned.

Mr. Wakeman referred to the approaching annual meeting and election of officers, and warned the club that it must elect a new president, as he should decline to be a candidate. This announcement caused deep regret. The club will probably decline to accept its president's resignation. As for the writer of these lines, he can never think of any but Brother Wakeman as the proper chairman of the meetings. But if the edict has gone forth, and there must come the bitter end, while we lament departed worth, and mourn the club's distinguished friend; yet shall the cause of light progress; the right shall grapple with the wrong; the hosts of truth will onward press, and help to boom the thing along. Aspirers to forensic fame shall those who dwell in darkness teach, and members will discuss the same in speeches of ten minutes each.

The next lecture is by John Beverly Robinson, Esq., on "Anarchism and Christianity."

The New Theology as Bad as the Old.

Writing of Col. R. G. Ingersoll, the editor of the New Theology Herald says:

> It is well known that for several years the great Goliath of the Philistines has been losing his enthusiasm for destructiv work. He himself has said that only the need of money now keeps him before the public as a religious iconoclast. Once he had enthusiasm, but his heart is no longer in the work.

The above statements are lies.

News and Notes.

It was a glorious day, Wednesday, March 9th, when I journeyed along the jeweled ramparts of the mountains shining with all sweet colors in the brilliant atmosphere, so clear that the most distant summits were almost as distinct in outline as the first ranges. The beauty of nature answered to the high hope within of humanity's progress. My sojourn in Colorado was pleasant indeed. The friends there are good to the core. Our pioneer, Jamieson, has labored effectivly. The Denver society will conquer all difficulties, I know. Austin W. Smith has offered a lot worth thirty-five hundred dollars for the building of a Secular Hall, and so our temple of humanity will sometime greet the sun amid this mountain land. With such devoted supporters as Messrs. Coplen, Fisher, Roth, Freeman, Hurlburt, Truss, Jenkins, A. H. Weber, C. T. Weber, Fred Warren, Z. Shedd, Dr. McCall, with their families and others, Denver will be one of our brightest camp-fires in the long line of freedom, and Colorado shall fling for us its pennons from a thousand hights.

Along I go through the golden sunset, the moonlight and starlight, the corridors of morn, and beneath the cloudless arch of day, by the glistening Spanish Peaks that stand like two enormous sentinels guarding a world of enchantment. This is a strange country indeed, New Mexico and Arizona. I seem to be on a different continent, so wonderful and grotesque is the scenery. The winds and the waves hav played mighty pranks in these weird and desolate regions. Volcanic fires and lava streams hav written their history here. The deserts, gray and red, stretch away, edged with a thousand fantastic forms, that tower in the blue horizon six and twelve thousand feet high. It seems as if this were once the dwelling-place of giants, who had a high old spree, and tumbled things about in reckless fashion, without any regard for appearances. It is a world of anarchy, and it seems out of place for the iron horse of civilization to go dashing along these ancient solitudes. How is it possible for any modern thing to flourish here? And yet all of a sudden out of these grim ruins we come upon a bright city of from five to ten thousand inhabitants, and wonder how it is possible for such things to be, for the hand of progress to unroll so busy a scene of life in the very heart of the wilderness. We find the conveniences of civilization mingled with barbaric relics, and the wild savage stands alongside the elegance of wealth, a marvelous contrast. We ride by Indian villages, with their desultory mud huts, quite stately and comfortable-looking, some of them, and in the morning sun they present a picturesque aspect; and the little black barbarians that stare at us with such keen eyes under dark masses of tangled hair look for all the world as if they had just sprung from the soil, human weeds that grow up in a night. I almost expected to see them sink back into dust as the train went rattling by.

All day long, and all night long, and another day I had to travel far into the midnight ere I reached a place of rest—and not much of a rest at that, for the station where we changed cars is only about six weeks old, and the hotel accommodations are not of the finest. The station itself is only a freight-car, and the hotel a rude building of clapboards, and our couch a pine bunk, where I hadn't room to turn over for fear of tumbling off and rolling downstairs; and several others were in the same room with me, piled soldier-fashion together. However, I slept well. The landlord was one of the jolliest fellows I ever met—fat as Falstaff, and as humorous. He was bound to make you happy, and I verily believe that if I had slept outdoors on the hard ground he would hav made me imagin that I was on a downy couch, his remarks were so exhilarating. He was as good as a band of music.

Saturday was a lovely day, and we sped over the new railroad to Prescott, the capital of Arizona, arriving about morn. Arizona can boast of one thing, at least—a splendid climate. The air is perfectly delicious. The heavens are of a lustrous blue. The mountains shine like diamonds.

I found Prescott a thriving place of about two thousand inhabitants. Fort Whipple is about a mile from the city on the railroad. Several companies are stationed here. The legislature has just adjourned. Prescott has been isolated for years, being sixty miles from any railroad, and the stage journey over a rough country sometimes taking three days. The Prescott and Arizona Central Railroad, just built, givs it now a bright promis. The country about is heavily timbered, and gold and silver and copper mines are plentiful. The soil is good. It can produce wheat, corn, and potatoes; fruits of all sorts can be raised—apples, peaches, strawberries, etc. So this is not a desert country after all, as some people imagin. It has many advantages. The winters are delightful, the summers are cool, Prescott being at an elevation of about five thousand feet, and in the warmest season one needs a blanket when night comes, and sleep is always refreshing.

The orthodox hav had it their own way so far. The church rule has been undisturbed, and the priests really thought that the Infidel had no right to enter this land which they had preoccupied. However, there are some Liberals here—true blue, every one of them—and on Sunday afternoon and evening I had good audiences, and a Secular Union has been started. We hav hoisted our flag for the first time in this territory, and it will not come down. J. N. Rodenburg, T. W. Roberts, W. T. Richardson, Joseph Ehle, C. F. Collins, J. H. Brown, G. W. Sines, D. W. Frary, Peter B. Ohlsen, and others, nearly fifty in all, are among the best and bravest soldiers of liberty. I hav enjoyed myself in this frontier land. I hav struck a good people and work for the future is open. I shall come here again, and visit other parts of the territory. I don't mean to let orthodoxy hav this country all to itself. It must fight hereafter for every inch it possesses. The first Freethought lectures hav been given and the response is generous and noble. I hav found pleasant fellowship and dauntless hearts.

To-day I leave for California. I shall soon see the Pacific, and revel in its glory. I shall be at San Bernardino, San Diego, Los Angeles, Santa Ana, Norwalk, Tulare City, Visalia, until April 1st; at San Francisco and Oakland April 3d and 10th; at San José April 17th and 24th; at Stockton, May 1st and 8th; at Sonoma, Sacramento, and other places in California until June 1st; in Oregon during June, Washington Territory during July, and then I shall go eastward via Baker City, Boise City, etc.

I anticipate great pleasure in seeing Dr. York, who is doing such service for Freethought on the Pacific shore, and whose comradeship is so inspiring. I am looking forward to happy days in the Golden state, among its genial and enthusiastic people. Up to this point the work has been encouraging, and hope is bright.

English as She Is Writ.

I hav sometimes wondered if it is wise to teach young people to hav that absolutely blind faith in dictionary definitions and synonyms which is so common in the lower grades of our schools, and, indeed, with a large number of teachers. I hav attended one or two teachers' conventions, and hav heard really heated debates, between people who ought to hav known better, over the use of a word in a certain connection, "because the dictionary defines it to mean so and so," or because Webster declares it may be used instead of so-and-so. Shades of meaning, or even the more obvious and grosser uses of the word, are often sadly confused or lost by this blind adherence to authority which at best can only indicate or approximate the real value and color of the word.

I suppose it is due to some such reason that we are constantly made ill by the use of the word "aggravate" to mean provoke or irritate, and since its real meaning is so far from either of these, it invariably carries me back to my earliest school-days, when in our grammar class we were confronted with the following diagram, which we were told to fill out according to previous instructions; "and," our teachers added, "do try to hav some variety. Don't all use the same words." This is the diagram: "I love to (———) in the garden." We had one earnest, conscientious girl in the class who, however wanting in imagination, was always anxious to please the teacher. She therefore astonished the class and brought upon herself much ridicule (the cause of which she never did fully comprehend) by rendering her sentence thus: "I love to ferment in the garden."

She was not frivolous, therefore she avoided the word "play," which most of us used. "Walk" did not attract her, but when she looked in her dictionary and discovered that work meant the same as ferment, she felt that she could risk not only her correctness of sentiment, but also gain much honor by using a word that few, if any, others in the class would discover. She meant to astonish us with her erudition, and delight the teacher by her strict observation of instructions. The brilliancy of the result far outshone her most ardent desires, however. But I doubt if she ever did know why. I know that I did not for a long while thereafter, for she produced the "unabridged" to prove her point, and the evidence seemed to be on her side, however much the laugh was on ours (and of course we all laughed, as if we knew what we were laughing at, as that seemed to be the thing expected of us, and there is a good deal of monkey and a vast deal of savage left in us all yet). Perhaps this was a little worse misconception of the real meaning of a word than is implied in the use of "aggravate" for "provoke," or "residence" for "house," or "executed" for "hanged," or in the following use of "apartment," and one or two other words which were actually in a New York daily paper recently: "Wanted, by a hard-working colored lady, apartments in sub-cellar or attic, where washing will be allowed. Neighborhood must be first-class, and other residents of the house all ladies and gentlemen. No children." The same great daily said editorially that a man had been "executed" that day, and that the Anarchists would better not "aggravate" law-abiding citizens any further if they did not want to perform the same tight-rope trick to order and on short notice.

Goethe's Estimate of Voltaire.

"In Voltaire, nature produced the man most eminently endowed with all the qualities which characterize and honor his nation, and charged him to represent France to the Universe. After having produced these two extraordinary men, types, one of the royal majesty, the other of the French genius, nature rested, as if to make them better appreciated, or as if exhausted by the creation of two prodigies.

"A man must possess many advantages in order that public opinion may recognize in him an incontestable superiority; it is especially in France that a public, disdainful and difficult to please, soon ceases to regard whatever is not truly extraordinary. For a man to conquer its lasting approval, it is not too much for him to hav a multitude of talents, a wide and universal comprehension, a union of qualities the most opposed to one another, and which seem the most incompatible. Nothing short of a marvel wins the admiration of a Frenchman. But nature created marvels for him, in order to condemn him to admiration. I know not if we Germans are more sensitiv to literary beauties than the French, but we are certainly less avaricious of our applause; it suffices that talent givs us some pleasure to be the object of our homage; but even that which he admires the Frenchman does not love, while among us whatever is admired is loved also.

"Depth, genius, imagination, taste, reason, sensibility, philosophy, elevation, originality, nature, intellect, fancy, rectitude, facility, flexibility, precision, art, abundance, variety, fertility, warmth, magic, charm, grace, force, an eagle's sweep of vision, vast understanding, rich instruction, excellent tone, urbanity, vivacity, delicacy, correctness, purity, cleanness, elegance, harmony, brilliancy, rapidity, gayety, pathos, sublimity, universality, perfection, indeed—behold Voltaire!

"Voltaire will be always regarded as the greatest man in literature of modern times, and, perhaps, even of all times, as the most astonishing creation of the author of nature, a creation in which he pleased himself to assemble, once, in the frail and perishable organization of a man, all the varieties of talent, all the glories of genius, all the powers of thought."

Mr. Slokum Has a Poor Opinion of Mr. Hill.

BROTHER MACDONALD: Did you expect to hear anything from Dave Hill at the late junket in Brooklyn, "upon matters in the adjustment of which true statesmanship is demanded?" What! anything of this kind from Dave the Demagog? Demagog from teeth to toenails, and working the governorship for all it is worth for the presidency. Not much, if he knows himself, and I reckon he does—or thinks he does.

Yours fraternally, SI SLOKUM.

Strange, but Probably Not True.

From the London Tablet (Roman Catholic).

The pastoral letter of the archbishop of Paris contains a forcible appeal to the faithful to keep holy the Sabbath.

The spirit of contradiction, of perverse rebellion against the law, which makes the French nation so difficult to govern, is nowhere more strikingly manifested than in their contempt for the ordained observance of Sunday as a day of rest. The ouvrier seems to identify the breach of the Sabbath with self-respect and the vindication of liberty. He will refuse to work for an employer who makes it a condition that he does not work on Sunday. He will take Monday as a holiday, but not Sunday.

This perverse crochet is a constant source of difficulty between workmen and Christian employers. I hav known a church kept waiting for necessary repairs—a roof that let in the rain—because the cure would not consent to hav the men working on Sunday, and the men would not giv in on the point.

Periodically the church starts a crusade in behalf of the sanctification of the Lord's day, and sermons are preached, pamphlets written, associations formed, etc., to enforce the observance of the commandment. Undoubtedly these efforts hav met with a great deal of success. The large shops are now closed on Sundays, and the great majority of the small ones.

The first great business house that inaugurated this good rule was the Bon Marché. Those who saw that now famous establishment put up its shutters on Sunday prophesied that it would soon be bankrupt; but the Bon Marché held on its way, and it may be said that in this case virtue earned its reward, for no house of the kind has ever flourished, probably, as that popular shop has done.

But no efforts, so far, hav made any perceptible effect on the workingman—the ouvrier proper. He holds to his principle of working on Sunday and resting and generally getting drunk on Monday. A Christian architect will bribe his masons and plasterers with higher wages on Monday if they will but work that day and get tipsy on Sunday, but in vain. The ouvrier will not be tyrannized over by the priest, for he is persuaded that it is the cure who has invented the Sabbath, and it is a point of honor with a workman not to be hoodwinked and domineered over by the cure.

Mr. Reynolds in Ohio.

AKRON, OHIO, Mar. 2d.—Bidding adieu to the friends at Kent, I took train on the Valley Road for Akron, where I found royal accommodations at that model inn, Hotel Buchtel, one of the very best $2 per day houses in the state of Ohio. My hopes of success were dampened by the assurance that "but very few could be induced to attend a Liberal lecture, there was no interest," etc. So it was well-nigh eight o'clock before I lugged my grip, filled with choice Liberal pamphlets, across the street to Ayliffe Hall, and was surprised to find about two hundred and fifty ladies and gentlemen there assembled—about fifty more arrived later. My lecture on "The Bible, Whence it Really Came, and What it Really Teaches," was well received, and at its close the very brisk demand for Liberal literature assured me of the real interest awakened. There was no good reason why I should not hav delivered two more lectures, and thus insured more permanent good and a glorious impetus to the cause, but fear of failure had prevented the friends from arranging for more than the one lecture.

The friends of Kent are desirous to secure the Tent for two or three weeks the coming summer. If it can also go to Akron there is little doubt that quite a strong Liberal society would be organized.

Mr. William Buchtel, the leading Liberal of Akron, with great kindness, took me in his carriage to all those points of interest in the city that he thought THE TRUTH SEEKER readers would like an account of. We first visited the sewer-pipe works. The material for sewer-pipe, tile, and pottery abounds in the immediate vicinity of the works. It is a kind of half-rotted, slaty stone and clay; this is brought in carts to the works and dumped into the basement, and thrown into the great mills, water being from time to time thrown on it as it is ground into putty and forced through a ten-inch cylinder and carried to the cutters, where it is cut off into pieces of about six inches long, and placed in receivers on an elevator belt and carried to the story above, where men feed it into a mold worked by a steam engin. The putty is forced into the mold under immense pressure, and, in less than a minute, is dropped out from the bottom of the mold in the form of sewer pipe, and received by men in waiting who wheel it away on little go-carts to the drying-room. A few days later it is coated with a glazing liquid, and then packed in a kiln and baked for three or four days. The kiln is then opened and allowed to cool off, and the sewer pipe is all ready for shipment. Hundreds and hundreds of lengths of sewer pipe, of diameter from six inches to five feet, are turned out every day.

We next visited the Barber match factory. They were making in this one factory 50,600,000 matches a day, using up for matches and packing-boxes 30,000 feet of pine lumber. The celerity with which pine planks are transformed to parlor matches, boxed and packed ready for shipping, is really astounding. Pine planks are planed smooth on both sides to just the length of the matches (two and a half inches), and then by a circular saw cut into blocks about twelve inches wide and three inches long. All knots are thrown out. These blocks are carried into the match-room and fed into machines that cut the blocks up into match size, round each piece, and stick the end of each one into a perforated iron plate about 24x15 inches, each match being firmly held in place with a sixteenth of an inch space on all sides of it. Soon as these plates are filled, which is done at the rate of about three every minute, they are carried across to the dipping and drying machine. An endless band about a yard wide and about three hundred feet long is constantly revolving in an oval frame of about six feet high and one hundred and fifty feet long. The plates filled with the matches are placed in grooves on the lower part of the belt, points down, and are carried over two pans of chemicals, dipping the ends as they pass. As the band revolves and reaches the upper frame the dipped ends are up, and exposed to strong draughts of air from fans, which dries the phosphorus on the tips, so that on traveling on to the place of starting the matches are perfectly dry. Each plate is taken off and put in a machine which by one motion of a lever punches out all the matches into a receiver, and boys throw them into nests of boxes. The empty plates are returned to be refilled. When ten boxes are filled with matches they are carried into the packing-room, where there are two rows of about forty girls. With lightning rapidity the girls will grasp just the necessary number of matches, fill and fasten the paper boxes, which are constantly dropping down to them through a spout from the room above. Upstairs the paper match-boxes are made, printed, glued, and thrown to the girls below through the spout by small machines. A roll of the thick paper of which the boxes are made is placed on the machine, which folds it, prints the label on it, marks it, glues it, and then with one motion it is cut, the glued sides pressed together, and a perfect match-box flipped into the spout for the girl below to fill. Thus the work goes on with unceasing regularity and precision.

In the packing-box department the lumber is cut, and the side pieces planed perfectly smooth, sent up to the printing-office, and return with the label printed on the wood in vermillion letters. There is no sound of hammer heard in the box-making shop. The workmen place the pieces under a nailing machine fed with nails by boys, and the nails are forced in, and a packing-box made, and very thoroughly nailed while a smart workman would be driving two nails. Within five minutes from the time a plank is laid upon the table to be cut into blocks, that plank is made into extra round parlor matches, packed in small paper boxes, with neatly-printed label; each dozen boxes packed in another paper box neatly printed and wrapped, and each dozen such packages packed in a wooden packing-box having printed label on both sides, and all ready for shipment.

We next drove to the Buckeye Reaper and Mower works, but were too late to see the men at work, as the mechanics in those shops hav established the eight-hour law. The company are turning out 106 machines every day, besides the immense amount of work done in repairing old machines. On our way to the hospitable, happy home of friend Buchtel we stopped to gaze upon the pride of Akron, the Buchtel College—a magnificent building, with most valuable and extensiv grounds, built and endowed, the pet project of the brother of our Mr. Buchtel. The immense factory was running full force, turning out large numbers of pulpit-pounding machines of the Universalist pattern. They are made to build up skim-milk theology, and dispense with the sulphurous fires of other manufactories, not even using the last patent cooler, sheol.

Mr. Wm. Buchtel is an Infidel. What has he ever done for humanity? Well, he was content to let his brother attend to the imaginary spiritual needs of the people. He preferred to provide for their actual needs; so he adorned the city and increased its business interests by the erection of a splendid hotel. Having made a success of life and amassed a handsome fortune, he employs it in helping the industrious mechanics and workers to secure homes of their own, building houses for them on such easy terms that what they would otherwise pay for rent soon purchases the home of their own. He thus builds up the city and secures as permanent residents the best class of people. And, although an Infidel, he has the love and respect of the entire community.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.—Thanks to the zeal for the cause manifested by Mr. Thos. F. Lucas, the People's Theater was engaged for me to deliver a lecture on Sunday, March 6th, under the auspices of the Cleveland Liberal Society. After spending one night in the happy home of friend Lucas, I was taken possession of by Mr. L. B. Silver, the father of the Prohibition party in Ohio, known far and near as a stock-breeder and for his great success with his Ohio Improved Chester hogs. Mr. Silver is a deep thinker, a zealous Liberal, a Radical hygienist, and an enthusiastic admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The clerk of the weather put a damper on our meeting—from Saturday afternoon till Sunday evening it rained tremendously. The attendance was small, yet I greatly enjoyed the delivery of my lecture, and all present seemed to do so. I sold a very large amount of Liberal literature, including twenty copies of "The Bible Inquirer," and as many of "Blasphemy and the Bible," and exhausted my supply of TRUTH SEEKERS in responding to eager, anxious inquiries. Mr. B. C. Hart, the most shrewd and enterprising of theatrical managers, for whom Mr. Waldeman is now building on Euclid avenue, opposit the Union Club, one of the largest and handsomest theaters in the state, was so favorably impressed with the lecture that he offers to engage me to deliver two lectures, guarantees me crowded houses, and makes very liberal offers. I hope to avail myself of his kind offer during April, on my return from Chicago to be tried in New Jersey for blasphemy in May.

PAINESVILLE.—From Cleveland we turned Eastward to Painesville, and suffered an intense longing to keep on East, and visit our loved ones home, but stern duty forbade. Painesville is a hard field. There are a few stanch, brave hearts, but the mollusks are so numerous, and so dreadfully destitute of backbone, they exercise a most discouraging influence. We passed three very pleasant days with that glorious old veteran, Joseph Sedgebeer, and his better-half. Mr. Sedgebeer is over eighty-five years of age, yet retains full vigor of his cultured mind, and is earnest and enthusiastic as a young convert in the cause of Liberalism. It was our privilege to aid him in carrying out his long-cherished desire to bequeath the means to insure gratuitous circulation of leaflets and pamphlets on heredity, hygiene, and physiology. I delivered two lectures at Painesville, but, from lack of desire for Liberal literature, I fear I failed of awakening much interest.

BOWLING GREEN, March 10th.—This village is wild on gas and oil—not a promising outlook. I lecture at the court-house to-night. Friends will please address me at Kalamazoo, Mich.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

The Projected Insurance Company.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The proposed organization of a Liberal Mutual Aid is a matter of very far-reaching importance. Its organization concerns not only those Liberals who intend to join, but also those who will not, either because they already belong to other "aids," or are "insured."

If the proposed Liberal Mutual Aid should fail after a number of years, as so many other "aids" hav done, every Liberal will share the discredit caused by such failure; the question whether he or she was a member will not be asked by public opinion. Such a failure would be a set-back to the whole Liberal movement, and should, therefore, be prevented at the outset. These remarks hav a tendency to convey the idea that I am opposed to the organization of a Liberal Aid. I am not opposed to such an organization, but would very much prefer to see a "Liberal Mutual Insurance" formed. But in either case, the organization should be founded on a strictly scientific basis, not only to secure its permanent success, but also to insure justice to the members. There should be no guess-work, because we hav sufficient statistics to enable us to formulate strictly scientific conditions of membership, and if the Liberal movement is correct in taking science as its basis, then a "Liberal Aid" or "Insurance" will not fail if it is based on science also.

There are some fundamental truths which we should seek and observe in formulating an aid or insurance association; otherwise, failure, or at least injustice, will result.

1. The amounts agreed to be paid out at the death of members must also be paid in. In addition to this, the expenses must also be paid in, and also the difference or loss arising by members dying before they hav paid in as much as is paid out at their death.

The running expenses are such a small item that they can easily be raised, but the benefits are necessarily large amounts, say from $500 to $2,000. Taking, for example, a member 30 years of age: We find that according to the combined experience table he will probably liv 34 years more, and if $1,000 is to be paid out at his death, he must pay in an average of $29.41 to pay in the $1,000. If he does not on the average pay in this amount, somebody else must pay it for him, otherwise there will be no $1,000 at his death, unless the association has some other source of income, as, for instance, interest on an invested reserve fund. If the $29.41 is paid in annually, and invested at say four per cent, the compound interest would produce an income sufficient for almost double the amount, so that instead of $29.41, only about $15 would hav to be paid in annually to produce $1,000 in 34 years.

If the benefits are raised by assessments at deaths only, and the average age of the members is 30 years, then, because over eight members will die annually out of every 1,000, according to statistics, each member must pay over $8 during the first year, if $1,000 is paid at each death.

If 1,000 new members join the second year, and the average age of these new members is also 30 years, the total average of all the members will be nearly 30 1-2 years, and in a little over two years the average would be 31 years, consequently the assessments would amount to as much more in proportion, and must keep on increasing each year, so that the general average of all assessments would be again $29.41; otherwise, those members who liv to the average probable age, which is 64 years in the assumed case, will get left, because at 60 years over 30 die out of every 1,000, and at this age the living members would probably not be as able to pay $30 as they were to pay $8 at 30 years. At the age of 70 the death rate is nearly 65 out of every 1,000, and it is safe to say that the $65 per member would not come forth; and, therefore:

2. Those who join at about or before 30 years of age, and liv to about 70 years, will surely get left on the assessment plan.

It is true that if the average age of the new members constantly joining is 30 years, the total average age would rise slower than the average age of the first members, but this only puts off the final result a little longer.

3. All the members will either die or cease to be members before they die.

Those who are members at their death simply oblige the association to pay to their beneficiaries the amount agreed to, but those who cease to be members before their death, and hav made payments for the benefit of others, should be dealt with justly, and the question whether they hav any claim against the association after making payments for the benefit of the remaining members must be decided before starting. When there is no reserve fund provided, it is just to say that the fact that the remaining members were willing and ready to pay the benefits of the ex-members while they were members, was a full compensation for the assessments which the ex-members actually did pay while members. But when there is a reserve fund accumulated, those who cease to be members before death clearly hav a claim against the reserve fund, because a part of it was intended for them, and the cessation of membership does not giv the remaining members any just claim for that part of the reserve fund, which was never intended for themselvs. This is especially true when inability to continue payment causes cessation of membership. It follows, therefore, that

4. When no reserve fund nor any other fund is accumulated, those who cease to be members before their death should hav no claim against those who remain members. And

5. When a reserve or security fund is accumulated, then those who cease to be members before their death hav a just claim against such fund.

The conditions of the association will probably change materially in time, and experience shows that the change is generally very material after about seven years; that is to say, as the association grows older, deaths will occur more frequently, and on the other hand, if a reserve fund is accumulated, membership will be more valuable therefor.

6. Provisions should be made which will justly equalize the benefits and disadvantages arising as the association grows older or richer.

7. All provisions concerning the future of the association, such as reserve fund, should be based on the expectation of life, as shown by the combined experience mortality table.

I will present definit conditions for membership in accordance with the above truths in my next letter.

Money for the Catholics of Cayuga County.

FRIEND MACDONALD: In your paper of March 12th appears an editorial entitled, "Blind on One Side," accompanied by an extract from the Christian Advocate of Feb. 26th. This extract refers to the same law to which I referred in a letter to you some time ago, and published in THE TRUTH SEEKER. As I then said, the law operates only in certain judicial districts of this state, and is an unwholesome and unconstitutional law, and should be repealed. The same law our Cayuga county representativs were, by resolution of the board of supervisors, called upon to use every honorable means to repeal, and to-day in Albany are seeking assistance for its repeal. Let the Advocate's friends, and all other lovers of secular government, help. The entire Protestant clergy of Auburn are protesting against another intrusion now before the legislature, known as an "Act to incorporate the Catholic Orphan Asylum of the city of Auburn." I inclose a copy of the protest. The people are slowly but surely awakening to this important question. My position is this: If you giv one, giv all, including the Infidel; but beyond and above that is a constitutional ground, which is this: Make no appropriations of the people's money for sectarian purposes; let every denomination stand or fall by itself. Protestants do not take such a liberal position. They demand appropriations for themselvs, but when the Catholic asks, they say, "An awful thing! Giv not to those abominable Catholics, but abundantly fill us!" As you say, "it makes a vast difference whose ox is gored." All American liberty-loving citizens should now join hands to repeal all obnoxious sectarian laws, and instead of the preacher in charitable institutions substitute the teacher. EDWARD ROSS.

The following is the protest and a pertinent letter, evidently written by a Catholic:

To the Citizens of Cayuga County: We, the undersigned pastors of Auburn, desire to call your attention to a bill before the legislature to incorporate the "Auburn Orphan Asylum." By the provisions of the bill a burden is imposed on the people of this county to sustain an institution wholly under the control of the Roman Catholic church, and which will be used in perpetuating that faith. We protest against the taxing the people to support Roman Catholic institutions, as, we believe, taxation for the support of any sectarian institution is dangerous to American liberty. We call upon the people of this county to oppose the continued growth of a principle which might ultimately make all public institutions Roman Catholic in their character, and the United States a papal country subject to the pope at Rome.

To the Editor: I see by the morning paper that the Protestant clergymen of the city sign a protest against the incorporation of the Catholic Orphan Asylum and the payment of anything toward its support. Has not the Catholic as good right to a portion of the taxes to support his asylum as the Protestant? It would be all right with those Protestant clergymen if Catholic children were sent to the Protestant asylum to be educated in the Protestant faith. Is it not unkind in gentlemen professing to be ministers of the gospel to sign a document of this kind? Is it not inhuman in clergymen from whom would be expected more of brotherly toward those professing a different religious belief? It seems that the Catholic religion, especially the pope of Rome, to these gentlemen is a terrible nightmare.

Who in this city ever heard of that great and noble prelate, Dr. Brainard, being mixed up in any dirt of this sort?

Do these people ever think that the first man that ever landed on this continent was a Catholic? They will be the last to leave it. ADAM O'NEIL.

At a meeting of the Cayuga county supervisors, of which Mr. Ross is a member, last December, the following resolution was adopted, together with an amendment offered by Mr. Ross to include "all other legislation of a sectarian character, regardless of sect or denomination." The resolution was offered by Chauncey J. Wethey, supervisor from the town of Throop:

Resolved, I. That in the act of the legislature (Chapter 240 of 1875), amending Chapter 405 of 1878, by which magistrates are required to commit juvenil delinquents to a "reformatory or other institution," controled or governed by persons of the same religious faith as the parents of such delinquent; and in the requirements of said act, devolving upon boards of supervisors the duty of making proper provisions for carrying out such purpose, and providing for the payment to such "reformatory or other institution," of proper charges for the maintenance and board of such delinquents, by taxes drawn from the people of the county, we recognize a principle sought to be established, which is in conflict with the governmental policy and spirit of the constitution of this state, in this, that it seems to require and compel recognition and support by the state of sectarian institutions of a particular religious character, i.e., the Roman Catholic reformatory.

II. That the duty implied and enjoined in said acts of ascertaining and determining what is the "religious faith" of the persons who control and govern; and what, if any, is the "religious faith" of the "parents," or either of them, of the delinquent youth, is entirely impracticable.

III. That the people of this county, now here represented by us, their supervisors, are unwilling to commence, or enter upon, any system of recognizing and patronizing, by payments to its support, any Roman Catholic or other sectarian institution; and we call upon our members of the legislature to move for and promote the repeal of this act, as offensiv to our people, and contrary to the long-established policy of our government.

Our London Letter.

The archdeacon of London last Sunday in his sermon to the Socialists at St. Paul's cathedral gave his hearers but sorry comfort with the platitudes so common in the mouths of modern professing Christians. His statement that "when Christ said, 'The poor ye hav always with you,' he was declaring an inevitable law of human nature," met with general disapproval and cries of dissent. That passage is a great source of comfort to wealthy believers, and acts as a splendid salve to their consciences. It is an extremely fortunate thing that the "good book" contains so many satisfactory phrases of a similar nature, as it is much pleasanter to remember those than others of an opposit nature, and it is certainly true that the Bible so well commends itself to all classes and shades of opinion. In this respect, perhaps, there is no other book on an equal with it, and such a convenient collection of contradictions is undoubtedly a "light to the path and a lamp to the feet."

Socialism is certainly gaining considerable ground, but there is no immediate probability of any particular result therefrom, as the program is apparently so diverse, and the leaders are not fully united, and until there is a thorough unity and singleness of purpose, it will not be the power it aims to be.

The same may be also said of Freethought; so long as there are jealousies and enmities it will make but little headway, and would do well to take a lesson from the Jesuits in organization. While there are thousands in the land who hav cast theology overboard, they abstain from identifying themselvs with any Freethought society so long as they see dissensions in the camp, and it will take many years to present a sufficiently strong front to successfully oppose priestcraft. The opposition of the sects to each other is doing as much as aggressiv Freethought to overthrow the system.

The power of the Romish church over the people is well shown in Italy and the south of France at the present time. Although the church at Bajardo was thrown down by the earthquake shock, burying in its fall three hundred worshipers, yet the devotees are not convinced of the inefficacy of prayers and worship, but still go on calling upon the trinity and all the saints in the calendar to protect them. In time of danger the influences of early education will assert themselvs, and it is only by properly training children and keeping them from foolish superstitions that any real good can be effected, and until this is done on a largely increasing scale, the power of the priests will not be broken. ## The Eastern Knight to His Western Friends.

We often gaze over the "misty and mournful Atlantic" to try to discover how the aspirations that are so dear to ourself are firing the hearts of the descendants of the pilgrim fathers. And we take courage and heart of grace when we find that our battle lines are drawn up on two continents, with spears leveled for the charge and faces turned grimly to the foe. On both continents the banner of intellectual liberty streams athwart the welkin like an angry thunder-cloud. In vision, we behold the Forlorn Hope of the West march forward, the first rays of freedom's morning twilight shimmering on their spears and dancing on their plumes. The enemy outnumbers them by a hundred to one, but they dash their battle-axes against Christianity's ramparts, cemented with the blood and vitrified with the martyr-fires of well-nigh two thousand years. Might to the sword and the gallant arm, and toughness to the shield that defends the heroic hearts of the Ingersolls and the Washburns, the Macdonalds, the Mendums, the Seavers, the Underwoods, the Remsburgs, the Reynoldses, the Putnams, and all the shining phalanx of liberty's paladins as they toil in the vanguard of the manhood of the world.

The Western Hemisphere has no harder worker in our cause than Samuel Putnam. All last year he worked as few men can work, and when he found that the society with which he was connected had only an indifferent exchequer, he gave up his claim to the salary which he had earned so well. This is the kind of man to place in the breach to defend the flag of our movement. Better one man like this than fifty common John Smiths, who, before they will work, make careful calculations as to how they will be paid. Money will pay for the work of the hack, but it will never pay for the work of the poet and the enthusiast. Is Samuel Putnam a poet? Judge ye. Here are the concluding lines of his ode to "The Statue of Liberty and Thomas Paine," which were read at the New England Freethinkers' Convention:

Our noble PAINE—without his voice, his pen, his "Rights of Man,"
Thy form superb would not to-day defy the tyrant's ban;
O'er land, o'er sea, thy coronal would not in joy outray—
It was our hero's mighty thought that gave thee this glad day.

Unlaureled still because he taught that liberty is light;
That reason is man's noblest power—the morning to thy night;
That king and priest are both alike the foes of human weal,
That righteous liberty will not to God nor tyrants kneel.

Fling out thy voice, O Statue! let thy dumb lips proclaim
To ignorance and prejudice our hero's deathless name;
Speak forth the truth, O Liberty! speak justice to mankind,
And let the heedless multitude the world's true saviors find.

In thy silence, scorn the servers of the creeds that should be dead;
In thy glory, teach us courage in life's forward ways to tread;
Teach the truth forever beaming with new luster and new gain,
And in thy scroll of honor write the name of THOMAS PAINE!

Unite, as in the case of Putnam, a faculty for affairs propelled by the white-heat impetus of the poet's soul, and you hav a combination which the world sees all too seldom.

The Chicago Congregationalists' Infamous Action.

A dispatch to the New York Sun of March 9th is as follows:

Commenting on a failure of the Congregational ministers to adopt unanimously a resolution to send a telegram of condolence to Mrs. Beecher at their meeting yesterday, the Times says:

Alas for the rarity of Christian charity! At the weekly meeting of the Congregational ministers of Chicago yesterday a resolution of condolence with Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher was offered. Strange to say, the resolution produced a "heated and bitter discussion," and developed so much opposition that it was finally withdrawn by the mover. The proposed tender of sympathy was objected to on two grounds—that it might be construed as an indorsement of Mr. Beecher's theological views, and that the dying divine had never fully cleared himself of the charges of immorality brought by Theodore Tilton. The doctrinal objections, however, seemed to carry the most weight, and it was evident that, while the brethren were ready to forgiv Mr. Beecher for any lapses from virtue of which he may hav been guilty, they could not find it in their hearts to overlook his lapses from orthodoxy. The action of these Congregational clergymen displays a spirit of narrowness and intolerance which it was hoped had vanished forever from the Protestant pulpit of America. Those who can conceive of Henry Ward Beecher withholding his sympathy, under like circumstances, from the wife of a dying fellow-clergyman may be able to discover some justification for this pitiful exhibition of clerical bigotry, but no others can. It has been supposed that even "Christians" ceased hating each other at the grave; but it would appear from yesterday's proceedings of the Congregational preachers of Chicago that such is not always the case.

The Inter-Ocean says:

The discussion over the resolution of sympathy to Mrs. Beecher at the meeting of Congregational ministers yesterday was worse than unfortunate—it was in many of its phases simply disgraceful. Those who opposed the resolution, which simply tendered the sympathy of the Congregational ministers of Chicago to a woman hanging over the death-bed of her husband, and that husband the greatest preacher of the Congregational church, based their opposition on the theory that some people might construe this expression of sympathy into an indorsement of Mr. Beecher's theological views. . . . What a comment on the action of the Congregationalists was the action of the Methodist ministers, who, at about the same time, adopted by unanimous vote, and without discussion, a resolution tendering their sympathy to Mrs. Beecher!

Those who opposed the resolution took a great risk. Granted that their motivs were good, still they made a mistake, which, in the light of the possible effects, was almost a crime. The blood of millions will boil over this insult to the memory of a man who has been a tremendous force in our civilization, who has done so much, not only for his own church, but for Christianity, and among all those interested in extending the influence of the church there will be keen regret over the unfortunate incident at the meeting of the Congregational ministers yesterday. . . . As the case stands, the man whose sermons and whose work hav done more for Congregationalism than any other has received a blow that will hurt those who are near to him for all time.

The Connecticut Christians.

The Connecticut legislature has passed a law prohibiting the running of trains in that state between the hours of 10 A.M. and 3 P.M. on Sundays. The new law affords a splendid opportunity for the constitutional lawyers.

The United States Supreme Court has decided that a state cannot impose any restrictions upon transportation of freight or passengers across state lines without usurping a power exclusivly vested in Congress by the Constitution. The state may not regulate, even within its own borders, traffic on its way from or to another state. That is interstate commerce, and Congress alone has the right to legislate concerning it.

Connecticut can prevent the running of those trains which start and stop within her borders, but that number is few.

What a pity it is that the Christians cannot control the actions of everybody! They are such a moral lot—so kind, so charitable, so humane!

The Pope as a Politician.

In a very recent number of a Congregational journal published in this city there is a contribution by a Catholic layman of unusual clearness of vision. The subject is as old as the papacy, and will never be without interest until the papacy is no more. The subject is "The Pope in Politics."

The layman finds, what we hav been dinning into the ears of the people whenever we could, that the power of the pope in politics is not only immense and activly exerted, but a power to be reckoned with immediately. Ireland and Germany are illustrations. "It was," says our layman, "the nicest touch of a balance when the holy father had to decide between English political influence and Irish support of the Catholic church. The Irish bishops held the fort. They were very determined and very outspoken. That is matter of history; and so the holy see took the part of Ireland just so far as to maintain a neutral policy. It is true that Irish Catholics hav submitted to their ecclesiastical superiors as no other nationality ever has done, and that English Catholics submit to their bishops just in exact proportion as their bishops submit to them." In Germany the pope, too, has played his supporters false. For years Bismarck has oppressed the Catholics of Germany, and they hav been urged from Rome in every term of entreaty and affection to stand true to their faith and their "holy father." Herr Windthorst was their leader, and he was supported by the church and by the pope so long as it suited the latter's purposes. But to-day, Bismarck is courted and honored by the head of the church, while Windthorst receives "with scant courtesy an advice amounting to an order to change his whole policy and submit to the dictates of the man whom he has so long considered not only his personal enemy but the enemy of the ecclesiastical superior who has uttered this strange mandate." It is Germany to-day; to-morrow, admits the layman, it may be America. Supposing, he says, "that the United States and Canada had a difference of opinion on, say, the fishery question; that England took the part of Canada, as she is bound to do; and that the supposed interests of the holy see threw the balance of her power into the scale. What would be the result? American Catholics would be 'requested' not to take any part against England. We should hav the very same policy enacted in the United States as that which is now being enacted in Germany."

With these two recent examples of the machinations of the Vatican before them, the people of this country should be on their guard. But it is safe to wager a hundred to one that the people will not. The church will get the usual donations and exemptions, and this policy will be continued till the papacy is too powerful here to be resisted. Then the religionists who fill our jails, asylums, hospitals, and courts will hav their own way, and the pope in Rome will possess more real power than the president in Washington.

Repeal the "Comstock" Laws.

The injustice of the case of John A. Wilson, sentenced to two years in prison and fined five hundred dollars for sending Balzac's "Droll Stories" by mail to a customer, cries eloquently for the repeal of the statute which allows such infamies to be perpetrated.

The proceeding was a case of railroading at the instance of Anthony Comstock. The judge, in the presence of the jury, reached down from the bench, shook hands with Comstock, and appeared overjoyed to be able to help him. All through the trial the judge was against the accused, and his charge was marked by unjudicial bias. No evidence that the book was reputable, nor that all booksellers handle it, was allowed, and the jury retired for deliberation without looking at the book. Two of the jurymen hav since said that they convicted upon the judge's charge, expecting that the sentence would be only a light fine.

The people of Paulsborough, N. J., declare the verdict and sentence to be an outrage, and propose getting up a petition to President Cleveland, stating the facts, and asking him to investigate the conduct of the court, and to extend a pardon to Mr. Wilson.

The Kansas Supreme Court Decision in the Walker Case.

In considering this case last October we showed plainly that Mr. Walker and Miss Harman were legally married, and that any punishment inflicted upon them could not be for illegal cohabitation, but must be for not complying with the statutes relating to marriage. This position has been sustained by the Supreme Court of Kansas in the decision handed down on the 5th instant. The clerk of the court writes to Mr. Harman as follows:

"The 'autonomistic marriage' is declared illegal. The judgment of the District Court of Jefferson county, and the conviction of E. C. Walker and Lillian Harman, affirmed.

"On September 19, 1886, E. C. Walker and Lillian Harman entered into what they called an 'autonomistic marriage,' at the house of Moses Harman, the father of Lillian, at Valley Falls, in Jefferson county.

"They refused to take out any marriage license, and also refused to hav any person authorized by law perform any marriage ceremony. Soon afterward they were arrested for the violation of the provision of the law regarding marriage, and subsequently tried and convicted. E. C. Walker was sentenced to the jail of Jefferson county for a period of seventy-five days, and Lillian Harman was sentenced for forty-five days. They were required to pay all the costs of the prosecution. The time of imprisonment of the parties has expired, but they are still in jail on account of their failure to pay the costs. From the judgment and sentence of the District Court they appealed to the Supreme Court of the state. On yesterday the opinion of the court was handed down, affirming the judgment of the District Court. The principal opinion in the csse was written by Mr. Justice Johnson. The court declares the legislature has the power to prescribe reasonable regulations relating to marriage, and that punishment may be inflicted upon those who enter the marriage relation in disregard of the prescribed statutory requirements."

A syllabus of the decision, prepared by the clerk, reads:

"1. The mutual present assent to immediate marriage by persons capable of assuming that relation is sufficient to constitute marriage at common law, and such a marriage will be sustained in this state where its validity is directly drawn in question.

"2. The legislature has full power, not to prohibit, but to prescribe reasonable regulations relating to marriage, and a provision prescribing penalties against those who solemnize or contract marriage contrary to statutory command is within legislativ authority.

"3. Punishment may be inflicted upon those who enter the marriage relation in disregard of the prescribed statutory requirements without rendering the marriage itself void.

"4. Under Section 12 of the marriage act, all persons who enter the marriage relation, and liv together as man and wife without complying with the conditions and regulations of the act, are guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to the punishment imposed by that section.

"All the justices concurring. C. J. BROWN,
"Clerk Supreme Court."

Chief-Justice Horton also filed a concurring opinion, in which he affirmed three important points. "If Lillian Harman," he says, "desires to retain her own name, I can perceive no objection to her doing so. A married woman has the same control of her person and property as her husband. The wife does not merge her individuality as a legal person in that of her husband." He also narrows the case to a sharp point by deciding:

"Upon the record, as presentcd to us, the question in my opinion for consideration is not whether Edwin Walker and Lillian Harman are married, but whether in marrying, or rather in living together as man and wife, they hav observed the statutory requirements.

"My construction of these provisions is that a ceremonial marriage must be celebrated in conformity therewith, and that any persons living together as man and wife without being married according to these directions are liable to the penalty thereof. I do not say, nor do I intend to intimate, that a 'consensual marriage' is not valid, but the legislature has the right to require parties assuming the marriage relation to hav the marriage entered into publicly, and a record made of the same. This I think the purpose of the statutory regulations."

The statute under which the imprisonment is declared legal is as follows:

"Any persons living together as man and wife within this state without being married shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined in a sum not less than five hundred nor more than one thousand dollars, or be imprisoned in the county jail not less than thirty days, nor more than three months."

The decision, then, amounts to this: Marriage is a civil contract, valid and binding when entered into by consenting parties. But those entering into marriage without complying with the statutory regulations may be punished. The judges, it seems, care more for the mint and cumin of law than for the weightier matter of morality.

As for the Walkers, now, the only question is, Will they submit to the state? Being Anarchists, they hold that the state has no rightful control over their actions, and no rightful power to enact rules, compliance with which is enforced. But until the majority of the people of Kansas adopt their view, they will suffer less personal inconvenience by complying with a law they cannot repeal. They are willing to be married legally if the ceremony can be of their own choosing, and as the object of the autonomistic marriage was to secure Lillian Harman her personal rights, and as these hav been granted by the decision of Judge Horton, there would seem to be no further need of exercising their autonomistic rights in this matter. Indeed, we never could see why Mr. Walker should need to enter into a contract not to abuse Miss Harman, for if either one of the parties felt the necessity of such a bargain they should not hav married. In the relation of marriage a true husband is superior to the brutal laws made in the biblical days—and retained on the statute books because they were supposed to be of divine origin—when woman was regarded as property, and man was nearer the beast than he now is.

The gist of the Walker-Harman case is this:

1. The contracting parties first intended to assume the relation in such a manner that if either felt dissatisfied they could separate without resorting to the divorce courts.

2. When this contract was found to be a county-jail affair, they claimed their ccmmon law right to legally marry by a simple contract.

3. The courts hav decided that such marriage is valid, but illegal, and its illegality is punishable, though the marriage may not be annulled except through the proper channels, and for the proper cause.

4. The parties are punished, not for cohabiting, for they are man and wife, but because they married without employing some person empowered by law to celebrate marriages.

5. The dispute, therefore, is now between Mr. Walker and Miss Harman on the one side, and the state of Kansas on the other. Hav the people of Kansas a right to make rules governing their own conduct, and to enforce them. Under the Constitution of the United States they undoubtedly hav. If they choose to make marriage a matter of public record, they can do it as legally as they can make the transfer of real estate a matter of public record. Common law obtains only where there is no statute.

Whether the Kansas law is wise or foolish is a question of opinion. A believer in the supremacy of society over the individual will say it is good. Those who contend that the individual's rights are superior to society's will condemn it.

Improved Relations.

In a recent dispatch to this country, the German minister on ecclesiastical affairs is quoted as saying that the relations between church and state in Germany had greatly improved, though the government at present could not hope to establish complete religious peace.

Just so. Bismarck made a bargain with the pope. For Catholic votes in support of his bill to increase the army Bismarck will allow curates to be appointed without consulting state officials, and he will also restore religious orders whose members devote themselvs to educating girls. In other words, he will restore convents and convent schools. Therefore, and because of this bargain, the relations of church and state are greatly improved!

But why should not complete religious peace be established between the Protestant and Catholic sects? Christ, we hav understood, was the Prince of Peace. Perhaps, however, the sects do not worship that side of his character.

Strip Comstock of His Power.

Last summer Anthony Comstock made a great fuss over the pool-selling at the race courses on Long Island. He said that the Brooklyn district-attorney, Mr. Ridgway, was bribed not to prosecute.

A legislativ committee is now examining the affairs of Brooklyn, and the matter of pool-selling is being looked into. Last Saturday District-Attorney Ridgway was on the stand, telling what he knows about it. One case recalled showed, he thought, conclusivly that Comstock's men were blackmailers. There were two McDougalls on the island selling pools. Anthony Comstock's men entered a complaint against one McDougall for gambling. The case was taken before the grand jury, and on the testimony of two of Comstock's men an indictment was found. But as the complaining witnesses could not agree or could not giv the name, the indictment was made against "John T. McDougall, alias Dougall McDougall, or Dougall McDougall alias John T. McDougall," so that the right man could be held either way. McDougall was arrested, and he responded to the indictment, giving bail for his appearance for trial. Just before the time set for trial, McDougall's attorney called on the witness and said it would be of no use to call the case, as it had been settled. Mr. Ridgway asked how it had been settled, and the attorney said that Comstock's men had been to see McDougall, and they were satisfied that he was the wrong man. Mr. Ridgway said he was indignant at the manifest blackmailing that had been practiced, and he insisted that the case should go on, and it did. The complaining witnesses from Comstock's office were put upon the stand, but they testified directly contrary to what they had done before the grand jury, and the man was acquitted.

There are about two thousand good and valid reasons why Anthony Comstock's society should hav its charter repealed. The story told by District-Attorney Ridgway is a good basis for at least one of these reasons.

Editorial Notes.

THE Rev. Justin D. Fulton, Baptist, of Brooklyn, has resigned the pastorate of the Centennial church to engage in the work of converting Roman Catholics. He will go West, taking with him some reformed Papists. Mr. Fulton's zeal for the welfare of the Catholics arises, it is said, from a lack of appreciation of Mr. Fulton by Mr. Fulton's congregation.

HERE is Henry George's latest statement of his land theory. The oftener he states it, the more difficult of comprehension it appears to become. He says:

"I hav never asserted that the land belongs to all men. Rather, I believe it belongs to God, and that men are his children to tenant this wor d for a little while. I do not think that the earth should be divided between men, for an equal division of land is impossible."

If in the evolution of ideas the notion now accepted by many should be reached by all, namely, that there is no God, as the word is generally understood, what would become of this theory? We are not especially enamored of Mr. George's ideas, but we are willing to spare the space to assure him that all theories having a theological basis are just as sure to be exploded by intelligence as darkness is to disappear when the sun rises.

A RELIGIOUS paper of England, the Christian Million, has come forward with a proposal for the queen's subjects to giv that lady a jubilee present of a Bible, the lettering of which will be entirely formed of jewels! The cost will be only £3,586,489, which can easily be subscribed by each person over whom the queen graciously condescends to rule contributing threepence. The Christian Socialist calls the editor of the Christian Million the Supreme Flunky.

WE congratulate the amiable son of the publisher of the Boston Investigator, Mr. Ernest Mendum, upon the happy event which took place in his career on Wednesday, the 9th instant, at the home of Miss Isabel Crowell, in West Yarmouth. And we beg leave, though unacquainted with the bride, to assure Miss Crowell that she obtained a good husband. We must also compliment Justice of the Peace L. K. Washburn for the felicitous manner in which he celebrated the contract. It is said that his remarks upon matrimony were of great and permanent value.

SOME thieves broke into St. Stephen's church last week and stole the golden ciborium, six silver chalices, and several smaller pieces of plate, valued altogether at several thousand dollars. The ciborium is a bread-dish, in this case used for holding the sacramental "body of Christ." We are very sorry for the priests of St. Stephen's, but what in the world are they doing with thousands of dollars' worth of gold and silver stuff in their strong box when scores of their parishioners are scarcely above starving point? Raw corn, eaten from his hand, once afforded Jesus a meal, and why should his servants eat from gold and drink from silver?

THE Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott, editor of the Independent, is a gentleman of wondrous resource in sustaining his religion. On a late Sunday he occupied the pulpit of Plymouth church, and during his discourse, the subject of which naturally was Henry Ward Beecher, he claimed that religion had freed the slaves, promoted temperance, sent the boodle aldermen to prison, overthrown political machines, ordained "the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man," harmonized the relations of labor and capital, besides affording to the human race spiritual blessings too numerous to mention. The churches should vote Dr. Abbott a substantial pension to reward his capacity of invention.

G. H. MULLEN, school superintendent of Delaware county, Iowa, has issued the following order to a director of a school under his control: "The teaching of catechism by a public school teacher in a schoolhouse erected, equipped, and maintained at public expense is contrary to law, although done before nine o'clock in the morning or after four o'clock on a school-day. You will, therefore, as a sub-director, see to it that such illegal teaching is discontinued at once. Our public schools must be freed from sectarian and religious bias." The order givs great offense to the Catholics of the school district, who hav heretofore obtained the services of a public school teacher to instruct the children in the catechism

THE legislature of Michigan proposes to submit to the people an amendment to the constitution of the state prohibiting the manufacture, sale, or gift of spirituous, malt, or vinous liquors, except for medicinal, mechanical, chemical, or scientific purposes. The religious papers claim that such a prohibition would violate that clause in the present constitution which says "that the legislature shall pass no law to prevent any person from worshiping almighty God according to the dictates of his conscience." The claim is based on the desire of the churches to hav wine for sacramental purposes. Unless the church communicants can drink the blood of Christ they hold that their religious rights are infringed. But supposing the members of some sect should demand a quart of whisky per diem for each individual, to conscientiously worship almighty God with, what would the religious folks say then?

THE Tennessee legislature has passed a "Barber's bill," making it a misdemeanor to do barbering on Sunday. The bill was passed by a vote of 26 to 4. The bill provides that it shall be a misdemeanor to engage in the business of a barber, to shave, shampoo, cut hair, or keep open bath-rooms on Sunday. The penalty is a fine of not less than ten nor more than fifty dollars, or imprisonment in jail not less than five nor more than thirty days, both or either, at the discretion of the court. A Chattanooga barber who is dissatisfied with the law wants the legislators to tell him when Sunday comes. "If," he says, "a man with a perfect timepiece starts west from Chattanooga, when he has gone one degree he finds his time four minutes fast, when he has gone fifteen he finds he has gained one hour, when he has traveled one hundred and eighty he has gained twelve hours, and when he has come around again to the meridian of Chattanooga he has gained a whole day, and lost a day of the week. Then let him turn around and make an eastern circuit. When he has gone ninety degrees he has lost six hours, one hundred and eighty he has lost twelve hours, and when he gets to Chattanooga again he has lost a whole day of the week. Now, again, we will suppose a man in California desires on Saturday evening to send a telegram to a friend in Liverpool. 'Hold,' says the Sabbatical English operator, 'we don't do business on Sundays.' On Monday morning the Liverpool operator is ready for business. 'Hold,' says the Californian, 'we don't do business on Sunday.' Again, a wholesale merchant in London desires to instruct his agent in India. 'Hold,' says the India Sabbatarian, 'we don't do business on Sundays;' but when next day the agent wishes to correspond with his employer, 'Hold,' says the London Sabbatarian, 'we don't do business on Sunday.'" Since the earth is the Lord's, and it grieves him to see man break his Sabbath, the Chattanooga barber thinks Sunday laws are of not much use unless the sun can shine on all sides of the globe at once.

MR. J. M. BUCKLEY, a notorious Christian speaker, who loses no opportunity to attack Freethought, writing in a Christian paper, says:

"Mr. Samuel P. Putnam, a notorious Infidel speaker, who loses no opportunity to attack Christianity, writing to an Infidel paper, says: 'I am now at the delightful home of Mr. ——, a vigorous Freethinker. . . . His wife and daughter are still Christians, but of so generous a spirit that if all were like them I should feel disposed to put my armor down. The Golden Rule would surely prevail.' This aside concession to the spirit of Christianity and the Golden Rule is not uncommon in the writings of Infidels. There is no reason to suppose that Mr. Putnam would lay his armor down. He simply in a fit of sentiment thought he would; perhaps, at the last analysis, he does not even think he would. The Jews crucified Christ; the conceited philosophers would not accept him. If Mr. Putnam searched for them, hundreds of both sexes could be found who illustrate the principles of Christ, and if none could be found, prayer and obedience would transform him into a true Christian. But for neither of those has he any taste."

The principles of the wife and daughter to whom Mr. Putnam paid the tribute of a generous nature are not the principles of Christ, but the principles of humanity. The Golden Rule is a good many hundred years older than the Christian religion. Christ, in a freak of good humor, repeated it; but the principles which are distinctivly the Nazarene's own run something like this: "If any man come unto me and hate not his father, mother, brother, sister, aye, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple. Except ye believe and are baptized ye cannot be saved. He that believeth not shall be damned." The sentiment of these is widely different from the sentiment of the Golden Rule.

THE Rev. J. S. Fall, of Minneapolis, recently read a paper before the Liberal ministers' association of his city, in which he said some things rather unpalatable to the brethren: "Each denomination in our city differs. No two of them agree. They deny each other fellowship at communion, a circumstance that has been common with each and all until recent years. It changes according to circumstances, education, and prejudice, and, chameleon-like, it takes color from that to which it is attached. It is obtained through as many different modes as there are denominations, but generally through the manipulations of some officiating minister or mountebank. For this purpose we hav in our midst the Salvation Army. For this purpose the Exposition building is to be secured by Sam Jones as captain of the 'Minneapolis clerical hosts,' who, by such act, admit their own worthlessness, where he will dispense doctrins as old as Zoroaster and more devilish than any that preceded it; doctrins championed by one of our loud little ministers a few weeks since in the language of the 'fear of hell,' the hangman's whip to keep the wretch in order, through which means, doubtless, numbers in the community will claim they hav got religion, until the several denominations hav become like the several kings of England, who, when they found their ranks depleted by death and desertion, would send out their press-gang, whose business it was, with guile and force, to apprehend the unwary. The church secures and sustains and uses about the same course, only using different instrumentalities. They intoxicate their victim with excitement, and by appeals to their fears allow themselvs to be twofold more the child of hell than before. Investigation will prove that a large number of criminals, defaulters in high places, and those who proved of the worst morals, belong to the class who claim they hav 'got religion.'"

LECTURING at Binghamton, N. Y., recently, the Rev. Wm. Butler, Methodist missionary to Mexico, revealed some religious secrets. Mexico, he said, "is now more degraded than it was three hundred and forty years ago. When Cortez conquered the land he divided it up among his followers, and the Aztec inhabitants were made slaves. For three hundred years these poor people did not own a home or hav an interest in the soil of their own country. Cortez also instituted the ecclesiastical system which has been the curse of the country. One-half of the lands and property of the country was drawn into the possession of the church, and could not be taxed for any purpose until the power of the priests was overthrown. During the last fifty-eight years Mexico has had fifty-three rulers. Leaving off the last three rulers, whose aggregate terms of office amount to seventeen years, we see that in forty-one years she had fifty rulers. That is, at an average interval of about nine months, a conflict would arise, and a change of rulers would be made. When Maximilian was made emperor of Mexico, Pope Pius IX. promised the blessings of God on the enterprise, and perpetuity to the new dynasty. For a time it looked as though his words would prove true. Our government was struggling with the South, and President Lincoln was compelled to refuse aid to the little band of republicans who were fighting against hope rather than acknowledge Maximilian as emperor. After the surrender of Lee, Lincoln directed Seward to write to France and remind them of the meaning of the Monroe doctrin. His language was courteous, but its meaning was, 'Get out of Mexico,' and the French troops were immediately withdrawn, and a republican form of government reinstated. The Mexican Congress has demanded and obtained the expulsion of the Jesuits, and their cathedrals are now being put in use for our missions. Even in our lifetime these men hav been guilty of all the wickedness of the old Inquisition of Rome. Whoever refused to bend conscience to the will of these inquisitors was placed in a narrow cell and the entrance bricked up. This building was given up to the people one day, and its horrors discovered."

Letters from Friends.

SAN JACINTO, CAL., FEB. 13, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: As money is not so plenty as to be picked up on the streets at will, I hav to wait till I can find it, and as I was a rebel-hunter during the Rebellion I am consequently so much behind financially that I am compelled to enforce loans sometimes. Last year I clubbed with a seeker after truth, and he in turn sends in several more names as subscribers. I was a soldier three and a half years, hav a wife and three children, and am disabled from earning a living at my trade as carpenter. You will therefore excuse my delinquency in this case.

GREELEY, COL., March 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 for one years' subscription to your paper.

S. P. Putnam arrived here Saturday last. Quite a goodly number of the friends gathered at the residence of Mrs. E. C. Stilwells, to welcome him to our little city once more. We had a very pleasant time—speeches, songs, etc. On Sunday evening the Unitarian Hall was crowded to its utmost seating capacity, and many standing, to listen to "The New God." Last August he gave us "The New Heaven and Earth," and now we hav "The New God" to rule "The New Heaven and Earth." It was a splendid effort, and delivered in that happy vein so peculiar to Putnam. S. P. Putnam is a splendid specimen of manhood, so frank and open in all his ways, upon the platform and in private, and he improves upon acquaintance. Some of the more orthodox, who heard him last summer, and thought him rather radical, heard him last night in a more radical lecture than "The New Heaven and Earth," and thought him just the man for the Freethought propaganda work. I hope he will return East by this route, and visit Greeley again.

J. W. LEIGHTON.

GOSPER COUNTY, NEB., Feb. 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I never see anything in THE TRUTH SEEKER from this section of the universe, and I wish to hav you continue the paper. There are a good many Liberals out on the prairies of Nebraska who do not support a Liberal paper. The general complaint is hard times, high prices, etc., when asked to subscribe. We hav had a lyceum for the past two months; could not get the believers in inspiration to tackle a religious subject. Mr. G. Lewis, one of our fearless, outspoken Freethinkers, takes the Investigator. We exchange every week; and, take both together, they fill the bill. With the illustrations, we are able to take care of any revival of religion in our district.

We hav one or two rigid orthodox neighbors, who can't be induced to read one of these papers. The young folks like to look at Mr. Heston's engravings, and I don't think they will ever join the church. They most generally start a lively conversation, to say the least. I always like to read the "Letters from Friends." They are quite diversified, and come from all sections of the country. I sometimes think that with the amount of advice, warnings, and suggestions you get, there is no lack of editors in the Liberal ranks. With regards to THE TRUTH SEEKER folks, believing that our cause is based on the rock of science, truth, and justice,

H. OLMSTEAD.

EUBANKS, KY., Feb. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: It seems to my mind that there are principles underlying the subject of theology which seem to escape the line of investigation. Theism or Atheism should be first established. If there be a God, then settle all questions of religion accordingly. If there be no God, then all systems of religion fall alike. If it be decided there is a supreme being at all, then the question of the Bible should be discussed. In the discussion of the claims of the Bible, my opinion is that man's physical organization should be considered and the difference between intuitiv convictions and moral reasoning properly canvassed. There is such a thing as credible testimony in the world, and rules whereby its claims are established. After hearing the testimony for the divinity of the Bible, I then think its internal merits would be in order. If we admit there is a supreme being, we hav a right to examin the Bible in the light of his natural character and our knowledge of justice and mercy. In this examination, we admit there are some things sustained in the Bible that are contrary to our finite knowledge of mercy and justice. In our mode of thought, we hav canvassed these matters in two ways. First, our imperfect knowledge of design as portrayed in this world of death. Taking creation as an objectiv element of divine wisdom, pain and death is its finality. Second, the relation we observe in the process of moral, intellectual, and physical development. We find in the Bible a moral development and a system. We find types, legal, prophetic, and historic, culminating into a system, called the gospel of Jesus Christ, or Christianity.

DR. W. BAKER.

INGALLS, KAN., Feb. 23, E.M. 287.

MR. EDITOR: I hav lived here ten years; hav always been an outspoken Freethinker. I think I was the first man who ever took THE TRUTH SEEKER in this county.

And I want to say to all the friends of Freethought: If you love the cause, honor it and its noble heroes by being honest, temperate men and women, slow to anger, and having charity for the shortcomings of others, and in course of time people will begin to doubt what the pulpit monkey tells them about Infidels.

I was digging a well yesterday, and came in to dinner all mud and clay, and a Jesusite asked me what was the matter. I told him I had just been taken from the mire and the clay. I showed him all the nice pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and tried to get him to take it. It was no go; but I herein send you the money for three new subscribers, and I think I will send you two more in a month.

I think you made the right move on the Anarchist question. But I think Powderly is the right man in the right place, for this reason: If he were an Infidel, the Christian world would never join the order, for fear he would lead them to hell or hades; if he were a Protestant, the Catholics would not join, for they look upon a Protestant as worse than an Infidel, and as one who will never be saved, but the Protestants believe that lots of Catholics are saved, and recognize them as Christians; while every Infidel ought to know that a man with the brains that Powderly has, no matter what he may say or how often he may attend mass and go to church, does not believe in the balderdash and theological slush that he hears from the pulpit. The Catholic Knights of Labor, I believe, think as much of Powderly as they do of the pope, and the pope knows it, and that is why he dares not do in America what he has done in Canada.

A. BUTTERFIELD.

RACINE, WIS., Feb. 7, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER very much, and I am glad every time it appears. I inclose $1 to pay for my subscription, and when the spring comes I will be able to send you more money.

I would like to do something for your paper and for the cause of liberty. There are a good many Freethinkers here in Racine, but there is not much talk about religion. What the talk is about is politics and Knight of Labor movements, and few know what others think about God, heaven, and hell. Our politicians dare not speak about church taxation or against the church, for fear of losing their influence, so the church-members are on top of almost everything. I would like to hav some one come around and giv a lecture, to wake up the population in Racine. Last year I was trying to do something for Mr. Remsburg, but could only get promis of about $15, and that was only half the expenses, so I gave it up that time, but I can try again.

J. P. BRUDHAHL.

ST. CATHERINE'S, ONT., Feb. 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: What can I say to encourage you in your well-doing? If I say your paper is good, and still improving, and that I should feel out of sorts did a copy of it not come to me weekly to take the place of church attendance, old and stale, I would only be repeating what everybody else says who has read it understandingly, even for six months only. The articles which appear in it weekly are all good (for something), and it indicates weakness in anyone to dogmatically take exception to others' views because they don't coincide with their own. Variety is the spice of everything, and opens up the way for thought and candid discussion. The Indian said he was glad everybody did not see alike, for if they did everybody would want his squaw. This would be a queer world if everybody and everything were alike, for there would be nothing to descant upon. The cartoons are all good and suggestiv, and John Peck is a host, and givs full and running-over measure every time. His disquisition, when finished, should be collected and reprinted. It would make a valuable missionary document, and add one more to the list of tracts. "News and Notes" are interesting every time, and thy editorials are well worth the subscription. Also, "Letters from Friends" are interesting and entertaining, giving, as they do, a variety of views and opinions for thought and study. Next comes the "Children's Corner," which is a fine acquisition; even the juvenil contributions are interesting.

In short, to sum up in full, were I addicted to praying, my first prayer would be that every man, woman, and child who can read should be possessed of a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER for weekly perusal.

C. B. THOMPSON.

ANAHEIM, CAL., Feb. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: After reading in THE TRUTH SEEKER the letter from D. Higbie, M.D., in regard to extravagance of funerals, I will giv my experience in this section. In 1877 I became acquainted with Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Clark, very intelligent, respectable Spiritualists. It was always a pleasure to exchange ideas. In 1884 she was taken ill. On a visit at that time she said do not think she ever ge we.; and as I do not believe in making a display, or patronizing the priests; now will you officiate at my death, as you need a certificate from the R.-P. society?" I felt it my duty to do so. She died Nov. 19, 1886, just seventy years and four days old. They telegraphed for me to come, but just four days before I was run over in the streets of Los Angeles; so I had to notify Mr. Clark of my accident—three ribs broken—and consequently he postponed the meeting, buried as she requested, with plain coffin painted white, friends placing beautiful flowers thereon. Jan. 9, 1887, he called together friends and neighbors, and I fulfilled my promis, a granddaughter playing, "The Three Angel Visitants" to open, spirit rappings to close, which called forth the gratitude of the family and friends. No charges to pay. By so doing we can create a public sentiment that will look upon death as natural as life, and as beautiful. My request to my heirs, assigns, and friends that outliv me is, cremate my body when I get through with it, with no one to tell God what he ought to do with my "never-dying soul," provided I hav one.

I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 22d that S. P. Putnam is to be at Los Angeles March 13th. Friend Putnam, you are not giving yourself time enough to this needy section. We will welcome you at Anaheim. Honestly, I feel about as Ella E. Gibson does in regard to "The New God"—"I am so disgusted with everybody's God (but mine), that it don't seem necessary for any new one." But, no doubt, yours will be a great, grand improvement on the Bible Lord God Jehovah. Remember that "nature never nods, nor leaves her work to God." True, "the only cause is nature's laws."

Ere this reaches you, or I know how C. B. Reynolds's trial will go at New Jersey, I must urge our brave brother and wife to talk up their bed and walk this way (tent, too). This is just the best climate for grove or tent-meetings, from April till November, and it is my honest opinion that they will rouse those who are resting in superstition, and make well financially. Liberals of all classes need help on this coast to start the train of progressiv ideas, and a chance to form each other's acquaintance. Isolated Freethinkers are lonely, and but for the feast each week that THE TRUTH SEEKER brings us, we should die mentally. Long may its pages greet the world, with its motto, "Universal Mental Liberty!"

MRS. KATE PARKER.

ELMWOOD, ILL., March 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Robert G. Ingersoll, who lived many years in this neighborhood, has many fervent disciples around here. One of the oldest and foremost is Dr. Fountain Watkins, who has been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER from its very start, but who, being nearly eighty years of age, owing to his feeble eyesight, can't read the foremost Liberal paper any more, for which he feels very sorry, as THE TRUTH SEEKER has been for so many years his best company. The old gentleman warmly recommends the paper to all searchers for religious and other intellectual light. He hopes that its circulation will be increased a hundred-fold; that Brothers Putnam, Remsburg, Reynolds, York, and all the other warriors against hypocrits, the devil, and the other seven plagues of churchism, will not be weary in well-doing. Dr. Watkins nursed, doctored, and healed hundreds of afflicted free of charge, and might hav collected not less than $50,000 from his patients, if he had charged for his services, as is done by the wearers of the college sheepskins. Dr. Watkins was a prominent worker in the antislavery crusade, and scores of runaway negroes owed their liberty to his kindness.

He belonged long enough to the church to become practically acquainted with the mockeries, delusions, and general "cussedness," to leave it and fight its superstitions for the last thirty years. He well remembers how the preachers used to slander the abolitionists for trying to abolish the God-ordained institution of slavery, and how they swung around as soon as it became popular to call the negro a man and brother.

Dr. Watkins generally is for justice and right, even if he is in the minority. He has been fighting orthodoxy with impregnable arguments, whose sound logical foundation could not be overcome by the often wrathy clergy. He has likewise been a consistent champion of the common people's downtrodden political rights. He has opposed the national banking system from the start, and doesn't like to hav lawyers, tricksters, preachers, and other slick-tongued rascals fill the offices. Dr. Watkins predicts "terrible convulsions in this once glorious land, if the people don't attend to their politics, morals, and religion themselvs," instead of having them attended to by professionals. He thinks that reason and justice should rule, so that rascality, corruption, and dynamite can't ruin.

Rev. Royce, who officiated as pastor of the Elmwood Congregational church for nearly seven years, had to resign on account of his liberal views. He was charged by two hide-bound deacons with having sometimes read THE TRUTH SEEKER; with having associated with Infidels like Dr. Watkins; with having helped needy non-church-members, and with not preaching regular hell-fire.

The church business is going away down below par in this neighborhood, and Dr. Watkins is proud of having done his little share in demolishing the sectarian idols, and hopes to liv long enough to hear of well-organized Liberal societies all over the land. He has been greatly delighted with the masterly productions of the Missouri artist, Watson Heston, and wishes to that gentleman good health, sufficient worldly goods, and a long life.

R. D. ROWE.

FORT WASHAKIE, WYO. TERR., March 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Having become located again I will again hav THE TRUTH SEEKER sent to me. Inclosed find $5, which please credit me with. I also inclose a few of the conclusions to which I hav come after much thinking on the subjects which concern the welfare of my fellow-beings, and which presents to every thinking mind the three great problems, Whence? What for and Whither?

1. A man who does not know that a baby born to-day would, if left to the guidance of its own instincts, develop into the same superstitious brute that one born five thousand years ago would hav developed into under the same circumstances, is incapable of fulfilling the duties of a legislator.

2. In making this statement I hav purposely ignored that factor of infinitesimal significance called heredity.

3. Man is a multiplicand handed to us with the privilege of using any multiplier we may choose, and the result depends upon our choice.

4. Again, man is like a musical instrument which we cannot alter without mutilating, but, having the choice of the performer, can make to produce either good or bad music.

5. A man who does not know that the chief value of education is not that it will make rulers moral enough to do right, but that it will make the ruled intelligent enough to know what their rights are and to demand them, is unworthy to be a school teacher.

6. One of the most difficult tasks for the literarily inclined people of this age, considering our miserably circumscribed existence, is that of wisely chosing their reading from the mountains of printed rubbish which floods the world.

7. One of the most favorable signs of the times is that waking up of the laboring classes to a realization of their power, and that casting about for a proper means to assert it which we see on every hand.

8. All speed to the day when this republic shall be in nature what it now is in name—a government of the people, by the people, for the people.

9. A man who diverts one day's productiv labor from useful channels until every man, woman, and child in this country is well fed, clothed, and housed, is a villain.

10. Every person who eats and dresses without working, or having worked, or having been pronounced by the proper authorities incapable of working, is a thief.

11. The sin which wholesale robbers directly commit against the world by their own idleness is infinitely less than that which they indirectly commit by causing the world to support the multitudes whom their luxury employs.

12. Anyone who does not know that if a rich man should buy $1,000,000 worth of corn, burn it up, and throw the ashes into the sea he would damage the world to the extent of $1,000,000, is, to call things by their right names, a fool.

13. No one but a wholesale robber could giv a ball costing $250,000 unless he had at least one hundred thousand guests.

14. A labor-saving machine does not make life any easier for those who labor, but it enables an additional number of thieves to liv without labor.

15. He who does not know that receipts for labor should be made of the cheapest convenient material is unworthy the name of statesman.

16. Of all the chimerical, preposterous, hyper-idiotic ideas I ever saw expressed none is more absurd than that the way to ruin a country is to flood it with every article necessary for man's convenience, comfort, and welfare. It would not be so surprising if only our most ignorant population argued thus, but when one sees column after column of our "great" newspapers filled with this idiotic rubbish he feels like saying, in the language of his grandmother, "What is the world coming to?"

But, in the name of common sense, what can the American people expect from those who are chosen to administer this government, and make laws for the amelioration of the misery of its people, when, instead of choosing men who are profound thinkers, they not only elect incompetent men, but those who, even if they had the ability, hav not the time, and who, if they had both the ability and the time, could not inaugurate any radical changes without damaging their own interests.

I speak of that almost universal custom of electing capitalists instead of philosophers to do that work which, incomparably more than any other work in this world, needs the brain of a philosopher for its proper accomplishment—the making of wise laws. J. W. FERRIS.

OSCEOLA, NEB., Feb. 17, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: It would appear, according to the Rev. Mr. Talmage, that "thirteen years from now will bring universal victory for Christ and the church" (sermon Feb. 6, 1887). But as it has taken nearly nineteen hundred years to claim the merest fraction of the human race, and, according to the best authorities, that fraction becoming more and more skeptical, one naturally inquires by what means is it to be brought about. Is it the God-revealed method that is to be used? Mr. Talmage says, "A red line runs through the church history of nineteen hundred years—a line of blood." While freely admitting that Christians hav been persecuted, it can be confidently asserted that the persecutors for opinions' sake hav been those claiming a revelation from God, either pagan or Christian, and calling their opponents Infidels or heretics. It seems "Diocletian massacred the Christians," but Diocletian was a good emperor, only he was too religious and obeyed his gods and their religion.

The chief business of the church has been the using of the sword and torch. "By the millions must we count those slain," says Mr. Talmage; and further, "Protestants hav represented Catholics as having a monopoly of persecutors, but both Protestants and Catholics hav practiced infamous cruelties." The horrible persecutions related by Dr. Draper (History of the Conflict between Religion and Science) and others are said by Protestants to apply to the church of Rome, but there is no plainer fact in history than that the church, Catholic and Protestant, has always persecuted just according to its power. And why? They hav the God-revealed authority they adopt to sanction it. Jehovah says, "If thy brother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend, entice thee to serve other gods, thou shalt surely kill him." Christ says he is the vine, ye are the branches. "If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered; and men gather them and cast them into the fire, and they are burned." He givs authority to the church that "whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven," and that offenders shall be delivered "for the destruction of the flesh that the spirit may be saved." Who shall say that Queen Mary was wrong when she thought God would be pleased with her for burning heretics, when he himself is coming "in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and who shall be punished with everlasting destruction." The common civilities of life are forbidden the Christian. "If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrin, receive him not into your house." "If an angel from heaven preach any other gospel let him be accursed." "He that believeth not the son the wrath of God abideth on him." "He that believeth not shall be damned." It is impossible to hold such doctrins and not hav a persecuting spirit. Hence the words of Dr. Talmage, "If set side by side you could girdle the earth with the fires of persecution." "For when any one sect got complete dominancy in any land, persecution and cruelty took possession of that sect." "Catholics were by Protestants put to the worst tortures." "See the Catholics after the Huguenots. See the gentiles after the Jews. See the Presbyterian Parliament of England, more tyrannical in their treatment of opponents than had been the criminal courts. Persecution against the Baptists by the Pedo-Baptists. Persecution of the Established church against the Methodist church. Persecution against the Quakers. Persecution against the Presbyterians." Count the number of thousands that lost their lives on account of God's command, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv." Christ said, "I came not to bring peace, but a sword." "To set a man at variance with his father, and the daughter against her mother;" and surely he has done it. Were such God-made doctrins, with which the Bible so largely abounds, relegated to savagism and knavery to which they belong, and doctrins drawn from the experience of mankind and found by practice to be good put in their places, a brighter prospect would adorn the morning of the twentieth century. The doctrins of love, equity, and truth were taught ages before Christ, and were they disseminated without the aid of "revelation," but with all the aid of modern science and art, Mr. Talmage would not be troubled so much with Infidels. JOHN ROSS.

GRATTAN, MICH., March 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Thus far I hav refrained from saying anything in reference to the illustrations by Mr. Heston in your paper. At times I hav thought that the space might be better occupied with good reading-matter. In order to advance the Liberal cause, it is of the utmost importance that those who are "joined to their idols," through the wiles of priestcraft, should be led to see that there is a better way. Those who are brave enough to dare take your paper and read it will be with us in any event. In order to succeed, Freethought must make inroads upon those who are really with, or are inclined to go with, Christianity. Therefore the question, Will the pictures tend to invite or repel that class? is of paramount importance.

The illustration in your last issue, February 26th, givs at a glance so plain and concise a representation of the effect of Bible teaching that I am inclined to say, Let us hav the pictures. That one illustration, if well studied, tells the whole story.

There we see, central and prominent, the cause of the woes of Ireland. Christian priestcraft has done it. That nationality, honest, brave, and industrious, but credulous and impulsiv, are represented as doing just what is the legitimate outcome of Bible teachings all the way through; by Moses, the prophets, and Christ and his apostles in the New Testament.

Be not startled, Christian reader (if this chance to meet the eye of any such), for really the teachings of Christ, the "meek and lowly," etc., are not only in perfect accord with, but really in advance of, the Old Testament in teaching that which induces just such horrible acts as we see illustrated in the center of that picture.

Do you ask why, or in what respect? I answer that the Old Testament does not even teach immortality definitly.

But Christ not only brought "immortality to light," but he plainly taught the doctrin of eternal punishment in its most hideous form.

And not only that, but although it is said he suffered and died to save all, in answer to the question, "Lord, are there few that be saved?" his reply, if it meant anything, certainly conveyed the idea that only a very few, comparativly, would escape the sentence that he would pronounce at the day of judgment, when, seated on the throne of his glory at the right hand of his father, God, he shall say to those on the left hand, "Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels."

And this vindictiv spirit may be found prominent in all the groundwork of Bible teachings. That being the case, why should we wonder at the scene prominently depicted in the picture referred to.

If God the father and Christ his beloved son teach and do such horrible things, we may naturally expect that those who believe in what is inculcated in the iuspired word would be animated by the same spirit. Why should they be expected to deal more gently with those who they think are leading souls down to hell than God the father, and his son, the "blessed savior?"

Such scenes as the picture represents hav been enacted in poor Ireland from the Battle of the Boyne to the present time, Christians doing to their fellow-Christians even that which is shocking to barbarians, as the illustration plainly represents.

And now let us try to analyze this picture. We see a crowd of angry men struggling for life—or to take life, rather. The traditional Irish shillaleh that "never misses fire" is playing a prominent part; Christians are engaged in a life-and-death struggle with their fellow-Christians, and all because of a little difference in religious belief.

Such scenes hav really been enacted in Belfast and other places, even during the past year. Then notice on the right the almost naked simple African barbarian; notice his horrified mien as he points to the other side of the stream in answer to the missionary with Bible under his arm, tracts in his pocket; and when the missionary says, "Come to Jesus," the mute but horrible reply is: "Why ask me to do it? Surely I ought not, for see, just over there, what the result might be."

Then on the left we see the priest with cross in hand, and finger pointing up to his imaginary God, saying to John Chinaman, "Come, go with us, do and think as we do, and you may be better here and hereafter." But the heathen Chinee, with a smirk and absurd grin on his face, points to the center piece, as much as to say, "Do you expect me to accept and believe a religion that is the sole cause of such terrible doings?"

I cannot conceive of a more plain and forcible "bird's-eye-view" of the practical results of Christian priestcraft.

And now, fellow-Liberals, laying aside all minor differences, let us all, by example as well as precept, every day, and at all times and places, endeavor to teach mankind that there is a better way. Let us teach and practice the religion of humanity, for humanity's sake; inculcate, and make it so plain that he who runs may read, the grand idea that how to liv and act in this life for the good of mankind here and now is worthy of all our best thoughts and efforts; then, if so be that there is a continued future existence, if any deity or power rules or controls all things in justice, the better our lives here, just so much better may we reasonably expect to start there. CONVERSE CLOSE.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y., March 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: It was awfully icy, and passing a large brick edifice, being attracted by the music within, I entered and took a rear center-aisle seat. I forget the number of it. A short, thin, gray-haired man was behind the pulpit, and I learned that he had just returned from a three months' furlough given him by his generous and appreciativ congregation, and that during his vacation he had been health-seeking among the various faith-cure establishments on Long Island.

He announced that he had been decidedly benefited, and was on the highway to ultimate recovery. I felt then as if I should like to hav been a member of that congregation—one of his parishioners—they all looked so happy.

Having a poor memory for dates, I cannot remember where the text or texts were, for there were two of them, and I thought I was in for an all-day's job.

It appeared that the Evangelical Alliance (whatever that is) had ordered all the ministers to preach from a certain text, but this gentleman hadn't spent three months for nothing. He had made the most of his time, so he picked out another text that he said would not conflict at all with the aforesaid Alliance's text, and it didn't, for nothing more was heard of either of them for the next forty minutes. He began by saying that he desired to preach from his heart, but his language indicated that he was preaching from a very disordered stomach.

He remarked that the smallest man in the world was the stingy man—the selfish man, the man who would only think of self when he met "the withered hand of beggary, and the white lips of famin." And the largest man in the world was not always the man of large stature. It did not depend upon the size of the body, but upon the size of the heart. The man who gave freely of earth's treasures, gave to the poor, to the destitute, to the widows and orphans (and he didn't forget the church), was the large man. The more he gave, the larger he became. The man who spent his money for charitable purposes, spent it copiously, was the largest of men.

Talking of spending money reminded me of what I heard a very bad man (in the eyes of a great many ministers) once say. He said: "Oh, I tell you, if you hav but a dollar in the world, and you hav got to spend it, spend it like a king; spend it as though it were a dry leaf, and you the owner of unbounded forests! That's the way to spend it. I had rather be a beggar and spend my last dollar like a king, than to be a king and spend my money like a beggar."

He stated further, that he sometimes wondered why Christ paid so little attention to education. Well, that is funny. Why didn't he start a university? Why didn't he establish the multiplication table? Why didn't he rob Newton of his discovery? Why didn't he get ahead of Galileo? Why didn't he anticipate Darwin? Why didn't he outstrip Proctor? Why didn't he write what he knew about this world, and what he knew of another? Why didn't he write his own book, and thus avoid the question of inspiration? I don't wonder he wondered. The greatest wonder of the world is why ministers pay so little attention to education. This minister assured his congregation that although he had been absent from them for three months, he had been kept constantly informed upon all matters pertaining to the church, and that the old adage had proved true, that "when the cat's away the mice will play" (it's a wonder he hadn't said rats); that he was grieved to learn that during his absence many of the members had backslidden, and were in danger of going down to death and hell. I was beginning to get frightened. I didn't know but some of them had thrown away their roller-skates and had donned a toboggan suit, and had taken a couple of slides, and I was mighty glad that I wasn't a member of that congregation after all—they did not look so dreadful happy. I learned, however, that that was not the unpardonable sin which they had committed, but that some of them had been guilty of the great crime of staying at home. I hav read somewhere that the fireside was the holiest altar beneath the skies; that "the home where virtue dwells with love is like a lily with a heart of fire—the fairest flower in all this world." "Home is where the virtues grow." That was my idea, but it seems that the doctrin of the church is different. I know it says that you must forsake your father, mother, wife, and children for Christ's sake, but I did not think it said that you must forsake your home. Well, it wasn't necessary, for what would home be without them?—a Godforsaken place. I was disappointed in the sermon. I thought perhaps he would tell his congregation how glad he was to return to them, how he appreciated their kindness in giving him a much-needed rest, and with returning health would come renewed energy and enthusiasm in the cause he espoused. I expected to hear him wish them all a Happy New Year, and say that day by day he became more and more attached to them by the bonds of friendship and love.

I should like to hav heard him express his gratitude, for "gratitude is the fairest flower that sheds its perfume in the human heart." My desire was not gratified. His mind was traveling in an opposit direction. His language was totally different. He made the following statement, and when he made it I thought to myself, there's a place that is better than this. He said, "I would not call you thieves, I would not call you robbers, I would not call you reprobates, but I say that the wickedest men that ever trod this earth are in this church to-night!" There is no place like home. H. H.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

" Between the dark and the daylight.
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Be Careful.

Be careful what you sow, boys!
For seed will surely grow, boys!
The dew will fall,
The rain will splash,
The clouds will darken,
And the sunshine flash,
And the boy who sows good seed to-day
Shall reap the crop to-morrow.

Be careful what you sow, girls!
For every seed will grow, girls!
Though it may fall
Where you cannot know,
Yet in summer and shade
It will surely grow;
And the girl who sows good seed to-day
Shall reap the crop to-morrow.

Be careful what you sow, boys!
For the weeds will surely grow, boys!
If you plant bad seed
By the wayside high,
You must reap the harvest
By and by,
And the boy who sows wild oats to-day
Must reap the wild oats to-morrow.

Be careful what you sow, girls!
For all the bad will grow, girls!
And the girl who now,
With a careless hand,
Is scattering thistles
Over the land,
Must know that, whatever she sows to-day,
She must reap the same to-morrow.

Then let us sow good seeds now!
And not the briers and weeds now!
That when the harvest
For us shall come,
We may hav good sheaves
To carry home.
For the seed we sow in our lives to-day
Shall grow and bear fruit to-morrow.

—Flora McElwell.

Giordano Bruno.

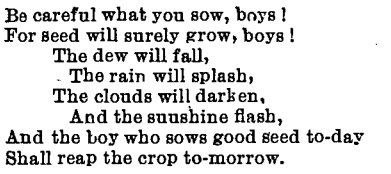
Inscribed to Brother George N. Hill, Boston.

When superstition stood most proud
Upon the hills of Rome eternal,
And old tradition tortured truth
With falsest fears of fates infernal;
There science shot her first bright ray,
Like a silent spear ethereal,
Athwart the gathered, ghostly gloom,
And shone a sun-born star imperial.



To ope or shut the gates of fact
Vain are the fabled keys of Peter;
The songs of liberty we sing
Are sweeter than the psalmist's meter;
The church that strove to support God
By silencing the voice of reason,
Is now ignored by government,
And common sense is no more treason.

To him who bore bold Bruno's name
Was more of nativ honor given
Than dwelt in those who through death flame
Had hoped to find the port of heaven.
For him a monument we make
Which countries shall concenter
To mark his martyr place, and date

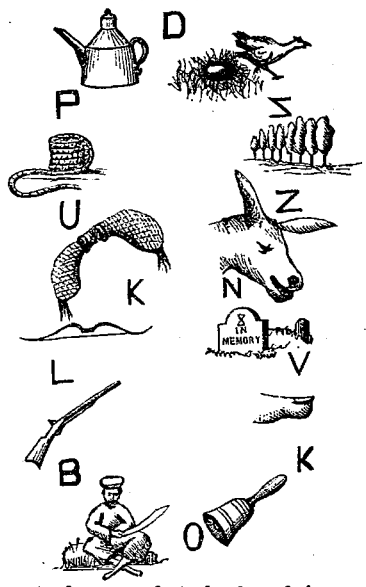
3.—REBUS.



Easy lesson in spelling.

4.—PALINDROME.

A fowl's bone must supply a name
That forward, backward reads the same.
Had God created fowls like men,
This were the source of our first hen;
And would take the puzzle from its peg,
Of " which was first, the hen or egg?"
Agassiz says, " To be exact,
All life comes from an egg," in fact.
But that which here concerns alone,
Is but to find this poor fowl's bone.

Correspondence.

GIDEON, KAN., Feb. 23, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am a boy twelve years old. I go to school, but the teacher has got the measles, also some of the scholars. We hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for six years. I like to read the Children's Corner. I liv on a farm. Well, I will close for this time. I hope to see this in print.

Your little Freethinker friend,
HENRY WATKINS.

ALLEGHENY, PA., Feb. 27, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am eleven years old. I go to the public school, and am in room No. 13. My studies are arithmetic, geography, physiology, spelling, reading, and writing. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like the pictures very much, and read all the letters in the Children's corner. My father is a member of the Secular Union of Pittsburgh. One of their members lost his daughter on Friday, Feb. 25th, and funeral services were held on Monday, Feb. 28th, by the Secular Union, and her body was cremated the same day. We hav a very fine crematory here, and it is heated with natural gas. This is all at present. If you see fit you may print this. This is the first letter I ever wrote.

Your friend. GRACIE CAHILL.

NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME, VA.,
March 5, A. S. 287.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I join hands with Brother George N. Hill, in giving you gratulation for the sterling sketch you drew of the brave Bruno for the Children's Corner portrait gallery. Since Brother George has been so gracious as to quote my little sentiment, let me say that we became known to each other through correspondence concerning the "Science Calendar," and in the pleasure of his personal acquaintance I hav been builded up. And it is no flattery to say that there is not a better boy in Boston than he is—a stout and sound lifter of "philosophy and plaster," and an uncompromising temperance advocate. He should walk oftener into the Children's Corner.

Yours for liberty and the little ones,
JOHN P. GUILD.

MOODY, KAN., Feb. 8, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Ma has been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER for several years. It is one of the best papers on the subject of Liberalism. The Pulpit, edited by Mr. Shaw, is a good book. It has some good pieces in it from youngsters, and others from the editor that are the best reading. Mr. Ingersoll's "Lay Sermon" is as good as one needs. I hav heard many lectures on "What must We Do to be Saved?" but we hav Mr. Ingersoll's lecture, "What Must We Do to be Saved?" and it is the best one I ever read or heard.

I am told by the preachers that the Bible is the word of God, but where is their proof? They say the apostles are their proof, but how could the apostles write a book when they had never seen him nor heard his voice—for "no man saw God at any time?"

"No man can see God and liv." If this is so, What will the holy saints do when they approach the golden throne of God? I was talking to a man not long ago about faith. I quoted two or three passages showing faith that the believer can hav. He said he believed that he could get the faith to do that. Here are the passages: "In my name shall they cast out devils. They shall speak with new tongues. They can handle serpents, and if they drink any deadly poison it shall not hurt them. They can lay hands on the sick and they shall recover." If any man has got this faith, why don't he step forward and make himself known?

Where is the Christian that can drink poison and not be hurt by it? Let me mix him a dose of "Rough on Rats," and if it does not kill him I will know that he has faith.

When I am in some distant land,
Read the writing of my hand,
And if my name no more you see,
Read these few lines and think of me.

Yours truly, JOHN M. SIMMONS.

OPHIR, CAL., Feb. 21, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will be seventeen on the third day of July, 1887, although I am married and hav a little girl which will soon be three years old, so I don't know whether you will call me a child or not; although I consider myself nothing more than a child, for I hav been wrapped in ignorance so long that since I am married to a Freethinker, and hav just got my eyes opened, I think I am nothing but a child. When I was, what you might say, a baby—for I was but four months old—my mother, who is a Catholic, thought that she was not able to giv me a Catholic education, so she sent me to my grandmother, at Sacramento, where she had sent my oldest brother, so that he should get the same education that I got, when I was old enough. When I was five years old, my grandmother thought I was old enough, so she told my brother to get me a catechism so I should learn to say my prayers. She asked me if my mother had taught me my prayers, such as the Lord's Prayer, and the Virgin Mary's Prayer, and when I told her No, that mother thought I was too little to say my prayers, she was shocked; so, as little as I was, I had to kneel down every night and say my prayers. I had to repeat the above named prayers and two or three more long prayers. When I was nine years old, my folks moved to Sacramento. I had been going to the public school, but now I had not learned what my folks wanted me to learn, so my grandmother told my mother to send me to the convent.

So she proposed to my mother to send me to San Francisco to the sisters at South San Francisco, so away I went to learn to make my first communion. I did not like the place very much, for there was too much praying to be done. In the morning the bell was rung to get up, and while dressing we all had to pray. Then we had to go out in a big, long hall and pray for a good hour; then go to 6 o'clock mass, and by this time the breakfast bell would ring, which I, for one, would enjoy very much.

One day one of the sisters told the girls in her room at school that if they would write to the Virgin Mary, she would answer it; so one day one of the girls wrote a letter to the Virgin and put it at the foot of a statue of the Virgin, and then locked the door and put the key in her pocket. One of the sisters had a key to the door, so she opened it and took the letter out and answered it, and took it to the place where she had got the letter that the girl had written, and then locked the door again. On the following day the girl opened the door and found the letter, and, after reading it, she ran to the sister that told us to write, and said that the Virgin had answered her letter.

This is a very foolish thing for a girl as old as she was to do, but she was not to be blamed for this. One time, the girls told me I would never go to heaven because I sewed an apron on Sunday—for I had to wear it to school the next day. None of the girls would speak to me for a long time, for I was so wicked, so they told the head sister about it, and she put me in punishment for a week and I was not to speak to any of the girls for this great offense. My husband takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and it is a very good paper; it is the first Freethought paper I hav ever seen. I appreciate the pictures very much. I don't think there is much Catholicism about Mr. Heston, or he could not print such illustrations. I think that if he should stop the pictures it would not be worth as much as it is this way. My little girl likes to look at the monkeys and other preachers.

We hav some Freethought books that I hav learned from to know what Catholics are. These books are entitled "the Holy Cross series." This is something that I was not taught in the pious prisons, as I call them, that I was in for several years, both in Sacramento and San Francisco.

I remember the girls crying, and wishing that they could find some way to get out of those fiendish prisons, so that they could go around among the people and expose them, and tell the people how the girls are treated there. Some of the girls in there were very ignorant and superstitious. They told me that I would never go to heaven because my faith was not good enough, because I couldn't believe all their tom-foolery just right.

Well, I must close my letter, for it is getting so long that I am afraid you will get tired of it before you finish reading it. If you see fit to print this letter in the Children's Corner, I would be very glad to see it in print, it being my first letter since I resurrected from the Catholic fold.

I will ever remain your true friend and Freethinker, MRS. ROSA KAISER.

Physical Series.

[The instructiv lesson below was intended by Mr. Grower, the experienced chemist, who kindly furnishes it, for children of thirteen or fourteen. It is good reading also for children of an older growth, who will, we trust, explain it to the little toddlers. We regret that its length necessitated its division into two parts.—ED. C. C.]

NO. I.—MATTER—ITS GENERAL NATURE.

1. Physics.—Physics, in its widest sense, includes all natural science; in its restricted and popular sense it treats of the phenomena presented by bodies which may be shown without changing the identity. It is thus distinguished from chemistry, which treats of those phenomena accompanied by change in the composition of bodies.

The following example will make this difference clearer: Copper is a reddish metal; it may be drawn into wire or rolled into thin sheets, but it is still copper. Therefore these are physical properties, and are included in physics.

But if the copper be placed in nitric acid, it will be dissolved; the acid, which was previously colorless and cold, will become blue or green and hot, and at the same time a reddish brown, suffocating gas will be given off. These are chemical changes, and are included in chemistry because the identity of the copper and nitric acid is destroyed. We no longer hav copper and nitric acid, but a substance called nitrate of copper. In trying this experiment, use only small quantities of acid and copper, and hav the acid in a comparativly large, glass vessel, otherwise the action may be so violent that the acid will boil over and do damage.

2. Matter.—Anything which takes up room is called matter. The food we eat, the water we drink, and the air we breathe, are all matter, because they take up room. Mountains, rocks, lakes, rivers, plants, and animals all occupy space, and are therefore matter.

Forces, such as heat, light, and electricity, do not take up room; neither do feelings, such as hope, love, and fear; therefore none of these are matter.

3. Extension.—The property of matter, by virtue of which it takes up room, is called extension.

EXPERIMENT.—Invert a tumbler and immerse it in a vessel of water. The water will not rise and fill it. This shows that the air takes up room, and illustrates the property of extension.

4. Properties of matter.—Besides taking up room, matter has certain other properties. Those properties which are possessed by all kinds of matter are called general, or universal; some of these are, extension (already explained), indestructibility, gravitation, impenetrability, compressibility, inertia, mobility, divisibility, and elasticity by pressure. Those properties which only belong to certain kinds of matter, or depend upon certain conditions, are called specific or characteristic. There are a great number of specific properties of matter, such as color, hardness, ductility, etc. The important ones will be described in their proper places.

5. Indestructibility. By virtue of this property matter cannot be destroyed. If a bottle be broken, the glass still exists—it is not destroyed. If a board be cut into shavings, the wood is not destroyed. If a newspaper be torn in pieces, the paper is still there. If iron be reduced to filings, the metal still exists. When rain falls on the ground and disappears, the water is not destroyed; it merely soaks into the earth. When water is boiled away or a wet body gets dry, the water still exists; it goes into the air in the form of vapor, but not a particle is lost.

When a piece of paper is burnt, gases are given off, smoke and ashes are formed, but nothing is lost. The matter which was in the paper still exists in the ashes, smoke, and gases. Not one particle of it is destroyed. The coal we burn and the food we eat are changed in a similar way, but the matter still exists. When a piece of iron rusts, the metal which appears to be gone is all in the rust. These last examples, namely, the burning of paper and coal, the consumption of food, and the rusting of iron, are all chemical changes, since by the operation the substances are altered in composition.

Do what we will, matter cannot be destroyed. Heat it all we like, cool it, break it, melt it, burn it, dissolve it in water or acids, or add anything to it—it makes no difference how it is treated, not one particle of it can be destroyed. This important and universal property of matter is its indestructibility.

SPIRITUALISM Sustained By the Bible.

BY COL. JOHN R. KELSO.

CONTENTS:

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE BIBLE.
SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.
SPIRITUALISM A NECESSITY IN GOD'S GENERAL GOVERNMENT.
SPIRITUAL MEDIUMSHIP.
OBJECTIONS TO SPIRITUALISM ANSWERED.

Like all THE TRUTH SEEKER'S publications, the mechanical execution of the work is all that could be desired. Good paper, clear type—in short, a neat little volume.

The primary object of the work, as its title indicates, is to sustain Spiritualism, but the absurdities of the Christian religion, and the abominations of the old Jew book, get a terrible shaking up. The book contains much to interest every intelligent reader. . . . Colonel Kelso has done much acceptable work in the cause of Freethought and Liberalism all over the land. Send for his new book—read it—put it into the hands of every Christian; it will teach him that the way of the fool is foolishness. Every Liberal who reads it will certainly find his "Spiritual" strength renewed.—John Peck.

Poetry.

Why?

Prior to the great beginning,
When there was no heaven, no earth,
When there was no sunlight, starlight,
Before creation had its birth;
When a blank and boundless nothing,
Harmless, lifeless, round him fell,
What occurred to break his slumber,
What was there to loose the spell?

Breathless, lifeless, all-pervading,
Deep, boundless, starless, rayless night—
No, not night, for there was nothing—
Out of which sprang worlds of light;
Out of which was made the heavens,
Countless worlds remote and near,
And all living, moving creatures
In the depths of sea and air.

Yet we know not what aroused him
To begin his mighty plan
Of creation in its vastness,
Forming, lastly, sinful man;
Why did he not leave great nothing
In its harmless, silent space,
Rather than make man so sinful
As to wreck the human race?

When there was no grief, no anguish,
When there was neither joy nor pain,
Why create both good and evil,
Why not let great nanght remain?
If creation brought forth evil,
And from evil comes forth good,
Where, then, is the point dividing,
Satan's works from works of God?

When there was no place for sinning,
Nor for sinful man to dwell,
Why did God create a devil,
And conceive an endless hell?
Why was silence ever broken?
Why was man to misery born?
Why were devils made to tempt him,
And then leave him here to mourn?

The Arcana of Nature.

Spirit of the great unknown,
I dwell in the infinit seas,
I sing in the wind's glad tone,
And sigh in the soft summer breeze;
I brood in silence and storm,
I come with the earthquake's wrath,
I pillow the worlds on my arm,
And stay the sweet moons in their path.

I scatter the sunshine of June
That heralds the grass and the grain,
I dream by the fountains at noon,
Or waken the winter again;
My girdle of rainbows I bind
As I sit by the gray ocean side,
My footsteps are fleeter than wind,
My pulse is the flow of the tide.

I am soul of the legions of suns,
I touch their swift wheels with my hand,
Yet the smallest streamlet that runs
Is mine with its silvery band,
And mine in its silvery song;
Tho' the chorus of stars is my own,
I hasten their cycling throng,
And breathe in their undertone.

I marshall my forces and go
To systems nnseen of the earth,
I laugh in their rivers that flow,
I attend the least star at its birth;
Of the nniverse I am the lord,
Tho' I whisper my secrets as mild
As dew shimmering down on the sward,
And I wait on the steps of your child.

I am heart of the lily and rose,
I hav painted them out of the deep,
I move in each blossom that blows,
And the zephyr that over them sweeps;
Yet I tread on the outermost bar,
And ride on the ripples of day,
I hav twirled the bright rim of a star
And danced in its billows away.

I hav kept for the children of men
A book illumined with gold,
Vast suns wrought my radiant pen,
And the volume shall never grow old;
I hav lettered the rocks by the sea,
In the caverns and depths of the mine,
I hav writ on the ages that flee
A psalm and a sermon divine.

The atoms are mine, and I build
From the molecule up to the man,
Gradations evolving that gild
The ages, and æons I span;
I am bridegroom of Time, and I wed
With the loveliest daughters of Space,
I set my own seal on each head,
And smile on each beautifnl face.

Book Notices.

THE NEW GOD.

Mr. Putnam's new lecture with the above title is published in a neat pamphlet and makes a valuable addition to our Freethought literature. It is one of the author's very best efforts, and has a genuin Liberal flavor. It overflows with good things. It is condensed in expression. A volume is packed into a sentence, and a whole life's experience crowded into a line.

I hav read nothing from the pen of Mr. Putnam that leaves more satisfaction in the mind. It is sound, logical, brilliant, and persuasiv. It is not an argument; it is a poem of facts, a string of truths, a cluster of rare and beautiful statements that sparkle like diamonds. It puts the crown upon Atheism. In speaking of this work it is almost impossible to withstand the temptation to prove one's praise by quoting from it, but this would be injustice to the author. It would be like plucking a rose from the tree, or stealing a gem from a necklace.

To appreciate this lecture one must read the lines as the writer has placed them. This essay is not a piece of carpentry, but a creation. It came as an inspiration, and was preserved in its original form with the dew of birth upon its brow and limbs. The thoughts in it go singing through the mind, and their song is rich and sweet with joy and hope. The fire in it lights and warms every utterance. There are grand and startling expressions in this lecture that show depths of feeling and a rare insight.

Mr. Putnam has done other work for Liberalism that deserves praise, but he has never put more into any thirty-four pages that he has ever written. This work is a revelation of genius. The thoughts in it shine like stars. It is full of the creativ spirit. Every line is alive and seems to breathe and pulse with the thought it holds. The writer has left his own life in the words he has written. Every sentence is warm with the blood of the author.

"The New God" was made by an artist-hand, guided by a poet-soul. It is as perfect as sculpture. The creator makes his "god" in his own image, and breathes into his nostrils the breath of his own life.

There is health in this essay; there is courage in it; there is hope in it. Not a dead word can be found on one of its pages. This lecture is not a coffin, not a tomb; it is a house of the living, a home of the loving, a place where livs and moves a human being. It is full of a great thought, a great faith, a great idea. It throbs with love of truth, and thrills with passion for truth.

Mr. Putnam was in the hights when he saw this vision of "The New God." He was on his intellectual knees, not in worship, but in wonder. I believe no one can read this pamphlet without being better for doing so, without seeing clearer, and understanding better what has been called "the mystery of godliness." This mystery is exposed and shown up, and the truth revealed.

This little book should go into the home of every Liberal in the land. Our youth should read it and catch its inspiration. It will widen their minds, strengthen their hearts, and make truer and tenderer their lives. This lecture on "The New God" is an appeal for a new man—a prophecy of a greater, nobler humanity. A man that can giv the world such thoughts as Mr. Putnam has here expressed should be nobly encouraged and sustained. L. K. WASHBURN.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just read Mr. S. P. Putnam's lecture entitled, "The New God," which is published in neat pamphlet form by the Truth Seeker Company. As the perusal of this pamphlet has afforded me a good deal of pleasure, I will write a few lines, not so much by way of criticism or commendation as to giv expression to some thoughts that the lecture has suggested. Any God, it seems to me, would be an improvement on the one we hav inherited from our immediate ancestors. I therefore indorse Mr. Putnam's opinion that the old God ought to be superseded at once. Take the Roman Catholic God—I suppose he is the same one that a very large number of people in this country hav been nursing, feeding, and trying to keep in good humor with song and instrumental music, and large presents of land and scrip. But with all these sacrificial efforts to make their God act decently, they hav only succeeded in making him more and more independent and inhumanly eccentric. Our Christian friends say that this old God constructed and has general supervision over everything that exists, and that "not even a sparrow falls without his notice."

A few days ago he gave the south of Italy and France a shaking up, and a church that was built for the special purpose of glorifying him was taken possession of as a place of safety by about three hundred of his faithful and confiding friends and children, but what kind of a reception did he giv them? Why, he just tumbled the walls and roof down on them, and maimed and killed the whole three hundred as a reward for their kindness to and confidence in his protecting power and disposition.

Don't you think that that sort of a God ought to be discharged?

Don't you think the Italians could elect or make a new God that would not be so ill-tempered and inconsiderate of the feelings of his dearest friends? Mr. Putnam does, and so say we all—that a god who can't find any more useful employment than destroying the lives of his most faithful friends by floods, earthquakes, epidemics, contagious diseases, wars, and such like things, had better resign, and if he won't resign, then he ought to be discharged, and something else put in his place. Mr. Putnam has crowded into this lecture a number of crisp and brilliant sentences, some of which may strike the reader, on first thought, as being rather paradoxical. He seems to think that the God element can not be destroyed in the minds of the masses at present, and that, therefore, it would be reasonable to construct a new God, who or which would embrace everything that is grand, noble, elevating, and the personification of humanitarian benevolence. But yet he should not be so faultlessly pure and perfect that there would not be room in him for improvement when occasion required it. The lecture is unique in that it is an attempt to portray the kind of a God that would be useless to put in the place of the old, and the manifold beauties which the new God ought to possess. He finally concludes his lecture with a peroration in blank verse, in which he wanders through the univcrse in search of the new God, but finds him not outside of the aspirations, impulses, and poetic revelry of his own mind. The lecture is, to say the least of it, very interesting reading, and will amply repay any person for the time and money it costs to purchase and read it.

J. J. MCCABE.

IDEOLOGY. Nutrition, Instinct, Innervation, Sensation, Consciousness, Memory, Thinking, Consecutiv Ideas. By Dr. LaRoy Sunderland, Foundation Fellow of the Society of Science, Literature, and Art, London. Vol. III. Boston: J. P. Mendum, publisher. Price, $1.

This volume of Dr. Sunderland's work on "Ideology" treats mainly of the causes and cure of disease. Near the outset, in his chapter on bad habits, the author says: "There are bad habits in walking, dressing, and in sleep; but the habit most pernicious, and worse if possible than all, is the medicinal—the habit of dosing with syrups, pills, and powders, and nostrums too numerous to count." Dr. Sunderland's method is what he calls self-cure, and he givs scores of testimonials to show that it has the desired result. Everything yielded to it, from gout, rheumatism, and anchylosis to bad spells, delirium tremens, and insanity. It would be a good deal more gratifying to the reader if Dr. Sunderland could hav brought himself to the point of telling in explicit language exactly how one afflicted with a disease should proceed in order to cure himself. It is well enough to hav the tricks of charlatans exposed, and to know that there is a natural method of cure, but that knowledge does not materially aid the patient. It is admitted that Dr. Sunderland possessed remarkable power over the minds and bodies of some persons brought under his influence. He could place a subject in a condition wholly oblivious to painful sensation. It was hoped that in "Ideology," his last and chief work, he had left his secret as a legacy to the world. But it must be confessed that he has not done so. He has given no end of effects with no hint as to the cause. No one can help expressing a feeling of disappointment that he chose this course instead of doing what it may be supposed he was able to do toward clearing up the mystery of the wonderful phenomena which he claims to hav produced. The so-called miracles of Christ, if performed by him, did not exceed to any great extent of marvelousness the miracles of Dr. Sunderland. The difference was in degree only. Dr. Sunderland repudiated the miracles of Christ, but recounts others achieved by himself, and offers them to the world unexplained by natural causes. We cannot deny the interesting nature of this work on "Ideology." Its value must be left for others to estimate. Dr. Sunderland has been more successful in explaining the psychology of religious insanity, as manifested in revivals, than in showing how we may cure all diseases without medicin.

The Swiss Cross is a monthly magazine of the Agassiz Association, published by N. D. C. Hodges, 47 Lafayette Place. "The name," says the publisher, "was selected as being the emblem of Switzerland, the home of Louis Agassiz, noted for the great service he rendered to the world by means of voyages of scientific discovery." It is not going to commit itself to any of those scientific heresies which throw doubt upon "revealed" truth as found in the scriptures, and so when a contributor casually assumes in effect that man is a better developed animal than his remote ancestor, the editor hastens to point out that "this assumption [that man has developed from an ape-like animal] was never allowed by Professor Agassiz," and warns his readers that "the theory of evolution is not yet proven." If the editor would be equally scrupulous with regard to all unproven theories, he would be often called upon to rebuke correspondents for their assumptions of "supreme wisdom," "spirit of God," "the Lord," "the creator," and other similar unprovable hypotheses. The Swiss Cross is sent to subscribers for $1.50 per annum.

Once a month Science gathers up the educational articles it has printed during that time, adds some original and selected articles, correspondence, etc., and publishes a periodical named Science and Education. The subscription price is $2.50 per year, and it is in every respect a first-class publication.

WE receive occasionally from 47 Lafayette Place a copy of Science, a weekly publication devoted to the general diffusion of scientific knowledge. It is an eminently conservativ journal, well printed, and edited with discretion. We know of no other scientific journal that would fill the place occupied by Science. $5 per year.

Dr. William A. Hammond opens the April Popular Science Monthly with an able article entitled "Brain-Forcing in Childhood." The paper givs a vivid picture of the evils of the book-cramming process, now so common in both public and private schools, and also contains a strong plea for fewer studies, more direct contacts with nature, and less of the intervention of books.

A Pleasing Anecdote Spoiled.

Here is a time-honored story which we find in our illustrated contemporary, the Graphic. It has a new application and new names, but the tale is more ancient than might be supposed on a superficial examination:

John Quincy Adams and John Hancock, "the Signer," married two sisters, the daughters of a noted Methodist divine in Connecticut. John Quincy was a favorit with the old people, and Mary's choice was approved by them. So, when the banns wese published, the parent said, "Mary, if you will furnish me the text, I will preach you a wedding sermon." She was equal to the task, and gave the text, "Mary hath chosen the good part, which shall not be taken from her." Needless to say that justice was done to the occasion and the text.

Not so with Margaret, who in the meau while was receiving the attentions of her John in a very inexpensiv way, so far as her parents were concerned: for it is said that "he never crossed his legs under their festiv board." So, when the banns were published, she said to her father: "Father, you preached a wedding sermon for Mary. Cannot you preach one for me?" He at first demurred; but at last he consented, and called for the text, when Margaret, who was equal to the occasion, said, "And John came, neither eating nor drinking, and yet ye say he hath a devil."

This is a pleasant anecdote, and may be true about somebody; but as to John Hancock and John Quincy Adams it can't be true.

John Hancock died four years before John Quincy Adams got married. Hancock's wife was a Miss Quincy, of Massachusetts; Adams's wife was a Miss Johnson, of Maryland.

If this ingenious inventor had substituted the elder John Adams for John Quincy, the anecdote might hav appeared more credible, for both John Adams and John Hancock married Quincys. But if the father of either bride was a preacher, he could not hav been a Methodist, because Methodism was not then established in America.—New York Sun.

A Letter from Miss Gibson.

MR. EDITOR: I have just read with sadness in to-day's TRUTH SEEKER of the decease of little Gene Remsburg, our great and good lecturer's two-year-old pretty boy. Every heart will throb with pain over his bereavement, and that of his interesting wife and family.

It was with great pleasure that I perused Mr. Remsburg's lecture, "The Fathers of Our Republic," delivered before the tenth annual congress of the American Secular Union, in New York city, last November. It is to be regretted that the Liberals do not possess sufficient funds to publish such lectures, and distribute them wholesale among our ignorant enemies who are constantly misrepresenting us and our aims. Many of our Christian foes know no more of the real character of the fathers of our republic than do the Hottentots. This little pamphlet givs the information that every person over the age of sixteen years ought to be ashamed not to know. A Moody asks for $250,000 to establish a training school for missionaries in Chicago, and lo! in a few days in was all secured, John V. Farnell, whom I very well know, heading the list with the modest sum of $100,000, while Mrs. George McCormick follows suit with $50,000, and so on along down, until the amount is reached. Will we Liberals ever be able to do the like for truth that our enemies are doing for superstition?

I can cordially respond to the eloquent tribute paid to the worth of Richard J. Lamborn in THE TRUTH SEEKER, February 12th. The deceased was one of my hearers in Marshalton, Chester county, Pa., the five months of Sundays I lectured there in the winter of 1878-79. Never was there a truer man and a more stanch and devoted Freethinker. The brothers, Richard and Robert, were known far and wide for their probity, zeal, and freedom from bigotry and error. May Robert long survive to bless his family and the community. Had we more such men the world would be the wiser and the better.

I cannot forbear saying a word in praise of the excellent article, "Mormonism Itself," in THE TRUTH SEEKER, March 5th, by J. S., and the article preceding it, "Confiscating Mormon Property," equally true and good; while as for Antichrist, well, I always hold up both hands in his favor!

On the whole, I do not think THE TRUTH SEEKER is dwindling into nothingness, but still more than sustains its prestige; and in its new quarters I hope it will flourish and spread itself like a green bay-tree, until its branches shall cover the whole earth.

Yours truly, ELLA E. GIBSON.

The "Sovereign Superstition."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Allow me to trouble the intelligent TRUTH SEEKER readers with the names and notions of a few more "intemperate temperance advocates," of whose company none need feel ashamed when opposing the sovereign superstition:

"No greater hallucination has ever deluded the mind of mind than the idea that alcohol is ever necessary for any use."—Wm. Tyndal, scientist.

"I regard the liquor traffic as the gigantic crime of crimes." (This has been repeated by so many notable men that its authorship is uncertain.)

"It is impossible to license crime by halves; to authorize injustice at all, and hope to regulate the measure of it."—Wm. H. Prescott, historian.

"Statesmanship consists rather in removing the cause than in punishing or evading the result."—James A. Garfield, statesman.

"Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging, and whoso is deceived thereby is not wise."—Solomon, king.

"What makes them so smiling and happy, you think?
Because they hav nothing but water to drink."
—John Pierpont, veteran poet.

"Alcohol causes three-fourths of all chronic illness which the medical man has to treat."—Dr. Chamois, medical author.

"Now that they had come to see that the medical use of intoxicating drinks was working great mischief, that evil must be assailed."—Gerritt Smith, reformer.

"Oh, that men should put an enemy in their mouths to steal away their brains!"—Shakspere, if not Bacon, the essayist.

"O thou invisible spirit of wine!
If there is no other name to call thee by,
Let me call thee devil!"
—Shakspere, dramatist, or Lord Bacon.

"Intoxicate (Low L.—L. and Gk.) From pp. of Low L. intoxicare, to make drunk.—L. in, into; toxicum, poison, borrowed from Gk. toxikon, poison for arrows. Gk. toxikon is der. from toxon, a bow, of which the plural, toxa, is used to mean arrows."—Prof. W. W. Skeat, etymologist.

"I am aware that there is a prejudice against any man engaged in the manufacture of alcohol. I believe from the time it issues from the coiled and poisonous worm in the distillery until it empties itself into the hell of death, dishonor, and crime, that it is demoralizing to everybody that touches it."—Col. R. G. Ingersoll, the world's greatest orator.

I am sure I never said anything stronger than that, and for the simple reason that nothing stronger can be said. If the alcohol habit, the liquor business, is "the sum of all villanies," is not it of highest moment to seek to be rid thereof? I know that we should be temperate even in the use of water, but it is the business of firemen to use enough of it to put out the flames; and until the efforts of those who realize the liquor evil hav culminated in its extinguishment, they can hardly do anything intemperate in their attempts toward that end. As for choice of words, I use Webster's unabridged and Skeat's etymological dictionaries. If the Bennett bookstore can supply a more complete vocabulary, with stronger words, I shall be happy to buy.

I had sooner be "an intemperate temperance advocate" in hell, than to be a temperate toper in heaven. Drunkards claim to be moderate. JOHN PRESCOTT GUILD.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

A MAN named Lawton, doing business on Wall street, and reputed sound and a millionaire, disappeared a few days ago with a woman and all his assets. Many firms, including several banks, were heavy losers. Lawton is thought to hav carried a million with him.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY, which comes the 17th of March, was celebrated in the usual way. The Hibernians turned out and paraded in their high hats and green sashes, and made business lively where whisky is sold. To please the Irish the politicians flew the Irish colors from City Hall.

NEW YORK'S city chamberlain, W. M. Ivins, has been talking recently before the Harlem Democratic Club on the subject of "Political Assessments." He said that a candidate for senator must put up $50,000, and judges $10,000 to $30.000. He added that it costs a mayor about $20,000, and that Hewitt, the last candidate, cheerfully contributed his share at the recent election. The various "halls" and clubs, he says, raised a million to elect Cleveland.

ONE OF THE PLAGUES OF EGYPT.

And the Lord plagued Pharaoh and his house with great plagues.—Gen. xii, 17.

Odds and Ends.

SPEAKING of animals, what does the catamount to?

SINCE the advent of Lent, a great many women hav done all their repenting in seal-cloth and sashes.

"WHAT are the last teeth that come?" asked a teacher of her class in physiology. "False teeth, mum," replied a boy who had just wakened up on the back seat.

AUNT RACHEL: "Why, boy, how you do swear!" Boy (flattered): "I don't swear wery good; but I reckon when I git as old as my dad, and has the practice, I'll beat him all holler."

THE Salvation Army stopped in front of a saloon in East Portland and began singing. "It is water that we want, not beer," and the saloon keeper turned the hose on them. And yet they were not happy.

"POOR fellow! he died in poverty," said a man of a person lately deceased. "That isn't anything," exclaimed a seedy bystander. "Dying in poverty is no hardship. It is living in poverty that puts a thumbscrew on a fellow."

A ONE-LEGGED preacher in a Georgia town once upbraided a young man for carrying a gold-headed cane. "There are no gold-headed canes in heaven," said the man of God. "No; and I guess there are no one-legged preachers there either," was the rejoinder.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher: "Who was king after Saul?" Scholar: "David." S.-S. T.: "Who followed David?" S.: "Solomon." S.-S. T.: "And who came after Solomon?" Little girl (out of turn): "Oh, please, miss, I know." "Who, then, Dottie?" "The queen of Sheba."

De bigger dat you see de smoke
De less de fire will be,
And de leastest kind of possum
Climbs de biggest kind o' tree.

De darkey at de old camp-ground
Who kin loudest sing and shout
Is a-gwine to rob some hen-roost
Afore de week is out.

AMONG the begging letters recently received at the office of a benevolent society was one running thus: "This unfortunate young man is the only son of a widow who died childless, and his earnings maintain his aged father and infant brothers, whose whole support he is." The secretary of the bureau wrote on the margin of the epistle the following note: "The circumstances of this case are evidently exaggerated."

"PATRICK," said the priest, "the Widow Moloney tells me you hav stolen one of her finest pigs. Is that so?" "Yes, yer honor." "What hav you done with it?" "Killed it and ate it, yer honor." "Oh, Patrick, when you are brought face to face with the widow and her pig on the judgment day, what account will you be able to giv of yourself when the widow accuses you of the theft?" "Did you say the pig would be there, yer riverence?" "To be sure I did." "Well, thin, yer riverence, I'll say, 'Mrs. Moloney, there's your pig.'"

JANE: "Please, sir, there's a man here who wants——" The minister: "Now, Jane, you know I can't be bothered with visitors." "He says he is poor, and if you will only——" "Send him away, Jane, at once. I declare it is very annoying. While writing this sermon on charity I've been interrupted three times."

A LADY of a neighboring city purchased a book of Bible stories for her little boys, and the other evening she spent an hour and a half in reading a portion of its contents to her offspring. When she had got thoroughly tired, she stopped and asked them if they did not think the book very interesting. "Well, it is pretty good," said one of the young critics, "but you hav read nothing but chestnuts so far." The lady left the room suddenly after to smile out loud.

SATISFACTORY COLLATERAL.

The other morning as the janitor of a bank not very far from the Palace opened the door he was surprised to observe three rather tired-looking citizens seated on the steps, the center one of whom held a sealed envelope carefully in sight of his companions.

"Want to make a deposit, gentlemen?" asked the casbier, who shortly arrived. "Step inside."

"No, I want to negotiate a loan," said the man with the envelope, "and there ain't a minute to lose. I want $5,000 quicker'n hades can scorch a feather."

"What collaterals hav you—government?" inquired the bank official.

"Government nothin'. I've got something that beats four per cents all hollow. You see I've been sitting in a poker game across the street, and there's over four thousand dollars in the pot. There are three or four pretty strong hands out, and as I've every cent in the center the boys hav given me thirty minutes to raise a stake on my hand. It's in this envelope. Just look at it, but don't giv it away to these gentlemen. They're in the game, and came along to see I don't monkey with the cards."

"But, my dear sir," said the cashier, who had quietly opened the envelope and found it to contain four kings and an ace, "this is entirely irregular—we don't lend money on cards."

"But you ain't going to see me raised out on a hand like that?" whispered the pokerist. "These fellows think I'm bluffing, and I can just clean out the whole gang. You see we ain't playing flushes, so I've got 'em right in the door."

"Can't help it, sir. Never heard of such a thing," said the cashier, and the disappointed applicant and friends drifted sadly out. On the corner they met the bank's president, who was himself just from a quiet little all-night game at the Union. They explained the case again, and the next moment the superior officer darted into the bank, seized a bag of twenties, and followed the trio. In about ten minutes he returned with the bag and an extra handful of twenties, which he flung on the counter.

"Here, credit five hundred to interest account," he said to the cashier. "Why, I thought you had more business snap, sir. Ever play poker?"

"No, sir."

"Ah! thought not—thought not. If you did you'd know what good collateral was. Remember that in future—four kings and an ace, flushes barred, are always good in this institution for our entire assets, sir—our entire assets."—San Francisco Wasp.

Gems of Thought.

IF the candid reader will examin one by one the different dogmas and rites of the Christian scheme, he will find that they were all believed in several centuries before the birth of Christianity. —D. M. Bennett.

I BELIEVE in the gospel of good living. You cannot make any god happy by fasting. Let us hav good food, and let us hav it well cooked, and it is a thousand times better to know how to cook than it is to understand any theology in the world. I believe in the gospel of good clothes; I believe in the gospel of good houses; in the gospel of water and soap. I believe in the gospel of intelligence; in the gospel of education. The school-house is my cathedral. The universe is my Bible. I believe in the gospel of justice, that we must reap what we sow.—Ingersoll.

CHRISTIANITY, from a system of positiv theology, has been reduced to an expedient, and what was once boldly preached as the truth is now uttered without earnestness, and apparently without conviction. The truth is, there is no justifiable Christianity. The last phase of the worshiping man's religion is at war with the methods or civilization and must decay. We are opposed to Christianity as organized in churches, as preached in the pulpit, as professed in the chapel, as practiced in society. It is religious experience which is outgrown and out of place in this century, and bears the same relation to our thought and faith that superstition sustains to knowledge. The priestly attempt to palm off upon the world this worn-out, played-out religion of superstitious worship is a piece of desperate impudence. The Christian manner of using the idea of a hereafter is the worst kind of gambling in futures.—L. K. Washburn.

THE same word in Hebrew (and Plato thought in Greek also) signifies "to prophecy" and "to be mad," and even among themselvs the prophets were often regarded as madmen—(1) an idea to which their frequent habit of going about naked, (2) and the performance occasionally of still more disgusting ceremonies (3) greatly contributed. That many of them were splendid poets and noble minded men there can be no doubt; but we see in conduct like this little earnest of sobriety or divine inspiration, and far too much that reminds us of the fanatics of Eastern countries and of ancient times.—Greg's Creed of Christendom. (1) And Jehu came forth to the servants of his lord, and one said unto him, Is all well? Wherefore came this mad fellow to thee? etc. (2 Kings ix, 11). (2) And Michal, the daughter of Saul, came out to meet David, and said, How glorious was the king of Israel to-day, who uncovered himself to-day in the eyes of the hand-maids of his servants as one of the vain fellows shamelessly uncovereth himself (2 Samuel vi, 20). See also 1 Samuel xix, 24, Isaiah xx, 3, and other places. (3) See Ezekiel iv, 13. I decline transcribing the passages. Let those who hav stomachs for it read it for themselvs, and those who hav more stomach may read the whole chapter, and also 1 Kings xx, 35, 38.

NOTHING hitherto was ever stranded, cast aside; but all, were it only a withered leaf, works together with all; is borne forward on the bottomless, shoreless flood of Action, and lives through perpetual metamorphoses. The withered leaf is not dead and lost, there are forces in it and around it, though working in inverse order, how else could it rot? Despise not the rag from which man makes paper, or the litter from which the earth makes corn. Rightly viewed, no meanest object is insignificant; all objects are as windows, through which the philosophic eye looks into infinitude itself.—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

IT is true that our [Unitarian] theory of life allows us greater freedom of enjoyment, indulgence of a wider range of amusements. The games and pastimes that stricter sects forbid, we enjoy. We find nothing wicked in playing cards, in dancing during reasonable hours and with right company, and even in an occasional attendance upon the best theatrical plays. But we believe that these things are only the spice of life, not its food. . . . We cannot see that they make us love God less, and we know that the permission to enjoy them makes us love our religion better.—W. L. Chaffin.

AND so beside the silent sea
I wait the muffled oar;
No harm can come from him to me
On ocean or on shore.

I know not where his islands lift
Their proudest palms in air,
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond his love and care.

—Whittier.

IF there be one thing upon the earth that mankind love and admire better than another, it is a brave man; it is the man who dares to look the devil in the face and tell him that he is a devil. —James A. Garfield.

A STEAMER 500 feet long, 62 feet wide, and 43 feet deep is being built by the Lands of Birkenhead, England. She will hav engins of 17,000 horse-power, and, barring the Great Eastern, will be the biggest vessel afloat.

THE Rev. Charles Wood, of Englewood, N. J., who shot his wife and then himself, has got well enough to be arrested upon complaint of Mrs. Ward. She believes that he shot her maliciously and with premeditation.

THE Haddock murder case is being tried at Sioux City, Iowa. The Rev. Mr. Haddock, nearly a year ago, conducted a crusade against the liquor trade, and was assassinated. The liquor dealers are accused of conniving at the murder.

IT is reported in New York that Dr. McGlynn has received a letter from Cardinal Gibbons telling him the pope is anxious to receive "a friendly visit" from him. There is nothing in the report of the pope's abdicating in McGlynn's favor.—Utica Herald.

THE pope has named Archbishop Corrigan prelate assistant to the pontifical throne. The Sun remarks that every Christian in America will rejoice at this intelligence. We don't believe it. Father McGlynn's supporters go off by themselvs and weep.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND recently quoted from Ecclesiastes, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity," etc., and the Sun said that Cleveland was "singing the Song of Solomon." Since the editor of the Sun joined the Roman Catholics he has given up reading the Bible.

THE chief of the Buffalo fire department swore in a very acceptable, gentlemanly, and heroic way, and we are proud of him for doing it. In the midst of the terrible excitement, when the flames were crackling like so many demons, he exclaimed, "Damn the building; save the people!" If there was any sin in that profanity the recording angel just dropped a convenient tear on the page and blurred the item. We should be willing to take our chances with several such damns on our conscience.—Herald.

THE Rev. Dr. Newman, ex-inspector of consultate, and now pastor of the Metropolitan church at Washington, preached a sermon the other evening on the rapid progress Christianity is making among the poor heathen of the Celestial empire, and by way of lending spectacular novelty to the entertainment, he invited the poor heathen of the Chinese Legation to come and be saved. On learning the nature of the discourse, through the assistance of their interpreter, the embassy is said to hav waxed highly wroth, and joss-danged the doctor as the cheekiest mountebank out of Hong Kong.—Puck.

MAYOR HEWITT has asked the legislature at Albany to make a law allowing special licenses to be issued for the sale of beer and wine Sunday afternoon. The Methodists and temperance people are making the air blue with their objections to the scheme.

So far from Socialism being in league with Atheism, we believe it, on the contrary, to be in closest harmony with Christianity. Socialist may not mean Christian, but Christian ought surely to imply Socialist. "Whenever the states," says F. A. Walker, in Scribner's Magazine for January, "shall undertake to do all, or a considerable part, of what Christian morality requires, it will become very socialistic indeed."—Christian Socialist.

A REPORTER of the Saginaw Courier asked Bishop Richter what Catholics would do if the prohibitory amendment should become a law. The bishop replied: "We shall simply defy the law if the prohibitory amendment passes. We get our law from God, and would go to Jackson, every one of us, before we would giv up using wine for sacramental purposes. But, then, you know, when we use the fluid it is no longer wine. Blessing it makes it the actual blood of Christ, so we would not infringe the law there."

A VERY sad case is reported of a young lady who tripped and fell while engaged in a dance, and sustained an injury which culminated in paralysis. This does not offer a subject for moralizing, for the right or wrong of things is not to be determined by accidents. An intelligent Christian lady fell while visiting a sick neighbor, and was disabled for months. Ministers of the gospel hav been attacked by fatal hemorrhages while preaching the word in the pulpit. The time has passed when any good impression can be made by conclusions that do not rest upon truth.—Christian Advocate.

SAM SMALL has been telling what a drunkard he was before he was converted. If he was half as bad a character as he pictures himself, he was about as low and brutal as men get. He broke his mother's heart and sent her to the grave, covered his wife with shame, and made his own children afraid of him. It isn't much of a man who would confess to such a record as that. After reading his confession, one is inclined to echo the remark of an old negro in a revival meeting where a new convert had been telling of his sins. "Put out dat lamp," solemnly spoke the colored brother. "Why for?" said the minister. "De vilest sinner done return," was the response.

THE London Freethinker pours this acid drop on the grave of Beecher: "Ward Beecher, the American divine, has gone hence and left his £5,000 a year and perquisits. When in Scotland last year, Beecher, in addressing a meeting of Scotch sky-pilots in Glasgow, told his brethren that the Americans were going to put up a headstone for Ingersoll when he died, and write the name of the great Scottish poet on it, 'ROBERT BURNS.' The devil-dodgers, with their usual obtuseness, didn't quite see the joke at first, but after several severe efforts it did dawn upon them, and they laughed sepulchrally. 'Colonel Bob' deserves the epitaph, for he has burnt, and continues to burn to the blistering point, the whole American preaching fraternity, Beecher included. As poor B. has 'gone before' Ingersoll, however, perhaps he will write and tell us how he likes it."

The Age of Man on the Earth.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 29, 1887, is an able article on this important subject by Mr. Arthur B. Moss.

The importance of this subject cannot be overestimated, for if the hypothesis affirmed by Messrs. Moss, Priestley, Haeckel, Watts, and other Atheistic scientists be true, "it must sooner or later produce a complete revolution in the conception entertained by man of the entire universe."

As to the opinion of Sir William Thompson, "that at least four hundred million years would be required for the earth to cool down so as to allow life to exist upon it at all," though an eminent authority, this is mere speculation; other scientists of equal authority giv different opinions, and there are no means of proving the correctness of any of them, and if there were, they hav nothing to do with "the age of man on the earth."

A considerable portion of the article is not material to the subject under consideration, and will be passed for the present to an examination of his historical evidence.

The first branch adduced is the statement that "the records of the Greeks and Romans show these great empires to hav been inhabited by civilized people as far back as 800 B.C. By the aid of tradition, the Aryan peoples may be traced back from 1500 to 1800 B.C. The Chinese may be found in a highly civilized condition, with a monarchy and government, as far back as 2500 B.C., while, according to such eminent authorities as Lepsius and Bunsen, the Egyptians hav a history that carries us back more than 4,000 years B.C."

This is rather a partisan statement, one which may mislead the reader, for the inference may be drawn from it that the Greeks, Romans, Chinese, and Egyptians at the dates here given had reached a stage of existence in which they had built great cities, had regular governments, and were "highly civilized;" but history does not prove this to hav been the case, though the Greeks and Romans had made considerable advancement on the road to civilization; yet they were far short of reaching that "high civilized condition" intimated by Mr. Moss, when we compare them with the civilized nations of the present day.

Those ancient people are known to us by four kinds of evidence: (1) Written records, (2) Architectural monuments, (3) Fragmentary remains, (4) Tradition. Of these, the first only can be considered as a true source of history, though the others afford its most interesting and valuable illustrations.

Taking this for our guide, it is evident that the Egyptians hav no true source of "history that carries us back more than 4,000 years B.C.," but we hav a tradition that the early Egyptians believed that their ancestors lived in caves in the ridges of stone which border the Nile valley, and that their greatest benefactors were Osiris and Isis, who elevated them into a civilized nation.

According to Manetho, a nativ historian who lived in the reign of Ptolemy I., 323 to 283 B.C., gods, spirits, demigods, etc., were the first rulers of Egypt. This is only a way of saying that the earliest history of Egypt, like that of most other nations, is shrouded in ignorance and fabulous conjecture.

Egypt, like those other ancient nations, commenced its existence not as a united kingdom, but consisted at first of a number of scattered nomes, petty states, or families, as they may be termed; each had for its nucleus a temple and a number of priests. Fifty of these nomes are mentioned by one, and thirty by another historian. As one became more powerful, it swallowed up its neighbors, and in this way consolidated and grew into a kingdom, which in time embraced the whole country.

The first mortal king was Menes, also called Misraim and Sesostris. He was of upper Egypt, but by his talents and exploits he made himself master of lower Egypt, and therefore may be considered the founder of the empire. Tradition says this was only something over 2,000 years B.C.

Egypt rapidly rose to eminence and power, and architectural, a more certain history, began with the second, fourth, and fifth dynasties of Manetho, which reigned simultaneously in lower, middle, and upper Egypt. Proofs of its greatness are found in the vast structures of stone and fragmentary remains which overspread the country. The structure of the pyramids shows great advancement in science and the mechanical arts.

As to the Chinese being "found in a highly civilized condition, with a monarchy and government, as far back as 2,500 years B.C.," this is wholly a gratuitous statement. It was so far from being the case that authentic history proves that only a few centuries ago they were but half-civilized, and that they are not "found in a highly civilized condition" to-day.

In connection with this statement, Mr. Moss says: "If this be true, and men did not build cities in a day, or a year, or make language in a century, then we hav to consider how long man existed on the earth previous to this, and how many years he would take to reach this stage of existence. Some parts of the earth we find inhabited by civilized men, others by barbarians, and the question naturally arises, Were all men originally savage, and hav the civilized developed from them, or were some men, or at least one man, originally created with an organization and faculties suiting him for civilized life, and are savages and civilized human beings alike his offspring?"

It is presumed, and in fact the records teach, that man was originally created with an organization and faculties suiting him for civilized life, with faculties susceptible of high mental and moral culture; that after the people migrated and settled in different parts of the earth, some under certain conditions and circumstances developed this organization and faculties, rapidly advanced in art and civilization, made language, built cities, founded empires such as Greece, Rome, Babylon, Carthage, and Egypt; and the time it took "to reach this stage of existence" was from the flood till some centuries before Christ.

On the other hand, the Chinese under certain circumstances, or conditions of existence, somewhat different, did not make any great advance in civilization, and only a few hundred years ago were semi-civilized; while, again, other peoples degenerated into abject barbarism. This is in accordance with the law promulgated by Darwin, Huxley, and other evolutionists, that a species may develop higher, it may remain stationary, or it may degenerate. Therefore this branch of history affords no evidence whatever which controverts the brief statement of the Bible.

The next branch of evidence, which I will briefly notice, is anthropology, the science which treats of the natural history of man. Mr. Moss asserts that "it proves the vast antiquity of man. Further, it reveals the important fact that man is not of one type, nor of one race, but there are at least eight realms with distinct types of man and accompanying fauna and flora."

After enumerating these eight distinct types and races, he again says: "If man were less than six thousand years old, we should hav to suppose that all these races, so diverse in type and characteristics, hav all developed from Adam, or rather, to be more accurate, and supposing the story of the flood to be true, we hav to suppose all these races to hav developed from the family of Noah. Is not this a preposterous supposition?"

This apparently is intended to convey a double meaning, to attack the Mosaic record upon two different lines—the first, that there are more than one species of men; if this is untenable, then fall back upon the second, that the period of time is too short for "all these races to hav developed from the family of Noah."

Now, as to the first. The supposition that all men are of one species is not preposterous, and if Mr. Moss intends us to understand by the phrase, "Eight distinct types and races," that there are eight different species of men, he is mistaken, for science does not teach but one species, with many varieties. Huxley says, "I cannot see any good ground whatever, or even any tenable sort of evidence, for believing that there are more than one species of man."

These remarkable varieties of men are not more "diverse in type and characteristics" than the varieties of a number of species of domestic animals. Take the horse, the sheep, the cow, and the dog, and of each of these four species there are a number of varieties as different and distinct from each other as the varieties of men. No one will pretend to say that the distinct "types of men" are more diverse than the different varieties of horses, the different varieties of cattle, or the different varieties of dogs; yet there are only one species of the horse, one species of domestic cattle, and one species of the dog.

Huxley givs for example the fox, a species of wild animal "which has a very large geographical distribution," of many varieties, with as distinct differences and peculiarities as are found in the varieties of men. The varieties of tigers "hav exceedingly different characteristics," yet they all belong to one species.

The same is true of most species of animals, both domestic and wild.

Pritchard, in his natural history, says that "no other differences occur than may fairly be attributed to the difference of external circumstances; and hence it may safely be concluded that the different races are all members of the same family, and the offspring of one common stock." It is useless to multiply authorities, for it is a fact taught by science that all the different races of men are of one species; then we are inevitably forced to the conclusion that they sprang from one original pair. Huxley says, "At present there is no evidence whatever for saying that mankind sprang originally from any more than a single pair;" and Pritchard says, "As with the race of dogs, so with the race of men; the varieties hav become permanent from one original pair."

Comparativ philology is equally strong in its support of this great fact; hence it appears that after successiv scientists hav labored with untiring energy to advance to perfection these branches of science, they prove, at least, the same facts enunciated by Moses, nearly 3,500 years ago, long before the sciences were known. Then how came Moses, in an unlearned age of the world, to possess a knowledge and to state this fact which science has only in the present century been able to reveal? It is impossible to avoid the conclusion that either he was gifted with faculties far surpassing all human experience, or else his knowledge was divine.

"Well," say our Atheistic friends, "we admit that science teaches that all the varieties of men originally sprang from one pair; that in this particular it is in accordance with the Bible;" and, moreover, we must admit that we cannot account for it except on the theory that the pen which wrote this ancient document was guided by him who designed and created every species of the animal world after its kind.

But right here arises this other point. Mr. Moss says, "Supposing the story of the flood to be true, we hav to suppose all these races developed from the family of Noah." Is not the human period as given in the Bible too short?

Not at all, and, for illustration, it is only necessary to notice a few species of domestic animals. Take the dog; we find this species has varied to a very great extent; it is well known that there are very remarkable varieties of dogs. We hav the pointer, the bulldog, the terrier, the greyhound, the bloodhound, the mastiff, and others, differing from each other to the greatest extent; yet all these important varieties, so diverse, hav arisen from the same source within much less time than the Bible givs for the development of the different varieties of men.

There are about 150 varieties of pigeons. The four which represent the most extreme divergence of one variety from another are the carrier, the pouter, the fantail, and the tumbler. There are no four varieties of men that are more diverse in type and characteristics than these four varieties of pigeons, yet they sprang from the same source—the rock pigeon.

The same is true of other species of domestic animals, but these examples are sufficient to show that if, by select breeding, or selection by man, the many varieties of dogs and of pigeons are developed with as extreme divergences of types and characteristics as are found to exist in the varieties of men in perhaps, at most, not over one-half the given length of the human period, then we may reasonably conclude that climate, station, food, and other conditions of existence would develop the different varieties of men within the period given in the Bible.

The oldest existing books are the scriptures, which alone of ancient writings briefly describe the preparation of the earth for the abode of man, the creation, the flood, and the dispersion.

It lays the foundation of all subsequent history by sketching the divisions of the human race into its three great families, and describing their earliest migration. Oriental scholars hav, by patient diligence, deciphered the inscriptions which the temples, palaces, and fragmentary remains of Egypt, Assyria, and India bear, and what is the result? They hav added immeasurably to our knowledge of those ancient times, and both corroborated and explained in a wonderful manner the brief allusions of the Bible.

Again, the question naturally arises, how shall we account for this most striking accuracy of the Mosaic records? How came Moses, in an unlearned age, to possess this knowledge and to state these great facts which successiv scientists, after ages of unceasing labor, hav only within the present century been able to reveal? We are forced to the conclusion that his knowledge must hav been divine. We cannot explain it on any other theory.

Thus signally failing to prove the Mosaic record false, or convict Moses of error, we are driven to prehistoric times—to the field of paleontology and geology. Here Mr. Moss makes another stand, and givs us this statement: "A skeleton was found some time ago at New Orleans, sixteen feet below the surface, beneath the roots of a cypress-tree, with four fossil forests above it. Humboldt supposed a tree of this kind to be six thousand years old, yet above these human remains are four fossil forests of trees, which giv us twenty-four thousand years, at least, as the time that these human remains must hav lain in the earth."

It is very easy to discover the illogical reasoning by which he arrives at this extravagant conclusion. He first conceives that Humboldt supposed a cypress-tree in some distant part of the earth to be six thousand years old, then he supposes this particular tree to be six thousand years old; then he supposes each of these fossil forests to be six thousand years old; then, upon this batch of suppositions, he asserts "twenty-four thousand years, at least, as the time that these human remains must hav lain in the earth." Now, does he imagin that any sensible person will accept such a conclusion, based, as it is, solely upon a medley of unconnected and unsupported suppositions? Such an idea is simply preposterous.

Mr. Moss will certainly giv to other people all the right of supposing which he claims for himself; then, we think that Humboldt supposed a cypress-tree somewhere in some distant land to be five hundred years old (a very great age); then we suppose this particular tree above this skeleton to be five hundred years old; then we suppose each of these fossil forests to be five hundred years old; then, according to Mr. Moss's logic, we draw a veritable conclusion that two thousand years, at most, was the time that these human remains must hav lain in the earth. This would only carry us back about two hundred years before Christ. These conclusions are very wide apart, but ours is just as tenable, in fact, much nearer correct, than that given by Mr. Moss.

Again, he says, "We hav the discovery of human remains in Kent's Cavern, which was made known by William Pengelly, who claims three hundred thousand years as the lowest estimate for man's existence in England." Now, as to the time of "man's existence in England" it is only speculation or guess-work; then suppose we cut off two ciphers from the right of Mr. Pengelly's figures, and we hav 3,000 years, a period approximating correctness, and which more accords with the evidence than that given by Messrs. Moss and Pengelly.

The remainder of his article amounts to about this: "Man lived in the midst of the quaternary fauna," and from this he arrived at a conclusion expressed by the phrase, "Vast antiquity of man." Now, this is too vague and indefinit; it is tantamount to no argument at all, for it does not prove nor giv us any tangible idea of the length of the geological period of homo sapiens, the very thing which is now indispensable before proceeding further if he wishes to overthrow the Bible account of creation.

It is true that the remains of man are found in the deposits of the Quaternary age, but no such remains hav been found which carries the human period back more than a few thousand years. As yet I maintain that the Mosaic record and science are reconcilable, both as to the creation of man and the flood. Probably Mr. Moss will next discuss the geological history of "man as man," and the flood. These will require a considerable article without touching the question of the "origin and descent of man."

We will not "scornfully throw aside the Biblical six thousand years" until we hav proven it to be false. So far Mr. Moss's efforts hav been a failure. He has just reached the fighting ground, and I suppose he will contest every inch of it.

Mrs. Colman's Reminiscences.

When I went to Michigan, Spiritualism was rioting like some outbreak of disease. Circles were the order of the day, and of the night. Though I believed at that time in the phenomena as spiritual, I could not consent to be dictated to in my work by spirits. Spirits had always existed since the advent of humanity, as had God; why had they, like God, been so dilatory in their work? I preferred to do my own work, and be resposible for its success or failure.

The Indian spirits had not then introduced themselvs. They were mostly one's own personal friends, or some noted man, like John Quincy Adams, or some minister—if among the Methodists, John Wesley; among the Friends, George Fox, or Elias Hicks. Their communications were by raps or tips, and some people were entranced and delivered speeches, not always full of wisdom, but often seemingly above the capacity of the medium.

The subject more generally dwelt upon was the inharmonies of social and domestic life, and more than one couple released themselvs from their partnership by and through the advice of the spirits. I remember one woman who, with her husband, was traveling, giving discourses upon the development of "The Love Principle." Their outfit was a hand-cart, containing their wardrobe, some pictures which they offered for sale; and two children accompanied them. The husband drew the cart, the wife walked, and the children alternated, sometimes riding in the cart, at other times walking.

These people were so refined that they ate no meat, nor anything that grew in the dark, like garden vegetables; but as they asked the hostess (who had taken them to keep over Sunday) for eggs for their breakfast, I suggested that it would be very improper to eat eggs, as they surely grew in the dark. They, however, ate the eggs with a relish, and their spirituality was not perceptibly diminished. The wife told me she had never been so happy since she was married as then. She felt now that she was helping the spirits to improve the world; and surely I do not know that she was not.

The most remarkable case of Spiritualism that came under my notice was that of a young married woman, constantly controled by the spirits, who refused all food for weeks together. She was informed by her own hand, spiritually controled, that she must refuse longer to be the wife of her husband, that even her little daughter, being the fruit of lust, was on a low plane, and association with her much would hav a degrading effect upon the mother; but if she would faithfully follow spirit direction, refusing food, etc., she would become a spirit without death, as the material of which her body was composed would pass off, particle by particle, without any inconvenience to herself. She practiced as directed, became not a spirit but a skeleton, left her home, became an inmate of a spiritual community, but, after a year or more, awoke to the use of common sense, returned to the city, and would gladly hav returned to her home, but the door was closed against her. She lived a strange life, was for some years the wife of another husband, who proved thriftless in all things. She adopted the profession of spiritual healer, accumulated an independent property, shirked further care of the husband, and when last I saw her was really a charming woman. I never felt like decrying or defaming this woman. She had accepted this new doctrin as a religion, and faithfully she kept its commands. The wrong is in giving up one's own sense, and listening to counsel that we do not understand. There was, no doubt, back of all this that I hav related, a bitterness that none but a woman married to a coarse, uncongenial husband could appreciate.

When the convention which Mrs. Post and myself had attended adjourned, she prepared to go home; and as I had promised to speak in Detroit, I concluded to go with her on her way home and fulfil the engagement. Mrs. Wallace had obtained a house, and the meeting was advertised. We had a peaceful meeting, but not large. Mrs. Wallace had been often employed in sewing for the Ward family. Captain Ward, reputed rich—he who afterward employed a medium to advise him in his business, so it was said—she (Mrs. Wallace) was confident if I would make application to him, he would make a donation to the slave's cause; so she undertook to introduce me. I hav often been refused money, sometimes with insolence, but I do not remember to hav ever been more grossly insulted than by this same gentleman. As I recall his words and looks, happening nearly forty years ago, my indignation returns, and I find that in all these years I hav not forgiven him. My colored friend was astonished beyond measure. This was before A. J. Davis had borrowed from the Russian a "diakka," else we might suppose some one of the supposed infernals possessed him. Some of the scriptures are so applicable to people of this time that I like to quote from them: "Let no man say, when he is tempted of evil, he is tempted of God [spirits], for God [spirit] cannot be tempted of evil, neither tempteth he any man; but every man is tempted when he is drawn away by his own lusts and enticed."

It seems to me quite as dishonorable to put our own wrong-doing upon spirits as it is for a Christian to go into heaven upon the merits of another. Let me, at least, bear the fruits of my wrong-doing, as well as the honor of a good deed, or, if not honor, my own satisfaction. I can't feel that the Spiritualists gain anything over the Christians in having so many gods as guardian spirits, or so large a number of evil spirits rather than a devil. I should feel like the little girl who would not allow her little dog to follow her because "'twas bad enough to hav God tagging after her without a dog also." Too many attendants of any kind are not agreeable.

I hav spun out my reflections upon Captain Ward to more length than was requisit, and will say, "Peace to his ashes." After leaving Detroit, I went to Ypsilanti, and worked in that region. I found a good home with S. D. Moore and wife, one of the subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER for some years past. He is an old man, but his letters always giv me the impression of a good hand-shake. His wife, a good woman, "has passed on." Mr. Moore took me around the country and spoke with me wherever he could find a house open to us. We met with some hostil words, but with neither blows nor stones.

I then went to Ann Arbor, where is located the State College. There was a little society in that place composed mostly of "progressiv Friends." They had a small meeting-house and it was open to anyone who wished to use it for the slave's cause. I had no difficulty in this city; the students of the college did not get aroused to deeds of violence, but a few months later, while an antislavery meeting was in session, addressed by a gentleman, the students, with "some others of the baser sort," attacked the speaker, broke the windows of the little church, demolished the seats, and completely broke up the meeting. I found a home in the family of a Quaker minister, who, I hav been told, was very popular in that order. He was a very tyrant in his family; his eldest son told me that he had often flogged him, but the last time he attempted it he refused, at his order, to remove his coat, but said, "Sir, if you wish to fight, I'm ready; yesterday I should hav obeyed you, but to-day I'm a man—twenty-one years old." Such was Christian parental authority forty years ago. Sixty years ago I knew a Methodist elder stop three times in his morning prayer and severely whip his child, a mere baby, because it would not keep still through the service. "Spare the rod and spoil the child" was a lesson well learned by some of our fathers and mothers of the olden time.

Comstock's Character.

The Assembly Committee, in its endeavor to find out why pool-selling upon horse races was allowed on Long Island last summer, has dragged out more damaging disclosures of Anthony Comstock's character. Monday, March 21st, District-Attorney Ridgway, of Brooklyn, was again upon the witness-stand. The New York Herald reports his testimony as follows:

"What I wish to ask you is," said Mr. Parsons, counsel for Comstock's society, in striking the keynote of the chimes of disclosure that followed, "who were the accused to whom you referred last Saturday as having been indicted on June 30, 1884, and who came and gave bail through surreptiticus information received from Mr. Comstock's officers, Messrs. Britton and Oram?"

Mr. Ridgway could not recall the names, but said that he could readily obtain them by reference to the records of his office. Then, attention being called to a number of pool-selling and gambling cases that were nolle prossed on the night before Mr. Ridgway took office, by his predecessor, General Catlin, Mr. Ridgway was asked whether the grand jury had power to indict on other than the testimony of reputable witnesses. He said that Mr. Comstock had endeavored to hav General Catlin indicted on a written statement, but the grand jury refused to consider the complaint, and dismissed it altogether. (Applause.) The mention of Comstock's name excited applause for Ridgway, and Committeeman Arnold was obliged to say that the audience was becoming objectionable in its conduct.

"Now, Mr. Ridgway, has Mr. Comstock made himself obnoxious to you?" asked Mr. Parsons.

"Yes. Before I became district attorney he sent one little boy to buy an obscene sleeve button from another little boy, who was the only son of a widow, and I defended the prisoner gratuitously." (Applause.)

"Mr. Ridgway, I will giv you the entire range of anything you may know or hav heard of concerning Mr. Comstock."

"Well, sir," answered the district attorney, with his gaze upon Mr. Comstock, who sat between Lawyers Parsons and Goodrich without a blush or a shiver at the evidences of public antipathy or the cutting statements made by Mr. Ridgway, "his attitude, his manner, and the means that he resorts to for gaining notoriety by prosecuting people, as well as the fact that reputable people hav told me they would not believe him under oath, hav formed a very strong impression upon my mind. Hundreds of people hav spoken to me about him."

"You hav mentioned a number of gentlemen—Leonard W. Jerome, Perry Belmont, Belmont Purdy, and Wright Sanford—hav these gentlemen spoken to you about Mr. Comstock?" inquired Mr. Parsons, with a yawn as though he fain would not impress any degree of importance to the question.

"Oh, yes, sir," was the answer, "I think they hav. They talked of him as a public nuisance." (Laughter.)

"On what circumstance do you base the accusation that Mr. Comstock, or persons in his employment, is guilty of blackmail?"

"One of the circumstances was that which got McDougal acquitted—the denial that he was the guilty man by Comstock and Britton. Another circumstance was the conversation, which I hav already quoted, that took place in the grand jury anteroom with Mr. Leonard Jerome, Mr. Wright Sanford, Mr. Lawrence, and Mr. Hecksher. Mr. Jerome said, pointing to the Comstock emissaries: 'These men can continue their persecutions just as long as they see fit. They will not get a single dollar out of the Coney Island Jockey Club.'"

"Hav you ever spoken of Mr. Comstock as a blackmailer?" Mr. Parsons asked, in a low tone that could hardly be heard.

"Well, I had a conversation once with Joseph A. Britton, his chief man," was the evasiv answer. "He called on me soon after I went into office and said that Comstock was a scoundrel and a rascal, and that if he could be persuaded to hav confidence in me he would giv me information on which Comstock could be sent to Sing Sing. He asked me if I were a Mason. (Laughter.) I said I was not. Britton said he would come to see me again, but I told him that if he were false to his employer he should never come near me again."

Mr. Parsons was much subdued after this statement, and pursued his inquiries concerning the man in whom he had expressed so much confidence with greater caution. Mr. Ridgway finally admitted that he had never called Comstock a blackmailer in so many words. He had, however, said that he believed Comstock participated in the extortions practiced.

"From whom did you obtain information?" queried Mr. Parsons, with a trembling voice, "on which you base these statements?"

"On, it was generally reported that pool rooms in New York had to pay a weekly stipend to Comstock. And some time ago, when policy shops were raided, entries were found on the books seized such as "Cash, A. C.," so many dollars, or, "A. Comstock, cash."

Mr. Parsons smiled a deathly smile, and said he was glad to hav Mr. Ridgway tell him "these things," but he wished he would giv him the name of some person on whose statement the district attorney based the belief that Comstock was a blackmailer.

"Well, sir, the chief of the secret service of the United States, Mr. Drummond," said Mr. Ridgway, with evident emotion, and the silence that followed was so intense that had any one of the hundreds of eyes that were focussed on the unflinching Mr. Comstock winked just once the action of the eyelids would hav been plainly audible.

The Moral is that the Story is Probably a Lie.

One day some five years ago, John ——, a profane carpenter, who oscillates between Waterville and Sherburne, villages in the Chenango Valley, in the prosecution of his trade, while very angry with one of his men for spoiling some work, started to utter an oath, but instantly became speechless. Less swearing was done in the valley on this account for a long while, and the story ran far and wide. John shortly joined the church, but his voice did not come back until a year ago, when, becoming very angry again, and forgetting that he was speechless, he started to swear—and did swear, to his own utter amazement and that of all in hearing. He has since used his voice without difficulty.—Syracuse Standard.

Editors are supposed to know everything—can you find a moral to fit this? I am pained to think that this incident points to the conclusion that swearing is one of the fine arts and deserving encouragement.

John, the profane carpenter, did not swear vigorously enough, and was punished by being made speechless. When he again started to swear, his thoughts were concentrated on the biggest kind of an oath, and he was blessed by the recovery of his speech. This seems a fair inference, but I defer to your judgment.

News and Notes.

I left Prescott, Arizona, Monday afternoon, March 14th. It is seventy-five miles from the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad. There are about three houses along the whole route. However, it is a lovely ride. The vast ranges of mountains stretch on every side —the San Francisco peaks, where Fremont's party was lost in 1846, and fed on dead horses; Bill Williams's mountain; the Granit mountain, etc. Away they roll and glitter for hundreds of miles in the dazzling azure and lustrous gold, and the desert sands shine like a pavement of marble wrought with gleaming colors. Half-way down the long incline we stop at Barnhart's Hotel, the only hotel and house for a space of thirty miles. What a monopolist this landlord is! He allows no competition even for a private dwelling. He takes the cake for a bloated capitalist. The engin that supplied water for the locomotiv broke down, and the prospect was that we should remain all night long in this solitary tavern for lack of steam, or foot it to Prescott Junction. Finally good fortune prevailed, and we proceeded, but I thought every minute we should run off the track, which at times undulated like the waves of the sea. But the wheels hung on, in spite of every variety of motion, and with a whole skin we arrived safely at our jolly Falstaffian landlord's, who made us forget all the ills of life with his vivacious obesity. I think he must hav a jew's-harp in every bone of his body, he was so musical. He would make a jolly archangel. The train was seven hours late, and we were obliged to bunk in the freight-car, and rest our weary bones on Uncle Sam's mail bags. I suppose if Anthony Comstock had been present he would hav arrested us for violation of the postal laws. No Freethinker should find repose for his derelict flesh on these sacred leathern receptacles. However, we slept well, listening to the clicking of the telegraph wires, and occasionally disturbed by the fleeting feet of dusky Indian maidens, who flashed alongside with their crimson blankets, and in the "dim religious light" one might imagin them to be beautiful, but "distance lends enchantment to the view." The Indians are the ugliest-looking people I ever came across. They havn't a particle of grace, and they can not compare for muscular power with the white man. Most of the "braves" that I saw seemed to be in the last stages of consumption. The talk of an Indian being "straight as an arrow" is simply nonsense. I didn't see anyone of that style. Even the young men hav hollow chests and crooked legs. Civilization is altogether in favor of manly beauty. The Indian squaw is terrifically homely and dirty.

In the early morning the train came along; we dashed over the Colorado river into the deserts of California, climbing long ranges of hills. I expected the moment I struck California to see flowers. But for hundreds of miles only waste mountain lands present themselvs, scarcely a green blade to be seen. Not until we come to San Bernardino valley does the glory of California burst upon the view, and its tropical magnificence of fruit and flower appear. I was too late to lecture or see friends at San Bernardino, as I hoped to do, and I was obliged to go on to San Diego. What shall I say of this most lovely spot, the paradise of the world, where snow never mantles the soil, but shines only on the distant summits that fringe the infinit sky? Here Winter is like an eternal spring, and summer's bosom moves with soft refreshing gales. A busy mart this is, San Diego, fronting the broad Pacific, ready to take the commerce of the world, with its beautiful, wonderful harbor fifteen miles long, never disturbed by storms, and where a thousand ships might float and mingle the flags of every nation in peaceful glory. With what joy I looked upon the vast Pacific, stretching seven thousand miles away, and watched its prancing waves, as, like glittering, white-robed steeds, they came dashing on in battalions miles in length along the strand, and rolled back in music and broken splendor, unable to conquer the immovable land! Glorious sea, delightful shores! fringed with glowing gardens, where oranges and lemons jewel the verdant picture all the year round, and blooms are unending from month to month, and every day a splendid harvest drops its wealth. Back of all this lustrous scene tower the mountains, six thousand and ten thousand feet high, in superb beauty and majesty. I am in love with this land, and do heartily wish that I could by a few corner lots and rest here in peace and independence. Corner lots are almost as high as New Jerusalem in this country. They are good things to hold on to if you hav any desire to go up. Alas! my bank account forbids the exhilarating ascent, and therefore I must be a wanderer still, and quit this magnificent sea and sky with happy memories and anticipations of a longer sojourn yet to be.

It used to be said of San Diego that it had plenty of climate and nothing else. But now it is a vigorous business place and an elegant resort for thousands of travelers. It is full of people all the time, hundreds coming and going each day. Its population has trebled in the last two years. It now numbers twelve thousand. It must be the center of a great trade when the net-work of railroads is completed, and the commerce of the "gorgeous East" floats to its incomparable bay. Corronado Beach promises to make one of the most brilliant sea cities in the world. Hundreds of lots hav already been sold, and advanced in value to thousands of dollars, and beautiful cottages are being built. A hotel of enormous proportions is to be erected—a palace indeed—with five hundred rooms, a stately court, and all the conveniences and adornments of modern life. Summer and winter rival each other here in beauty and softness, and every day of the year one can bathe in the sparkling billows. Mountainous islands gem the horizon, the blue sea rolls away to China and Australia, the bright hills of Mexico girt the southern view; to the west, and east, and northward circle the picturesque peaks with blazing crowns of snow, and San Diego and National City hold dominion over the fruitful lands between. If one seeks for health and luxury, this is the appointed place.

And the people are as good as the climate—genial, generous, progressiv, and Liberal in thought. Wm. A. Allen is our pioneer friend in this movement, a typical American, who has been all over this continent, with varied fortune, undaunted by any adversity, and always getting ahead, no matter what his luck. It was through his interest and enthusiasm that these lectures hav been given in San Diego, and that a grand success has been achieved. He spared neither time nor money for the cause. I was glad to meet such a thorough-going reformer. The first thing we did was to go over to National City and find A. N. Burgess, whose lively communications to THE TRUTH SEEKER hav no doubt been noted. He is a whole-souled Liberal. Freethought is in every bone in his body. He was built that way, and orthodoxy has never had a chance to capture his overflowing spirits. He took us at once to his home, Mrs. Dr. Potts's Sanitarium, on Paradise Mount—well named, for the situation is delightful, and the buildings of royal proportions, stately and handsome, with every comfort; and here is where the sick in heart and body can find the healing balm on this sunny eminence overlooking the bay and city and measureless sea, amid orange groves and thousands of flowers blooming all the seasons round. I wanted to stay a month or two in this Eden of my wide wanderings, and I almost wished that I was sick, in order that I might hav the pleasure of getting well in this splendid retreat. Mr. Burgess has charge of the place, and he knows how to keep things at their best. He and Mrs. Burgess are most companionable Freethinkers, and their entertaining hospitality made me wish I had a week, instead of a day, to spend on Paradise Mount.

The Burgess family are a big element in this country. There are fourteen in all, and most are of the Liberal order, and they all keep pretty steadily at the front. Mr. Frank Burgess and W. W. Burgess are brothers of A. N., and are just like him in Freethought and enterprise.

Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Shaug came twenty-five miles to attend the lectures. It was a pleasure to greet such noble friends, and I hope to accept their kind invitation and see them in their home in the happy valleys overlooking the sea.

I was glad to meet our mighty veteran, Dr. Abram Bronson, who has written for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and who, at the age of eighty, still bears the armor of the soldier.

Mr. W. E. Rowe is another activ Liberal, and I was pleased to meet him and his wife and daughter; also Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Morse, Mr. and Mrs. James Bidwell, Captain Smith, Mr. Hunt, formerly of New York; Mr. Richmond Savaile, of the Philadelphia League; Mrs. M. C. Kasten, who furnished excellent music for our lectures; Henry H. Nichols, J. M. Ashbaugh, E. Nichols, P. H. Grost, H. C. Coddington, Mrs. T. D. Newton, Wm. Callard, Señor Aramiyo, a Mexican Freethinker; John Meklasck, John Moore, R. Worthing, etc. The lectures were well attended in spite of many other attractions. The audience on the second evening was twice as large as on the first, and the newspaper notices were exceedingly favorable.

There is a Liberal society already established here, doing good work. It will probably unite with our national force and take out a charter in the Union.

This is a favorable point, and I think I shall hav to return, perhaps in the month of May. The friends here are exceedingly desirous of pushing the work right along. I am in hopes that Dr. York will come and aid the people here with his enthusiastic utterances. At any rate, I announced his coming, and I guess he will obey the summons.

My good friend, A. N. Burgess, gave me a glittering gold piece as a personal souvenir when saying good-bye, and I intend to carry it about in my pocket for luck as long as I liv; only when I get ready to shuffle off this mortal coil I'll buy with it a good square meal in remembrance of my San Diego trip. I feel quite sure now that fortune will smile upon me, and that some day I shall be a rich man. Friend Burgess has given me a good start and I will stick to it.

I am now on my way to Los Angeles, Santa Ana, Norwalk, Tulare City, Visalia, San Francisco, and Oakland. I shall be in these latter places April 3d and 10th; in San José, April 17th and 24th; in Stockton, May 1st and 8th; in Sonoma, Sacramento, and other places until June; in Oregon and Washington Territory, June and July, as already noted.

The Liberal Club.

The price of admission to the Manhattan Liberal Club remains at the low figure which has heretofore prevailed—namely, five cents—ladies and Presbyterians being admitted free; the former because they are ornamental, and the latter for their own spiritual good. If the club has one benevolent object in view more than any other, it is to civilize the Presbyterians. When the writer of these records threw the vivifying rays from his badge-pin upon Treasurer Morris and handed him two five-cent pieces instead of one, that official appeared greatly surprised, and during the excitement several persons walked in without paying anything. There was a large audience present.

Mr. J. Beverley Robinson was the speaker of the evening, "Anarchism and Christianity" being his subject, and, when introducing him, Mr. Wakeman said he would not repeat his previous words about the young man, as it might embarrass Mr. Robinson to hear himself so highly spoken of. Mr. Robinson, who is a fine-looking young man, said that he regarded Anarchism as the lineal descendant of primitiv Christianity, which died an early death. Since the days of Constantine Christianity has been what paganism was before that time. Anarchism comes forward to preach again the doctrin of non-resistance to evil; it is a protest against all violence. There is no reason why our law should be respected except that it has the brute force to compel obedience. It has no moral authority. We breed big men financially, and crush out great men judged by any other standard. The power of the church is no longer theological, but political, as in former days. Bismarck and Leo clasping their bloody hands show this. The respect once yielded to revelation is now yielded to revelation's enemy, science. The authority of an alleged God being destroyed, it is time to assert the supremacy of moral law. Tear down the prisons, discharge the police force, disband the army and militia, dismantle the forts, put the navy out of commission. Abolish force everywhere. This is the new moral and religious dispensation of Anarchism, and this is primitiv Christianity, and the Anarchist of to-day reaches back through the centuries to clasp hands with the Galilean reformer.

Mr. Wakeman said this had been a remarkable lecture. He did not believe that Christians would relish it. Discussion was then invited in speeches of ten minutes each, members of the club having preference. Nobody came forward until the Chair said that it hoped no time would be lost through the modesty of our philosophers.

Mr. Boucher began a speech on the floor, and was invited to the platform. Mr. Boucher remarked that the Chair knew he couldn't do well on a platform and wanted him to make a failure. Besides, he wished to speak for only a moment. The Chair repudiated all evil intentions against Mr. Boucher, and then that gentleman proceeded to speak for nearly half an hour. The lecture, he said, was a concrete non sequitur, and a reaction to a reaction. He then began to trace the progress of mankind from earliest times. He had reached the Middle Ages, when the audience rebelled, and the Chair did its duty.

Mr. Hertig, of Chicago, being invited to offer some remarks, said that coming out of the rowdy West he felt embarrassed in appearing for the first time before a metropolitan audience. Mr. Hertig had been profoundly impressed by the parallel between primitiv Christianity and modern Anarchism. He regarded Jesus as a type of the discontented, and as one of the most common productions of every age. The difference between him and the modern social reformer was that Jesus offered his followers checks on the hereafter as a reward, while his representativ of to-day offers checks payable here and now. The hereafter, Mr. Hertig believed, was a rather shaky institution. Ministers of the gospel preach future bliss with great hesitation.

Dr. Weeks threw out the thought that the preaching of Anarchism of this sort would convert Christians to Jesus. The doctor didn't believe Jesus worked miracles. Miracles were chestnuts in even those days. Jesus taught that God was a father instead of a tyrant, and in many things the doctor would agree with him.

Mr. Sutherland was glad this lecture had been delivered, because it was the flower and bloom of Anarchism, the best that could be said on the subject, and probably not six persons who had heard it took the least stock in it.

Colonel Hinton said that the article by Ingersoll in THE TRUTH SEEKER last week contained a great fallacy so far as it touched upon Socialism. This arose from a misapprehension in Colonel Ingersoll's mind as to what Socialism is.

Mr. Warwick, from Brooklyn, the next speaker, admitted that how to deal with the criminal and vicious was a great problem. Non-resistance would not solve it, and if a man assaulted him he would lock him up if he could.

Herr Oppenheimer followed. First knocking out Mr. Sutherland, he proceeded to say that he was down on the program to demolish Ingersoll before the end of the month. Herr Oppenheimer will look better when shearing time has had a chance to do its perfect work.

An attractiv program is presented for the month of April. Mrs. Clara Neymann will speak, the 1st, on "Dangers Ahead!" Next Leander Thompson will take off the "Scum of Society;" then "Illusions of Legislation" will be dispelled by the Hon. Dennis McMahon. On the 22d Colonel Hinton tells "The True Story of John Brown and His Men," of whom the colonel himself was one. The 29th will be signalized by Herr Marx Oppenheimer's discourse on "Col. R. G. Ingersoll and Socialism." Herr Oppenheimer ought to swap dates with Mrs. Neymann. Mr. Wakeman's retiring address as president of the club is also down for the last of the month, and the annual election of officers will likewise take place. Mr. Wakeman's resignation is before the club, but he will probably meet with armed resistance in trying to get it accepted. This world centers at New York, New York centers at the Liberal Club, and the Liberal Club centers in its president. When the sun retires from the solar system it will be time for Mr. Wakeman to resign his position. Until then any overture he may make in that direction will be ruled out of order, and the regular business will proceed.

Lecturing in Nebraska.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In coming to Nebraska on a lecture tour the last days of January, I did not expect to be employed more than a few weeks. Yet here are the spring days upon us, and the prospect of several weeks more of lecture work before we leave for Colorado.

My first stopping-place, after leaving Denver, was Minden, where D. S. Newbold met me with a carriage, and in the evening presented me to a full house six miles from the town. The audience gave us a cordial greeting.

Next night a large turnout at Newark. D. S. Newbold and wife, Asa Smith and wife, Jason T. Bloodgood, wife and children, and many other families were present—clear-thinking, independent farmers—despisers of fashion and sham. From such will come the backbone of the Freethought movement. An Infidel who keeps a grocery and is afraid to express his honest convictions—"Good Lord, deliver us!"

Alexander S. Bleyer was my correspondent with reference to a series of lectures at Central City. C. A. Stitzer, J. B. Traver, and many others worked vigorously to make the meetings prosperous. I hav a list of sixty-five names at Central City. Good audiences, many Christian ladies and gentlemen, attended and gave very respectful attention throughout. A Baptist clergyman, the Rev. W. H. Edger, was a punctual attendant. He came forward, was introduced, and we had several pleasant chats. He is a manly man notwithstanding the damaging fact that he is a minister. He owns the church he preaches in. Perhaps that is why he is so independent. Good idea! Let each minister own his own church. I gave six lectures.

John Ross, Morgan James, Thomas Reagan, and a large company besides, are the undaunted of Osceola. In Indiana several years ago I became acquainted with Mr. and Mrs. James, and Mr. and Mrs. Reagan. Mrs. Reagan and Mrs. James are sisters. The aged father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. Ventress, are living with the former. Seth Henshaw, of Greensboro, Ind., was a relativ of theirs. Mr. and Mrs. Ventress were vigorous Abolitionists in the trying times. Now they are peacefully waiting to cross the river to summerland life. They are Spiritualists without the least reservation, but sensible Infidels as well.

A Methodist parson, the Rev. S. P. Mather, foamed, fumed, and fretted himself into a fever. He finally capped the climax by saying in his pulpit, "The devil is coming to town." When I arrived I found a fine audience. It was a good advertisment—cheap, too.

My patriarchal friend, Morgan James, in his introduction remarked that he had the pleasure of making the audience acquainted with his brimstone highness. I took the occasion by the horns, and gave a history of what I had been doing for several centuries in making this world fit to liv in.

By giving three lectures on Sunday, I packed in five lectures in forty-eight hours before excellent audiences.

F. F. Vogel, Mr. Headstrom, and a host of others made the three lectures at Stromsburg a rousing time. The name of their hall reminds one of Brother Gardner—"Lime Kiln Hall." Splendid Liberals here.

John N. Gouff and several energetic helpers made the work boom at Wilber. We had the use of the fine, large brick court-house. There was good interest, and a strong desire among Christians to debate. I leave a challenge in every town, as our distinguished friend, Andrew Johnson, left a flag and a copy of the Constitution when he, too, was on a tour.

The Baptist clergyman called at the residence of my host and hostess, Mr. and Mrs. Gouff, to see me. We had a two hours' frank conversation. On the following Sunday forenoon he preached against Infidelity. He came down from his pulpit, warmly shook hands with me, and hoped he had "not been too severe in his remarks." I said: "Not at all. It is just what I like. Pitch in, do your best, and may truth win." The day before, I suggested that we hav a friendly debate, but could not prevail upon him to join issue; so in the afternoon I replied to his long-range sermon.

Mr. and Mrs. Carpenter are the outspoken Freethinkers of Waverly. I gave two lectures to middling-sized audiences. Considerable bigotry among Christians, and some moral cowardice among half-hearted Liberals. In fact, Waverly is about the most languishing town I hav encountered upon the trip.

In Memory of Beecher.

The following resolutions in memory of Henry Ward Beecher were passed by the Pittsburgh Secular Society at their regular meeting, Sunday, March 13, 1887:

WHEREAS, By the death of Henry Ward Beecher the Pittsburgh Secular Society recognizes the fact that this country has lost a good and wise man, one of her foremost citizens—good because he was magnanimous, benevolent, industrious, just, and temperate; wise, in that he taught that for centuries the brotherhood of man has been marred by the perpetuation of old ideas, creeds, and dogmas, because he proclaimed the necessity of truth wherever found. Of all the gospel ministers, he was about the nearest to being what Secularists believe ministers of the nineteenth century ought to be. He was an enemy of superstition and sectarian bigotry, and a warm friend of science; a man who progressed with the times. He loved his fellow-man, and made the world better for having lived in it; therefore,

Resolved, That it is eminently fitting that we should place upon record our feelings of appreciation for his services and regret for his loss.

Resolved, That with the greatest respect for the religious belief of the deceased and his family, this society extend its deepest sympathy to the bereaved relativs and friends, hoping that even in the sadness of their affliction they may yet find some consolation in knowing that the worth of his private qualities and the value of his public services are properly appreciated.

Lecture by the New Male Star.

[Report made by a lady after the present style of reporting women's lectures.]

A fair-sized audience assembled last night to hear the new male star in the lecture firmament.

He had been heralded as a "second Castelar," a "John Bright in miniature," etc., etc. Expectation was therefore on tip-toe, and all of the good-looking ladies took front seats, of course.

At exactly eight o'clock Mr. Newman stepped upon the stage. He is a small man, with large, luminous brown eyes, and fair complexion.

He wore his hair cut short and parted on the left side, about an eighth of an inch from the middle. It looked as thought it was used to a good brush, and had received some attention from a first-class barber from time to time. His collar, which was linen and of the usual style, stood firm and close about a shapely throat, and a small white necktie told where it joined upon the shirt. Mr. Newman wore a shield bosom shirt, with three small diamonds glistening upon its snowy surface, and another gem gleamed from the third finger of his shapely left hand. His cuff-buttons were of the most correct style, and his cuffs, which were of white linen, were visible below the cuff of an evening coat of black broadcloth. His coat was lined with black satin, and hung upon him gracefully. From beneath his trousers peeped the daintiest of feet, encased in patent-leather shoes.

The shoes were tied with silk strings. During the lecture one of the strings became untied, but the plucky little lecturer appeared not to notice it. Mr. Newman has small teeth and a very winning smile. He used his hands with the best possible effect, to show that they were white and delicate. We feel sure that if all lecturers on Timbuctoo were so delightful, the whole female population at least would soon be converted to his way of thinking.

The charming little man will lecture in Chicago next week.

He received much applause and a recall. The subject of his lecture was, as near as we gathered, "The Nativs of Timbuctoo." He said that they lived there, and were as comfortable as could be expected under all the circumstances; that otherwise it was folly, and if it were not so it was largely due to destiny.

The lecture then closed amid renewed applause, during which the plucky little man bowed himself off the stage.

We neglected to state that Mr. Newman wore a watch, with chain and charm attachment. The watch was worn in the upper left-hand vest pocket, and the chain was very evidently gold.

Those who had the good fortune to meet the brilliant little man say that he had an overcoat and hat of the most correct style. But this we did not see, and so can only vouch for the real literary feast we hav reported above. His necktie buckled in the back.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. S. BELL is arranging for a debate with the Rev. Mr. Purvis at Farmersville, Ind.

THE Secular Society of Denver, Col., Mr. F. J. Truss, president, Mr. John G. Jenkins, secretary, hav this to say of W. F. Jamieson's lecture on "Thomas Paine," delivered in Unity church: "'The Military and Political Life of Thomas Paine' was the best effort since his engagement by our society. The audience was raised to a high pitch of interest. The eloquence of the speaker, as he portrayed the deeds of the heart devoted to human liberty, the mighty power of intellect that could perceive centuries ahead of his fellows, the self-sacrificing patriotism that laid purse and life on the altar of liberty, and the earnest appeal that justice be done the mighty and majestic, though much maligned, hero, touched the living springs of sympathy and justice in the hearts of those seated before him." Mr. Jamieson is yet lecturing in Nebraska nearly every night, and two or three times Sundays. Address at Lowell, Neb.

THE Kalamazoo Herald of the 21st ult. says: "A very good audience assembled at the opera house last evening to hear Ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds's secular address. The gentleman chose for his subject, 'Religious Persecutions of the Nineteenth Century.' He is a speaker of more than ordinary ability, and his manner of handling his theme was picturesque and attractiv. It cannot be said that his arguments were particularly new, since, like everything else, there is nothing new to be said on this subject. But they were advanced with some originality and no little dramatic power, and those who attended were well entertained." The Kalamazoo, Mich., Morning Gazette says of Mr. Reynolds's lecture in that town on the 22d ult.: "A large audience greeted ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds at the opera house on Sunday evening. Mr. Reynolds is an able and eloquent exponent of Freethought, possessing much humor and great dramatic ability. He was for twelve years a very earnest and devoted minister of the Seventh Day Adventists. Three years ago he was induced to investigate the 'reasons of his faith and hope' through the missionary zeal of our outspoken, Liberal, and popular townsman, Mr. Elias H. Gault, then a resident of Rochester, New York. Mr. Reynolds made his debut on the Liberal rostrum at a convention of the New York Freethinkers' Association, held at the Academy of Music, Rochester, New York, in September, 1883, delivering a glowing eulogy on D. M. Bennett, the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER.'

Business Notes.

IF anyone has a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 8, 1879, that he does not want, Mr. F. G. Smith, of Albany, Mo., will buy it.

OUR friends in Chicago living or doing business near Adams street will find copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER for sale at P. O. News Co.'s store, 103 Adams street. The place is just opposit the post-office. The P. O. News Co. can also supply TRUTH SEEKER ANNUALS, and other of our publications.

No Quarrel About Precedence—Walk Abreast.

From the London Secular Review.

We cut the following from THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 26th:

THE TRUTH SEEKER, New York, says: "'God and His Book' is the heaviest iconoclastic broadside that has been fired at the Jewish God and the Bible by any modern Freethinker. Christians may get angry at it; but their system of religion cannot escape conviction under the powerful indictment drawn by Saladin.—London Secular Review. Saladin's copyist made a mistake. THE TRUTH SEEKER said, "by any recent English Freethinker." Some living American book-makers hav drawn indictments equally powerful, though of different "counts." But Saladin is a mighty warrior!

From this we learn that, in the opinion of friend Macdonald, America has done more than England to shatter the superstition of him of Nazareth. We are not eager to dispute this point, and are rejoiced to concede that America is doing her share of the glorious work, and that none of America's sons is doing that work more steadily and manfully than Mr. Macdonald himself.

THE Newtonville, Kan., News notices that the attendance at all the Sunday-schools upon a recent Sunday morning was about two hundred and fifty. The attendance at a game of baseball in the afternoon was about six hundred.

THE mind cure has found a congenial field in Chicago, where there are five hundred professional healers, five chartered colleges of instruction and twenty not chartered, and these various institutions are graduating at least three hundred and fifty pupils each month. The Cleveland Plaindealer is mean enough to add that they cure hams in Chicago, too.

Miracles and Miracle Workers.

According to the testimony of Vospicus, Eusebius, and Marcellus, the people of Tyana, his birthplace, worshiped Apollonius as a god for more than four hundred years. The whole pagan world testified to the deep impression which was left by the life of this supernatural man, for the people used to exclaim, "We hav a living god among us."

Eunapius, in the fifth century, said, "Apollonius was not so much of a philosopher as something between a god and a man," and that Philostratus ought to have entitled his "History of Apollonius" "The Descent of God upon Earth." He was worshiped by both Christians and heathens. Some of the early church writers, Eusebius in particular, admit that he was a miracle-worker, but attribute his power to sorcery.

Such is a brief outline of the life and doings of one of the most wonderful men whose name was ever placed on the page of history.

Here is an account of a man who lived in the time of Christ, and who performed more numerous and more astonishing miracles than are recorded in the New Testament. Why does the Christian believe these miracles and reject those of Apollonius? Any reason which the Christian may be able to give for believing that Christ was more than human, will apply to Apollonius with tenfold more force.

The Christian will claim that Apollonius deceived the people. But did he hold the exclusive right to deceive secured to him by letters patent?

If Apollonius could so successfully deceive the people, how does the Christian know but he has been imposed upon in like manner by the miracles of the New Testament?

I have talked with many Christians, including some ministers, and I have yet to find one who ever heard of Apollonius. Why is this so? Simply because Christianity cannot bear all the light of history. To let the Christian know that divine honors have ever been paid to any but Christ is not the policy of the church. It would prove almost disastrous to the church for the people to know how many have been engaged in the miracle business, and had supernatural powers attributed to them.

A true comparison between Christ and other men who have had divine honors paid to them, and who have worked miracles, would have a tendency to make Christians weak in the knees. If those who put so much confidence in the miracles of Christ could know that history gives accounts of hundreds of miracle workers, he would come to understand that none of them were performed by divine assistance, Christ included among the rest. In all human probability God has never been engaged in the miracle racket. If a first-class magician could be smuggled into a protracted meeting, when they have a high pressure of Holy Ghost steam on, and the enthusiastic minister should tell them that God was going to "make bare his arm" and "show forth his wonderful power," and the magician should vanish and reappear, and cause objects to vanish and return at his bidding, when the audience should see him cut off the heads of men, and birds, and animals, and restore them to their normal condition, nine out of every ten would verily believe that the hand of God was in it. Such feats would have been first-class miracles two thousand years ago.

But how different it would all appear if the deluded noddies should come to know how these tricks (for they are mere tricks of deception) are performed! Now, to help the Christian understand the hocus-pocus of miracles, I will introduce another great trickster, or magician, or miracle worker, so that the Christian may judge whether God has had a hand in all of these miracles. Remember miracles are always easy if the conditions are right. All that is necessary for a first-rate miracle is a shrewd trickster, and a few interested ones and a lot of fools.

We come now to another great miracle worker, Simon Magus. His miracles were received as genuine by both Christians and heathen. He was educated at Alexandria, and had an immense following. In Rome a statue was erected in his honor. He styled himself the Christ, and wished to be called "the standing one."

He was a disciple of Dosithius, and when Dosithius attempted to chastise him for assuming to be a standing one, the rod passed through his body as through fog; whereupon Dosithius fell down and worshiped him. His wife was brought down to him from the higher heavens. It is stated that in a discussion with Peter he claimed to have the power to fly through the air, to mix with fire, to make statues move, to animate lifeless bodies, to make bread out of stone, to pass from mountain-top to mountain-top, that he was the son of God, and would endure forever, and that all who believed in him would endure forever, and that Peter had no such power given to him.

Nero ordered Simon to be brought before him. Simon assumed first the form of a little child, then that of a very old man, then that of a young man. Nero said he had confirmed his godhead by his deeds, for he ordered the angels to come to him, and they came; he raised the dead, and was himself raised from the dead after he was beheaded. When imprisoned, he turned into a ram; the ram was beheaded, and Simon escaped. Here is a man who lived at the same time that Christ is said to have lived, who performed even more and greater miracles than Christ did. Why, he came out a whole ram ahead of him!

Candidly, my Christian friend, must it not be admitted that Christ lived in an age of miracles? It has been the policy of the church to keep you ignorant of these other great miracle workers, because if the masses come to know that the same miracles which Christ performed had been performed by many others, they would only have a par value with the rest.

Abonoticus was another great miracle worker. He had a temple built to his honor. From this temple he delivered oracles. People flocked to him from all parts to consult him. The sick were healed, the dead were raised, the lame, the dumb, the blind, and deaf were all made whole by his miraculous powers. His prophecies were held in high esteem by all classes.

Long before the birth of Christ, and for many years after, every country and city had its prophets and miracle workers, and wonderful men, whom the ignorant masses regarded with awe, because they believed that they were assisted by some unseen and mysterious power.

Why, we haven't got fairly over the miracle craze yet. Only comparatively a short time ago men were perambulating the country with old clouts and rags, or other things equally disgusting, which had been worn or touched by some disgusting old saint, and with these relics the sick were cured, the blind made to see, and the dumb made to speak. Even now the Catholic church boasts of the miracles which she has wrought, and still claims the power of working them.

What sane person believes that the sick can be cured, or the blind made to see by touching an old rag? There is no more virtue in one old rag than another, and no more virtue in Christ's garment than there is in a breech-clout of a Digger Indian.

The truth is, these things have never happened. There are always impostors when and where the people are ignorant enough to be imposed upon. It does not appear that Christ ever pretended to work miracles. But as many great men had been regarded as miracle workers, and as Christ was made the power behind the hierarchy, and clothed with divine power, of course he must have the power to work miracles also. Miracles can be wrought only in the minds of the ignorant. Chemistry knows of no quality in an old rag, imparted by the touch of a saint, which will cure disease. Science knows of no methods of infusing life into a carcass that "stinketh."

There are thousands who believe in the miracles of Zoroaster. Vast multitudes believe in the miracles of Christna. Thousands believe in the miracles of Apollonius and Simon Magus. Mussulmans believe in the miracles of Mohammed. Mormons believe in the miraculous finding and translating of their Bible. The "Friends" believe in the miraculous powers of Jemima Wilkinson. The Jews believe in the miracles of the Old Testament, and Christians believe in the miracles of the New Testament.

It would appear that these miracle workers have been engaged in a very extensive business. Does the Christian believe that all of these miracle workers have had divine assistance? If the Mussulman has been imposed upon, may not the Christian have been imposed upon in like manner? If Mohammedans had an object in imposing upon the people, may not the early Christians have been influenced by the same object?

When the number of miracle-workers and the vast number of miracles which are said to have been wrought are taken into consideration, it seems a little strange that the few miracles said to have been wrought by Christ and his disciples should attract general attention.

But it has always been the policy of ecclesiastics to boycott other saviors and miracle-workers, so that their dupes may know nothing but "Christ and him crucified;" and that is the reason why the average Christian knows nothing about the saviors and miracle workers not spoken of in the New Testament. The church knows the consequence of having the full knowledge of the many saviors and miracle-workers come to the people. The similarity is too striking.

To understand how easy it was to perform miracles, it is only necessary to know the superstition of the people among whom the miracles were performed. When the people believed in sorcery and charms, in signs and dreams, in warlocks and witches, in ghosts and prophets, in demons and angels, is it any wonder that they were imposed upon by miracle workers? And then it must not be forgotten that for hundreds of years the people were taught that they could serve God by lying for the church.

There was no dearth of miracle workers when the church so much needed miracles. When a credulous people could be convinced by miracles, there was no lack of impostors to perform them? Why should one give credit to the miracles of the Bible, and discredit the miracles of Mohammed, Apollonius, Simon Magus, and all the rest? The probability is that if one worked miracles, they all did. But the truth is that the people were deceived, and no miracles ever wrought.

The ignorant masses believed that nearly every great man could work miracles, or at the least had some power beyond the natural. Everything in nature not understood had a god or spirit behind it. Gods, angels, or demons controled everything. They were in the bodies of men, fishes, fowls, and animals. Earth, sea, and sky were full of them. It is just as natural for miracle-workers to turn up among such a people as it is for water to seek its level. To show the mental altitude of the people among whom miracle workers have operated, it is only necessary to refer to some superstitious beliefs among them.

It was believed that anyone who would take the afterbirth of a black cat littered by a first-born black cat, whose mother was also a first-born, burn and reduce it to a powder, and put some of it into his eyes, would be enabled to see spirits, demons, etc. It is not strange that such people should believe in miracles.

When the wisest had their minds filled with the miraculous, and believed in demons, ghosts, and witches, the minds of the ignorant were constantly terrified by the miraculous and the unnatural.

So learned a man as Justin Martyr believed that devils could get into men, and he declares that "all over the world Christians in the name of Jesus cured and set free those who were possessed with devils when all other enchanters failed."

Thus it appears that there was a strife between those who cast out devils in the name of Christ, and the "enchanters," or those who cast out devils by some other hocus-pocus racket.

The minds of men were filled with superstition, and the country swarmed with enchanters, soothsayers, sorcerers, and miracle workers.

Nobody doubted that Apollonius and Simon Magus and many others could work miracles, but it was claimed that they worked miracles by magic. There was a great strife between these magicians (for that was all that any of them were), but the Christians gave the preference to those who performed those wonderful acts in the name of Christ, of course.

Anarchists Tucker and Appleton.

As the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER hav become considerably interested in the subject of Anarchism, and as Mr. Tucker has attempted to explain the essential point whereon he and I hav come to disagree, I will, with your permission, try to throw some further light on the subject.

Mr. Tucker and myself are both Individualists. We both affirm the sovereign individual to be the inviolable, social monad, and that every exercise of authority over him without his consent does violence to natural law, and evidences diseased social conditions. We both affirm that liberty, with individual responsibility for the costs of its assertion, is the only way to true social order; or, to transpose the terms, individual responsibility for the costs of our actions being the measure of good order, the only way of fixing and balancing said costs is through liberty.

As to the basic assertions upon which the philosophy of Individualism rests, Mr. Tucker and I are fully at one. It is in the deductions that follow this philosophy, as bearing upon the methods of social regeneration, that we hav come to view the situation differently.

All wrong systems hav their source in the individual. The first individual who alienated his sovereignty set the tide of despotism in motion. The aggregate individuals who alienate their sovereignties to the keeping of others constitute the aggregate subjects of the world's rulers. For purposes of the governmental discussion, society is made up of two classes—those who in multiform spheres desire to alienate their sovereignties, and those who accept the invitation as rulers. There is no individual who is not subject to a variety of rulers. The relativ weakness of all individuals toward others makes rulership a universal system.

Sovereignty, then, becomes the great exchangeable commodity of the world. It is universally bartered and sold. It is at first promiscuous and unregulated. Seeing it afloat in this chaotic way, the statesman steps in and organizes the market. The great mass of individuals who hav sovereignties to dispose of become his patrons. He drafts a set of rules and regulations which are to govern the market, and they acquiesce. He thus builds up a trade, and finds it the greatest source of profit and power. Like all others who rule the markets, it is of course of chief importance that he make the business of selling sovereignties a necessity, and the profits as great as possible. To this end he encourages and defends usury, as made possible by land, currency, and commercial monopoly. When the whole structure is organized and fortified by agencies of coercion, it constitutes the state.

The state is an organized establishment which has grown up out of the trade of buying and selling sovereignties. Its origin and development follow the universal law of the markets. It did not create itself—its creation was invited. Its invited rulers, finding a source of profit and power in the business, naturally boom the business by fortifying monopolies. Being aware of the fact that the basis of independent sovereignty lies in free access to the soil and the tools of exchange, they, of course, interdict this, to the extent that lies in their power, as do all other enterprising business men in their spheres. They are also alive to keeping their patrons ignorant of the secret sources of what makes their business necessary and lucrativ. In short, they are no better and no worse than other successful business men.

Now, the problem which lies before Mr. Tucker and myself is how to get rid of this woful business of bartering sovereignties. He says attack the organized sovereignty brokers—the state—which is the efficient cause of our lamentable social condition. So do I say attack the brokers, as I would say were it attempted to break up Wall-street stock-gambling. But I deny that the sovereignty brokers are the radical efficient cause of the evils. I say that the mass of ignorant, helpless, superstitious, vanity seeking, city-crowding priest and fashion ridden individuals who patronize these sovereignty brokers are the efficient cause, and that a logical remedial application of individualism has to do with them as the efficient cause.

Mr. Tucker may aver that the brokers hav so "fixed" the market that it is impossible to get any vantage ground, or any tools for the exercise of individual sovereignty except by patronizing them and submitting to their terms; yet he believes in great, crowded cities, and will not touch or countenance any scheme by which it is proposed to colonize emancipated individuals under conditions that make the practice of liberty and individual sovereignty possible. He says he proposes to stand right here in this great, crowded, jumbled, collectivized city of Boston and down the state, and that if Anarchism is not good for Boston and New York it is good for nowhere. I say that liberty and individual sovereignty are only possible under their nativ conditions, and that until somebody gets down to the individual patron of the sovereignty-brokers, and succeeds in getting some personal character into reformers themselvs, the state will mock at Tucker and me as impotent cranks, if it does not ultimately seize upon some opportune public craze to hang us, or dispose of us under the heels of its servant and patron—the mob.

Sovereignty-bartering individuals, being the root of social evils, are to my mind the proper subjects for the application of remedial expedients. I find, in fact, that theological and civil rulers are universally more liberal than the average individuals who create and patronize them. The civil officers who tried Christ for Anarchism before a Roman court of law did not want to convict him. The mob cried, "Crucify him!" and they obeyed. So, in Chicago some time ago the judge emphasized to the jury that they might freely judge of the justice of the law as well as of the facts. It was the mob outside, and the hireling newspaper press, who study to voice the average prejudices of individuals, who demanded the gallows. Clergymen are notoriously ahead of the average individual in the pews below. Where, then, is the source of the state, civil and theological, and where lie the radical sources of individual sovereignty and liberty?

In individuals.

The mistake of Mr. Tucker—stanch, brave, and truthful as he is—was in announcing a purpose in Liberty which was aimed at an organized result, rather than at the source of despotism. Having staked his reputation and identity as a reform leader upon this partial machine, and defiantly nailed his challenge on the door of the state, he wraps himself up in the mantle of a hero and refuses to budge. His great weakness is the fear of being inconsistent, that most dwarfing of all species of moral cowardice. When I am quoted as saying something a year ago, or a month ago, which I deny and repudiate to-day, it is a source of gratification, as witnessing that I hav grown and am not afraid to grow. Mr. Tucker is so organized that when he finds a man contradicting himself at different stages of his growth he thinks that he has next to annihilated him, though he has really demonstrated the chiefest promis for good within him.

Mr. Tucker's position will not permit him to grow, and confess it, except at the cost of extinguishing his personal glory as the first agitator of Anarchism in America in the English language. He is imprisoned in his own machine. I am sorry he did not plant his movement on the broader field of Individualism, so as to hav left infinit room to grow in, without danger of inconsistency, that terror he so much dreads. But he is made of stuff that does not budge when once fixed upon a purpose—a tireless worker, and tremendous power for good withal. As for me, I am willing to be inconsistent, to be called a compromiser, to eat the words to-day which I uttered yesterday, to roll and tumble and stand on my head, or be guilty of any kind of intellectual contortions, if thereby I am kept free to grow. To grow is my religion, and all the machines in the universe shall not prevail against it.

HENRY APPLETON.

Miraculous Plaster from Knock.

The following "yarn" has been going the rounds of the country and religious papers for the past three months:

WILKESBARRE, December 14th.—A remarkable case of restoration of speech to a young lady who had been dumb for eight years, through the agency of faith and prayer, is reported from the neighboring village of Ashley, and the facts in the case are well authenticated. Miss Kate Martin, now nineteen years of age, lost the power of speech through a severe illness of scarlet fever. Many of the physicians of the neighborhood exhausted the utmost resources of their skill in the attempt to relieve her, but without avail. Of late years she has held the belief that her voice would be restored to her suddenly and miraculously, and has spent many hours in prayer. She was an earnest Catholic, and hearing of the wonderful cures effected by visiting the famous chapel of Knock, in Ireland, tried to induce her parents to let her pay a visit to the shrine. They were too poor to do this, but, at her solicitation, succeeded with some difficulty in procuring some of the plaster from the walls of the chapel. This was soaked in water, which Kate drank freely of.

After spending the whole of the evening in prayer, she retired, and on awakening in the morning found her speech restored to her in all its fulness and power. The first use she made of her recovered voice was to offer heartfelt praise to God, and the unusual sound of her voice issuing from their daughter's room aroused her parents, who rushed in and joined their thanks to hers.

The postmaster of Orangeport, N. Y., Mr. M. E. Atwood, is a heretic who places little confidence in the phenomena of the miraculous. He wrote to the postmaster of Ashley, Pa., and the subjoined is the reply:

ASHLEY, PA., Jan. 26, 1887.

P. M., ORANGEPORT, N. Y., Sir: Replying to yours in reference to case of miraculous cure of Katie Martin, I hav to say the outward facts are substantially as stated. She livs here; lost her voice, as stated, from sickness when a child, and can now talk.

The cure she attributes to the use of the plaster from Knock, aided by the prayer of faith. They are uneducated and superstitious people, but hav practiced no deception in the matter. They fully believe the cure has taken place just as represented, and from supernatural causes. Without saying what I think about the matter myself, I will simply add that I suppose such cases of the voice being restored from natural causes, when lost in a similar way, are not unknown to the medical profession.

I hav given in brief an answer to your inquiry. To go into details would take considerable time and labor. I am,

Yours very respectfully, J. K. P. FENNER, P. M.

The above letter was forwarded to THE TRUTH SEEKER by Mr. Atwood, and sent by the Editor to J. R. Perry, who livs at the scene of the miracle. Mr. Fenner, it may be incidentally mentioned, is a member of the Methodist church. Mr. Perry's explanation of the matter is as follows:

WILKES BARRE, PA., March 5, 1887.

E. M. MACDONALD, Dear Sir: Yours of March 2d came duly to hand, and as I was at leisure I started on a tour of inquiry and inspection, to ascertain what bearing the case had on truth, which I will impartially record.

I first called at the post-office at Ashley, in charge of Postmaster J. K. P. Fenner. A young lady in charge informed me of the neighborhood of the patient's residence, and stated that she knew her for years, that she could not talk above a hoarse whisper, and also that she was now well, but could not say what cured her, though she (the Miss Martin) firmly believed it was the plaster from Knock chapel that did it. The residence was pointed out to me, and I called to see the young lady whose speech had been restored. There is a deep cut made by the L. V. R. R. close to her residence, and I was at a loss how to find a way over, when I noticed a plump-looking damsel of about eighteen or twenty years of age coming down from the house. I called to her, suspecting she must be the lady, and she returned my call in a full, round voice, pointing out which way to cross over.

She informed me that a friend had brought some plaster or mortar from the chapel of Knock, and it had cured her. She had lost her voice by taking a bad cold, and could not speak aloud for five years.

I inquired as to what she did with the mortar. She said:

"I soaked it in water, and it dissolved, and that night when I went to bed I drank the water."

"What effect did the water seem to hav in your throat? Did it burn or scratch or bite you?"

"Oh, yes; it was strong, and I was praying all the time to get well."

"How did your voice come to you? Was it very sudden, or did it require some time?"

"Well, at first it was weak, but it kept improving for four or five days, getting better all the time."

"Then it did not come to rights immediately that night?"

"No, sir; it took five days or so until it was strong. It was a bad cold I had taken."

She stated that she had received hundreds of letters about it from all parts of the country. Some contained postage stamps, but most of them had none, and that a few of them she had answered, but she had "not time to be answering them all."

I inquired who were the friends that had so kindly brought her the plaster, but she seemed to evade the question, as she thought, no doubt, I was about to make further inquiry. This stimulated me to find the persons, but as she referred me to some other parties in Ashley, I took my leave, wishing her long life and happiness.

Miss Martin and her mother, Mrs. Margaret Martin, are keeping house for a man named Kane. Mrs. Martin I did not see, but Mr. Kane was present and proffered his explanations of the cure, stating that it was all through faith in the "blessed Virgin Mary, mother of God." The plaster, he said, would "amount to nothing on a heretic," and only for the belief in the holy Catholic religion no cure could be made with it "no more than a shtick or gob of mud." It was the "faith that did the work." I suggested if that were so, why use the mortar at all? Why not get well by prayer without it?

"Well, now, ye see," said he, "that you don't understand it. The blessed mother of God made her appearance at that chapel for all to be healed that had faith to go there and lave their diseases and their crutches behind when they came away cured, do ye see?" and this argument was as clear as mud to me, so I took my leave in search of the parties in Ashley.

I met a Mrs. Hooley, and fortunately she was in possession of all the facts. She was on her way to Wilkes Barre and would tell me all about it. So for half an hour she talked about the case. She told me that it was a Mr. James Murphy and wife who had brought the plaster over, and that she was using it on a sick girl who had been betrayed by her lover, and went "away crazy" because she did not dare to marry him. Mrs. Hooley had sent for the girl, and she was using the plaster daily. I said:

"Mrs. Hooley, what kind of mortar or plaster is it? Is it soft or hard like a rock?"

Said she, "It is as hard as any mortar or stone you ever saw. You could no more break it than you could break a stone."

"But how can you dissolve it in water to use it if it is so hard?"

"It won't dissolve at all; you could no more dissolve it than you could dissolve a bit of stone. It rests on the bottom of the vial that contains the holy water, which the priest at the chapel of Knock always fills, and puts the plaster into the bottle, and when the holy water is all used up by sprinkling or bathing, you are at liberty to go to your own priest and get some more water blessed and pour over it again. That plaster I hav will last forever and forever and be doing its duty all the time."

Mrs. Hooley then gave me an account of the discovery of the virtues of the plaster by an accident, stating that a blind man went scrambling along the wall and accidentally got some of the mortar from the plastering under his finger-nails, and then carelessly put his fingers into his eyes, rubbing them. They at once began to smart, and in a few moments he could see as well as anyone. The people rushed to the chapel and began tearing off the mortar from the walls and crevices, so that if the priest had not put up a high board fence the church would hav been torn down. "Oh, yes," continued she; "there are fields and fields of old crutches laying there, left by the lame that hav been cured. Bless her holy name!"

By way of comment, I wish to offer a few thoughts about this miracle. If Mrs. Hooley speaks truly, it looks to me as if the young lady had been deceived about the plaster. It will be noticed that the young lady stated that she dissolved the plaster and drank it; that it had a certain effect upon her throat, etc. Mrs. Hooley says she has some of the same plaster, given her by the same persons who brought it over, and that you can no more dissolve it than you can dissolve a rock; which looks right, as we know that when limestone has been heated sufficiently to giv off its carbon and form lime it will dissolve into milk of lime, and when it again combines with the atmosphere it hardens by age into its original limestone condition, and cannot be dissolved in water, forming carbonate of lime.

It may be possible that the sacred plaster was considered too valuable to part with, and that Mr. Murphy instead gave the girl a bit of quick lime, which she dissolved in water and drank; and it is possible that it may hav had the effect to act upon her vocal organs, and in four or five days restored her lost voice, doing it in a perfectly natural way.

It will be observed also that Miss Martin's own statement differs from the published account, which states that "after spending the whole of the evening in prayer she retired, and on awakening in the morning found her speech restored to her in all its fulness and power;" while the young lady stated to me that it did not return fully at once, but required four or five days; that it was better in the morning, but weak, and that four or five days passed before it got strong. The story of her arousing her parents by the sound of her voice issuing from her room, etc., is in part a fabrication, as she has but one parent, Mrs. Margaret Martin, unless Mr. Kane rushed into her room with Mrs. Martin to join in the praises, Mrs. Margaret Martin being Mr. Kane's housekeeper. Instead of eight years, the lady said it was about five years since she took a bad cold and lost her voice. She did not say anything about scarlet fever. When the superstition which encircles this case is removed, and the facts, fairly stated, appear, this miracle seems to amount to no miracle whatever, and may be accounted for by perfectly natural causes.

Wanted: A Million for Missions.

The priests are publishing in their organs, and many country journals copy them, free advertisments headed as above, varied by occasional puffs thus:

It was announced in Chicago on Saturday night that the $250,000 guarantee fund asked by D. L. Moody to found in Chicago a training school for missionaries had been fully subscribed. Among the subscriptions are the following: John V. Farwell, $100.000; Mrs. George McCormick, $50,000; Marshall Field, $10,000.

Every one of these supposed large contributors is only advertising his business. The lambs inquire who they are, what business they are in. Millionaires, say the lambs, whom Christ has purified and blessed with worldly wealth, a species of Christianity no way objectionable to the embassador of him whose life was poverty and humility. Barnum gave the priests pointers how to advertise for Christ's sake and profit. A tramp illustrated their motiv. He may hav been a priest. Calling at a house for breakfast, the Christian lady said, "I never turn a hungry man away empty," whereupon she handed him a piece of plain bread, saying, "I don't want you to think I approve of your conduct; I giv you this for God's sake." To which the tramp replied, "Won't you please put a little butter on it for Christ's sake?"

"God save and multiply the fools," said Josh Billings. "If it wasn't for them, how would so many get a fat living without earning it?"

"Fighting the Devil with Fire."

The Evangelical Alliance has at last done something which we can almost unreservedly commend. Under direction of James M. King, the chairman of the Alliance Committee on Legislativ Action, a protest has been prepared against the passage of Senator Murphy's bill which proposes to divide the public school funds with the schools of the New York Catholic Protectory. The protest is an argument bearing upon the attempt by Roman Catholics to weaken our common school system by the establishment of parochial schools, and division of the school funds therewith. It is not to be expected that the Evangelical Alliance will tell the whole truth, but, so far as the Alliance goes against the bill under consideration, it will hav the hearty aid of Freethinkers.

The protest and petition is, too, something more thau an objection to the one bill. The legislature is asked to inquire into the law under which children are committed to the various sectarian institutions at the public cost. This would indeed be a wise investigation for the legislature to undertake, but we should regret to see as a result of such investigation the adoption of the assumption of the Alliance that education in state institutions should "accord with Christian morals as taught in the Bible and recognized by law." We want no biblical morals taught, nor has the law any business to recognize religion.

The following is the petition, which Freethinkers can use by erasing the words within brackets in the last paragraph. Paste it to a sheet of paper, get all the signatures at hand, and forward it to the senator or member of the assembly of your district:

To the Honorable the Legislature of the State of New York in Senate and Assembly:

The undersigned respectfully and earnestly protest against the bill introduced in the Senate by the Honorable Michael C. Murphy, to amend the acts relating to the Society for the Protection of Destitute Roman Catholic Children, and intended,

First, To facilitate the commitment to that corporation of idle, truant. or homeless children; and,

Second, To authorize the schools of the New York Roman Catholic Protectory to participate in the distribution of the common school fund in the same manner and degree as the common schools of the city and county of New York.

I. The undersigned call upon your honorable bodies to preserve inviolate the school fund and its revenues, as plainly prescribed by the constitution; to keep church and state forever separate in our legislation; to guard the infant wards of the state from all sectarian schools or reformatories; to allow in institutions assisted by public moneys no foreign control or un-American influence; but to recognize the right of every delinquent, idle, truant, or homeless child to an unsectarian education as an American citizen in an American school.

II. The undersigned respectfully submit to your honorable bodies that the clause in the Children's Law (Laws of 1884, Chapter 438) which condemns children to be sent to institutions under the control of persons of the same faith as the parents of the children, is an unconstitutional provision suggested by persons who wish the state to do their will, in forcing children to adopt the faith of their parents, whatever it might be, in disregard of the constitutional rights of such children, who, as the wards of the state, and under the exclusiv control of the state, are entitled to receive fitting instruction in all the duties of good citizens without discrimination or preference of sect, and to be shielded from all attempts at proselytism or propagandism. They ask your honorable bodies to appoint a committee,

First, To investigate thoroughly and openly the effect of that law in multiplying enormously the number of infant paupers, notably in New York, Westchester, and Kings counties, in heavily increasing the burdens of taxation, and enlarging the tendency of Roman education to illiteracy, pauperism, and crime.

Secondly, To inquire how far the education given in the various reformatories assisted by the state accords [with Christian morals as taught in the Bible and recognized by law;] with American principles of civil and religious liberty; with the loyalty, rights, and duties of American citizens; with the harmony and goodfellowship which it is desirable to preserve among our nativ and foreign citizens, especially on religious questions, and with the absolute exclusion of all foreign intermeddling and dictation, by threats temporal or spiritual, with American politics and legislation.

Senator Murphy, who introduced the bill against which this protest is directed, is the senator with whom a member of the Brooklyn Constitution Club had a notable conversation last winter. The Constitution Club member was endeavoring to get a bill through the legislature taxing alike all property, including churches and church institutions. He called upon Senator Murphy, and showed him the bill. "A good measure," was the comment of the senator. "Will you introduce it?" asked the member of the Constitution Club. "H'm; I think you had better try to get Mr. —— to introduce the bill. Perhaps he will do it. You see," and the senator lowered his voice to a tone of confidence, "there are six Catholic institutions in my district, and if I introduce this bill I shall be killed." These six Catholic institutions are the propelling power that moves Mr. Murphy in his advocacy of the bill against which all American citizens must protest.

Moreover, the unconstitutionality of the measure is so apparent that when legislators' attention is called to the fact, there should be no hesitation in opposing it. Article IX., section 1, of the constitution of this state provides:

"The capital of the Common School Fund, the capital of the Literature Fund, and the capital of the United States Deposit Fund, shall be respectivly preserved inviolate. The revenue of the said Common School Fund shall be applied to the support of common schools."

The legislature of 1875-6, Mr. King recalls, adopted a proposed amendment to the constitution as follows:

"Section 2. Free common schools shall be maintained throughout the state forever. The legislature shall provide for the instruction, in the branches of elementary education in such schools, of all persons in the state between the ages of five and twenty-one years, for the period of at least twenty-eight weeks in the year.

"Section 3. Neither the money, property, nor credit of the state, nor of any county, city, town, village, or school district, shall be given, loaned, or leased, or be otherwise applied to the support or aid of any school of instruction under the control or in charge of any church, sect, denomination, or religious society; nor to or in aid of any school in which instruction is given peculiar to any church, creed, sect, or denomination, or to or in aid of any such instruction; nor to or in aid of any school of instruction not wholly under the control and supervision, and in charge of, the public school authorities. This section shall not prohibit the legislature from making such provision for the education of the blind, the deaf and dumb, and juvenil delinquents, as it may deem proper, except in institutions in which instruction is given peculiar to any church, creed, sect, or denomination, or religious society. Nor shall it apply to or affect the Cornell University endowment fund hitherto pledged and appropriated."

With a prohibition that the state shall giv no money to any institution under religious management, nor permit religion to be taught in any state institution or common school, such an amendment as the above should be adopted by the coming constitutional convention.

Concerning the law authorizing magistrates to commit children to institutions under the control of people of the same religious faith as the children's parents, it is very doubtful if it would be upheld by the Supreme Court. But whether it would or not, it is clearly an alliance of the state with a sect, and is that far undoubtedly un-American. The Evangelical Alliance's argument on this point is entirely one-sided and worthless. Mr. King does not seem to know that the law upon blasphemy has been repealed, and he cites worn-out legal opinions that Christianity is a part of the common law of this state. In his argument is seen the fine hand of that Protestant Jesuitism which would destroy the Roman Catholic Protectory but preserve the Protestant House of Refuge. These two institutions, however, need different treatment. The Protectory is owned and run as a private religious business, and in such a business the Roman Catholics hav an unquestionable right to embark. But New York city, by legislativ enactment, givs the Protectory many favors and a great deal of money—some three hundred thousand dollars annually. It is this contribution which should be withdrawn. The House of Refuge, on the other hand, though begun as a private enterprise, has passed into the hands of the state and is supported exclusivly by public money. Into the Refuge, though, as into Girard College, the Protestants hav wormed their way till the House of Refuge is as thoroughly Protestant sectarian as the Protectory is Catholic sectarian. What is needed in this case is the expulsion of the ministers who liv upon the bounty of the state and manipulate the institution for the glory and profit of their sect.

But so far as the Evangelical Alliance is working against the division of the school funds, so far is it entitled to the help of Freethinkers.. Circulate the petition and protest, and send the result to the assemblymen and senators at Albany.

A Short-Range Teacher.

The president of the National Normal University of Lebanon, Ohio, Mr. Alfred Holbrook, is of the opinion that he has settled the religion-in-the-public-schools question. In the National Normal Exponent for March he prints his views, and marked copies are sent around to editors, presumably for the editors' enlightenment. The gist of his complaint is this:

"In most cities in the United States where Catholics hav not a large influence in the control of public schools, they hav established parochial schools for the children of Catholic population. In some cases, they hav succeeded in securing a division of the public funds for sustaining their sectarian schools, and in all cases complain of the injustice of taxing the Catholic population when any form of Protestant religious instruction is tolerated in the schools or no religious instruction is given. The Bible is to them the most offensiv book that can be used. This policy and craft is patent enough; and, with the aid of anti-religionists, Catholics hav, in most cities, driven the Bible and religious instruction from the schools altogether."

Right away does Mr. Holbrook fall into error. The above statements are not in accord with facts. In the first place, the Catholics are as yet unable to secure a division of the school funds, and their failure is the cause of the order by the Baltimore plenary council to each priest to build a parochial school. We know of an attempt to divide the school funds in a town of Pennsylvania, but the state constitution prevented it. We know of the recent attempt in our own legislature, but the bill has not become a law. We know of one town where the Protestants were bulldozed into contributing to the building of a parochial school. We know that at Poughkeepsie the public school officials employ Catholic teachers, but we do not yet know of a single state that has by statute divided the school money with Roman Catholics. So far, American principles dominate the land. Let us hope they always will.

Again, Mr. Holbrook errs in saying that in most cities anti-religionists and Catholics hav driven the Bible and religious instruction from the schools altogether. We hav heard of a few towns and school districts where the Bible and religion are omitted in the school exercises, and we know that the superintendent of education once issued an order to that effect in this state, but we know that the order is disregarded, and we know, too, that in most cities the schools are far from "godless," but are, on the contrary, crammed full of superstition.

That Mr. Holbrook's observation has been very limited is shown, too, by another asseveration. "We hav known," he says, "of several teachers who, feeling it their duty to read a short portion of scripture, and to offer a brief prayer in the opening exercises of their school, and having been denied this privilege or being condemned for thus pursuing a conscientious course, hav resigned and given up their positions to those who would comply with the demands of Infidel or Catholic directors. We hav never known, however, of an Infidel or Catholic teacher having been ejected from his position by Protestant directors because he did not engage in religious exercises." We shall be under obligations to Mr. Holbrook if he will send us the names and addresses of the Christian school-teachers who resigned because Infidel directors would not let them read the Bible. We think we can find him some Infidel school-teachers who hav been refused positions because of their heterodoxy, and others who hav been compelled to remain silent or forfeit their jobs.

The calm uniqueness of this university president's statement of premises led us to expect a unique remedy. But the nostrum he puts forth as of his own compounding is an old quack medicin, widely advertised and thoroughly worthless. It is only this:

"Let the teacher announce to the school that he will be glad to meet all the pupils who wish to join with him in religious exercises a quarter of an hour before the legal time of opening school every morning. He will, also, let it be known that there is no reproach falling upon one who does not wish to be present while the religious exercises are being conducted. The teacher thus, while he is occupying the public school building, does not use the time of the student in his devotions; he is taking his own time and gratifying that part of the community who wish their children to engage with him in his religious duties; while those parents who are opposed to religious exercises, in any and every form, cannot reasonably complain that the legal time of the teacher is employed, or that is there any diminution of his efforts in behalf of the pupils in their regular course of instruction as prescribed by law, and as required by directors under the law. In several schools where this plan has been adopted, Infidel and Catholic parents hav conceded the use of the school building to the teacher for religious exercises out of school hours in his own time. They do this the more willingly when they learn that there is no stigma placed upon the pupils for absence from religious exercises. In most cases where this plan has been adopted and pupils are free to attend or not, all the pupils hav most cheerfully and promptly been present during the quarter of an hour thus bestowed. Not only so, in some such cases Infidel parents hav expressed their satisfaction in the growing moral influence which has extended through all the school exercises in consequence of the conscientious conformity of the teacher to what he conceives to be his duty."

While the Infidels will doubtless feel grateful to Mr. Holbrook for his kindness in allowing that no "stigma" shall rest upon the absentees, and for his backhanded acknowledgment that heretics look after the morality of their children, they will probably continue to resist the use of public property to teach private religion. This "remedy" has often been tried, and in Bloomfield, Iowa, led to a lawsuit instituted by an indignant Infidel, whose children had been kept in the cold hallway while the little hypocrits inside were taught religion.

There is another very conclusiv reason why the nostrum is worthless. It supposes that all schoolteachers are Christians. But suppose they are not—which is the supposition of a fact—and suppose an Infidel is the teacher, shall the schoolhouse be opened fifteen minutes earlier for the Infidel to instruct in comparativ religion, or in Freethought as opposed to all supernatural revelation, such children as choose to attend? If not, why not? Mr. Holbrook says Infidel teachers are never ejected from their positions because of their belief upon religious matters, and surely they must hav their consciences respected as well as the Christians who self-sacrificingly resign when opposed by "Infidel directors." Would Mr. Holbrook, who is a gentleman eminent in his section of the country, be willing to help pay for fuel to warm a group of Infidels who were using public property to tear down his religion? Go to, Mr. Holbrook! Before you undertake to enlighten editors upon this subject, giv it a little thought yourself.

A Puritanic Sunday for New York City.

If Mayor Hewitt's orders are enforced, New York is about to hav the same Sunday experience that a few Eastern and Western cities hav suffered. In response to a written complaint made by William H. Lawless, president of the Hat Salesmen's Protectiv Union, that the law against Sunday opening was not enforced, the mayor has written the police commissioners that the matter must be attended to at once. He said the existing laws were for enforcement, and gave instructions that the attention of the police force be called to the subject, with orders to notify parties who hav heretofore violated this law that any further transgressions will not be tolerated.

If the Sunday law is enforced, no stores can be open except restaurants, drug stores, news-stands, cigar shops (where no liquor is sold), and fruit and confectionery places. Grocery stores must be closed by 10 o'clock in the morning. All the Bowery and avenue stores which now sell hats and clothes on Sunday, all the barber-shops where working humanity gets a clean shave for the benefit of his best girl, all the toy stores, all the haberdashers—in short, everything but the exceptions mentioned, must be double-barred and bolted, and if any presumptuous store-keeper shall not obey, he may be fined ten dollars and sent to the county jail for five days.

There are some ten thousand liquor stores in this city, of which fully nine thousand are guardedly open on Sunday. There are fully twenty thousand grocery stores, which are usually all open up to twelve or one o'clock. Upon the Bowery and the avenues and streets of the East and West Sides there are fully another ten thousand small stores whose proprietors stand behind the counter on Sundays ready to serve customers. The police force numbers not over twenty-five hundred men effectiv for Sunday duty. It looks, therefore, to an impartial observer, as though the mayor had undertaken a large contract.

But what is the use of this fuss over Sunday work? Every man of common sense knows that New York will not observe Sunday in a Puritan fashion. The people will hav their excursions, their picnics, their Sunday outings and music. Every Sabbath morn the city is emptied of all who can find anywhere to go, and money to go with. If a man needs a new hat or to be shaved before he goes on an excursion, and other men stand ready to sell him a hat and to shave him, whose business is it but the persons' interested? It certainly is not Mayor Hewitt's, nor Howard Crosby's, nor Archbishop Corrigan's, nor John Hall's, nor Bishop Potter's, nor any other old fossil's. Neither is it the affair of those virtuous country legislators who at Albany enact Sunday laws and other puritanic restrictions for the great and wicked city of New York, and then come down here, where they are lost in the crowd, and break them. In his "deestrict" there is none so good as the country assemblyman. When he visits New York there is none so reckless. Perhaps if it were not so easy to break these laws, the assemblymen would be more cautious in passing them.

Unjust Discrimination.

The Chinese residents of San Francisco hav imported a religious symbol in the shape of a Dragon-Joss. The dragon is one hundred and fifty feet long, and is built of silk, glass, paper, feathers, tinsel, and goat hair.

The law authorizes the free importation of religious symbols, by any church acting in good faith—that is, uses the bric-a-brac for religious purposes. Cardinal Gibbons will not hav to pay duty on his red hat, as it is a tool of his trade. He might also bring with him a miscellaneous assortment of furniture, such as subselliums or sediliums—strings of beads called rosaries—lambs with crosses on their shoulders and halos round their heads, called Agnuses Dei—holy oil cans, called chrismatories—archbishops' canes, called croziers—holy sprinkling pots, called aspergills—long cloaks and nightdresses, called albs and dalmaticas—altars and miters, and phylacteries for charming off witches—all these and much more might he bring through the custom-house free of duty; but when a rival church imports a harmless though hideous Dragon-Joss, the Christian treasury officials call it a "work of art" and levy a large toll thereon.

To say nothing of the poor judgment of the officials in classifying the monster, we hold the imposition of duty on the dragon to be an unjust discrimination. Why should not the Chinaman hav his gods and idols free of custom duty as well as the Christians their religious furniture. The bowing to a dragon is no worse, at any rate, than the scraping to a crucifix.

A Probable Victory.

There are at last good prospects that the people of this city will be allowed to examin the treasures in the Central Park museums for the exhibition of which they hav paid such princely sums. On Monday evening, the 21st ult., the trustees of the museums held a meeting, and on Tuesday Mayor Hewitt stated to a reporter that Sunday opening was now only a question of finances. "At the meeting of the trustees," he said, "there was a large preponderance of opinion in favor of opening the museums, but the trustees want to know where the money is to come from. No action was taken, as there was no action to take, but I think it is certain now that as soon as arrangements can be made the museums will be opened Sundays."

There can be no doubt that the legislature will authorize the New York city authorities to furnish the funds. Such a bill passed the Assembly last year, but was defeated in the Senate by the museum trustees themselvs. When the city board of estimate and apportionment made up their budget for the current year, five thousand dollars each were offered the museum trustees if they would open on Sundays. This was refused. Since then, the American Museum of Natural History has applied for four hundred thousand dollars for an enlargement of its buildings. A bill permitting this sum to be given it has passed the legislature. The men who spend the city's money are known to be in favor of Sunday opening, and the pressure of public opinion in this direction is tremendous. The legislativ bill is not mandatory upon the city officials, but permits them to giv the museum the money. "Are you going to shoot?" asked the coon of Davy Crockett from an upper branch of a tree. "That's my intention," replied Davy as he leveled his gun. "Well, then, I'll come down," said the coon, and he crawled back to the tree-trunk and descended at Crockett's feet.

When the museums are opened to the Sunday visitors of Central Park, as it seems they soon will be, how few will know to whom they are indebted for a sight of the treasures and curiosities therein! Even the city officials scarcely realize who it was that brought to the surface the public sentiment which backs them up in their demands upon the museum trustees. But had it not been for the persistent efforts of the American Secular Union in circulating petitions and stirring up the daily press of this city during the fall and winter of 1885–6, the museums would be unheard-of institutions to a majority of the people of the city. Like the Lenox Library, the museums are now unknown quantities to all but a few people of leisure, scarcely more accessible than a private art gallery. The efforts of the Secular Union made the population of New York aware that it had paid enormous sums for these playthings of the wealthy, without deriving any benefit therefrom, and almost unanimously the demand for Sunday opening was seconded. Having started the ball with an impetus that has since kept it going, the Union remained quiet because a cry was raised that only Infidels desired Sunday opening, and so great is the prejudice that this would hav defeated the Union's object. Mayor Hewitt is called a Christian; Mr. Beekman, the president of the board of aldermen, is an Episcopalian, and they can get credit for public spirit.

Once let the Sunday visitors at Central Park know that the museums are open, and the buildings will be thronged. It is safe to say that in the four or five months of summer and fall the exhibits of the museums will be examined by a greater number of people than hav passed their portals in all the previous years during which those institutions hav encumbered the ground.

In this issue we introduce to the Liberal public a Christian writer who is anxious to enlighten Mr. Arthur B. Moss, a scientific Freethinker of London, whose contributions to these columns hav been extensivly read and universally commended. Mr. Grabill believes that Mr. Moss has been teaching error in his papers about the age of man upon the earth, and we hav provided him space in which to show reason for the faith that is in him. Having restrained our own inclination, we trust none of our scientific correspondents will jump upon Mr. Grabill until Mr. Moss is heard from.

The Freeman's Journal says of Henry Ward Beecher:

"Perhaps—and this seemed possible from same of his utterances—he had thoughts of laying down his flowers, his reeds, his equipment of pretty metaphors, and pantheistic implements at the foot of the church planted on the rock of St. Peter. But, though we cannot doubt that, had he felt obliged to speak honestly, he would hav said that the truth—admitting that God livs—was in the Catholic church, he never spoke, and he died silent."

Our Roman Catholic contemporary is very far from the truth. If Mr. Beecher had possessed sufficient courage to break from Plymouth church he would hav stood beside Colonel Ingersoll rather than crouched at the feet of the pope. Beecher was of the radical, not the conservativ type. "It is my work," he said to Frank Carpenter years ago, "to destroy the old. Others must do the rebuilding; my nature is destructiv." Such a man as that could never hav joined the Catholic church.

Scarcely had we time to congratulate Mr. Ernest Mendum upon his happy marriage to Miss Isabel Crowell, when we are called upon to mourn with him at her death. She died in Melrose, on the 19th ult., from typhoid-pneumonia, and was buried on the following Tuesday. The Ingersoll Secular Society adopted this resolution:

Resolved, That the members of the Ingersoll Secular Society hear, with the utmost sorrow, of the sad and sudden death of our late kind and Liberal associate, Mrs. Ernest Mendum. As Miss Isabel Crowell, we had learned to know and appreciate her worth, and as the wife and helpmeet of our brother Earnest, we had hoped to hav for many years the pleasure of her assistance and friendship; but Death spares neither friend nor foe, and we unite our grief with that of those who were nearest and dearest to the stricken one, and extend to them all our heartfelt sympathy in their and our great bereavement.

We are sure that the bereaved husband has the honest sympathy of many scores of friends. They may not take his burden of grief away, but let us hope they can make it lighter by sharing it with him.

MR. EDITOR: I hav enlisted three more names in the interest of humanity. Inclosed find $9.50 to pay for same, $1 for TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, and a renewal for myself for the present year. The cartoons are what take the eye, so keep on with the good work. We shall endeavor to hav Mr. Putnam with us when he comes to the territory. This place is situated about fifty milcs north of Seattle by water.

MR. EDITOR: Here is $5 which you ought to hav had long ago; but, by the great horn spoons, I hav been in an awfully tight spot for two years past, and could not do as I know I ought to hav done. But I am going to come out game at last. If you could know what a time I hav had, you would shed tears like pouring soapsuds out of a washtub. But you need not stop to shed any sobs now, for the rub is about past. I indorse your position on the Anarchy controversy to the bone. The position of the Ironclad Age is just simply pitiable. Monroe shows himself a bitter sectarian in his position and treatment of the question. Sorry to see it.

MR. EDITOR: I hav intended writing THE TRUTH SEEKER some time, but am spurred up to it just now by our having had Mrs. A. M. Freeman here to giv us a lecture, subject, "Some Things I Don't Understand," and she was not alone, either, for many others don't, but she handled those old Bible stories without gloves. As Liberals generally take no stock in them, I wish our lecturers would come to the issues of the present time, and leave those antiquated myths for others to ventilate, who do believe them. She was well received, and we shall try to arrange for another on her return. Putnam passed us by, but we hope to hav Reynolds with his tent when the weather is warm enough. Please say so to him, if you're in correspondence. And now a bit of business. As our time expires the first of April, may as well inclose amount in this; also $1 for Heston, and remaining dollar for "Exeter Hall" and Saladin's work, "Did Jesus Rise from the Dead?" and the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1887, if extant. If memory serves me, this is right. If not correct, I will make it so in my next.

WILLIAMSON, N. Y., Feb. 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: There are three churches in this little town, Baptist, Methodist, and Presbyterian. The Baptists hav been running protracted meetings for the last eighteen weeks, and hav finally quit, and not a one hav they had the chance to clean up in the river Jordan—excuse me, they hav got a wash-tub in their church. The Methodists hav been running meetings nearly every evening for two months, and not a soul saved as yet. They expect the praying band here this week from Syracuse, and hav agreed to pay them $200 for one week of hallooing. I hav a pack of hounds that I will let out cheaper than that, and I will guarantee that my dogs can save just as many souls as theirs. They all say if it was not for these old Infidels they could reap a rich harvest. No doubt the preachers could. I came home a few days ago and found the Methodist priest in my house inquiring about the welfare of my wife's soul. She, in her way, told him all about it in short meter. Suffice it to say that he did not wait to sing or pray. He asked for medicin for his wife, and was willing to pay. I told him I treated all paupers alike, and gave it to him. This is getting to be a hot Freethinking community.

A. G. AUSTIN, M.D.

HAVANA, CUBA, Feb. 26, 1887.

DEAR EUGENE: I and, I hope, all other readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER hav long since learned to esteem you highly; and I desire you to believe me when I say that I hav hitherto believed THE TRUTH SEEKER to be the very best and most ably edited paper in Ameriea, and that I do not want to see the star of its glory sink in the quagmires of aristocratic or capitalistic despotism. On page 122 of the issue thereof of the present month, you say that when anyone shows that the speeches of the Chicago Anarchists led to the killing of policemen, you will advocate their punishment. Right then the capitalistic tyrants took you by the throat. They will register it against you and try to pin you down to it.

The speeches of those noble heroes, Parker Pillsbury, Gerritt Smith, Wm. Lloyd Garrison, Joshua R. Giddings, and others of their kind led to the rebelling of the slave-mongers against our Union; not that any state seceded, or even tried to do so, for not even a god can do that which it has not the power to do, and a state has no power to even try to secede from the Union.

If your expression above referred to is the proper doctrin, then, of course, you would consent to the punishment of the Abolitionists above named, because their speeches led to the killing of many Union and rebel soldiers, eh?

If you will turn to page 474, Abbott's "Lives of the Presidents," you will find that yours is the exact view taken by a rebel judge in New Orleans, and whereby he had a great many Union men punished because some rebels had killed some other Union men.

If your pockets hav been well filled by the capitalists, to induce you to gradually switch off onto the track of capitalistic despotism—which I do not at all believe to be the case—you will then command a certain degree of false respect, but if you do it through cowardly imbecility, you will get no respect at all from any quarter.

Eugene, please now, do switch back onto the track of rational universal mental liberty, where you hav so long and so successfully driven the grand old locomotiv, THE TRUTH SEEKER, with its extensiv train of rational truth seekers, safely over the bogs, fens, and quagmires of superstition, till you may hav finally landed them safe and sound upon the shores of rational liberty and justice. We don't want to lose you; we know too well the sound of your whistle, and we hav great faith in you. Yes, Eugene, do come back onto the track laid by Franklin, Paine, Jefferson, and others of their kind, lest, the first thing we know, you land us all in an Ashtabula or a Woodstock heap of ruins and of fire and brimstone.

GNEOOTRWGEES.

MILAN, Mo.

MR. EDITOR: I am greatly pleased with your paper. I will say I would not hav it stopped for $10 per year. I can find more truth in it than in any other paper I take, and I am taking thirteen others. I was raised a Sunday-school scholar until over fifteen years of age. Since then I hav been a shorthand reporter on several of the Chicago papers, during which time I had my eyes opened. I hav reported Ingersoll at various places, heard Mr. Remsburg and many others of the great speakers, thus having all my early doubts vindicated, and by the presence of THE TRUTH SEEKER in the house, with barely a word in its favor, every member of the family of five others besides myself are converted to its sentiments. I extend thanks to those who first put a copy of it in my hands.

I see in one of your papers an item in reference to a Sunday-school superintendent putting $500 of the treasurer's money into the Louisiana State lottery, and praying God to direct it to the best advantage, and he drew a blank. I suppose that is a point in favor of the lottery, because it seems as though God preferred to help the lottery rather than the Sunday-school.

Inclosed find $3 for paper another year.

NEWPORT, ME., March 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I received the package of "Lay Sermons" you sent me for the dollar I sent you, and I am surprised that you can publish such a splendidly got up book at such a very small price, five cents. In any sense, it is perfect. I hav just finished reading it for the third time, and as I read it, I felt that there are hundreds of thousands of people that would buy and read it if they knew the rich treat there is in it.

And the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL! How can such a splendid book as that be sold for the very low price of twenty-five cents? The laws on Sabbath-breaking, blasphemy, etc.. are worth a great deal more than the price of the book to any one who wishes to know what Christian tyranny has done and is doing. I should think that you ought to sell many thousands of ANNUALS.

And I wish to speak of another book I hav recently read, "The Fathers of the Republic," by J. E. Remsburg. I hav read with pleasure and profit all of Mr. Remsburg's works, and truly he givs to the world very important truths, which ought to be read by millions. When Christian priests hav tried to blacken the character of the grandest men nature ever produced, Freethinkers ought to scatter the very important books printed by the Truth Seeker Company by the thousands.

SEWARD MITCHELL.

BRAIDENTOWN, FLA., Feb. 6, 1887.

E. M. MACDONALD, Kind Sir: I hav thought for some time of writing to you and the Liberal society, but my courage failed, as I wrote several letters last summer to prominent Liberals, but they did not answer my supplication. One lady answered in a postal with kind wishes. I hav always been a Freethinker. My father, Thomas McClean, was one also. He was born in 1763, a soldier in the Revolution. I hav a common education; read the Investigator in my eleventh year, 1832, and at frequent intervals since. Yearly losses by rains, sickness, and my husband's death hav reduced me now to poverty. After settling up, I had enough left to bring myself and four daughters to Florida. Misfortune has followed me and mine, and I am in straitened circumstances. I wish the Liberals could help me a little. I can help myself some. I can sew, but I cannot be on my feet very much. I hav done nothing for priests, and I hav not been to hear any preaching since 1852. I hav taught my children to think for themselvs; none leans to orthodoxy. I hope your society will try to help me a few dollars. If some of those Liberal lecturers could see me as I am living, I think they would giv me something of their own accord. I do wish some one could come here and lecture. I am alone in my views on religion. People think it very strange I do not go to any of their meetings. I suppose some think I am no better than a heathen. I do not suppose they would really let me suffer for food, as there was some sent me last week.

That kind lady in Brooklyn has sent me several of your papers and Investigators, and I thank her very much for so doing. I hope you will place my poor distressed case before your readers.

MRS. E. J. SNODGRASS.

GREELEY, COL., March 11, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Again the manna of truth has been showered upon the people of Greeley, and some of us feasted sumptuously, and had our hunger satisfied. The 26th of February found a very intelligent assemblage of Liberals at the residence of the secretary. Among the number was the genial countenance of S. P. Putnam, who demonstrated his untiring energy by giving us an extemporancous, pithy, and interesting talk, in which he proved that the largest individuality was attained by a diversity of opinions. He was followed by the Unitarian minister, who concurred heartily in the facts developed by the speaker. Considering his orthodox principles, one would think he had undergone a metamorphosis.

On the night of the 27th of February, the poetical genius delivered his lecture, "The New God," to a large and appreciativ audience, every word and sentence sparkling with truth and the fire of eloquence. So completely did he demolish the substructure of the orthodox God that all the delightful things told of the invisible heaven seemed to exist here on earth. His language, ideas, and gestures sent such conviction and thrill of emotion that the audience was held spellbound. He showed that man was a progressiv being, his physical, intellectual, and moral achievements constituting the god, man possessed of these endowments being the noblest work of nature, and the only being worthy of worship. When he uttered the proposition that he believed in a God potent enough to kill "grasshoppers and fleas," a good Christian brother, whose locks were silvered and whose ideas were petrified with religious bigotry, concluded that he was in the "wrong nest," and made his exit.

Monday evening, March 7th, the secretary and treasurer of the Greeley Secular Union had the pleasure of hearing Mr. Putnam deliver the first Liberal lecture ever given at Loveland, Col., and we trust gave some impetus to the occasion by singing appropriate songs. In conclusion, I cannot refrain from mentioning the name of N. R. Faulkner, of Loveland, who proved himself to be an efficient and zealous worker in the cause of Freethought.

Hoping that wherever our worthy secretary may go his sentiments will glitter with undiminished luster, and the fetters of superstition be broken asunder, and truth and liberty established throughout our land,

EULAH C. STILLWELL,
Sec. Greeley Sec. Union.

PARKERSBURG, W. VA., March 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav becn buying THE TRUTH SEEKER from the news-office since last spring, and hav carefully read every number. I was much pleased with the first number, and the longer I read the better I like it. I think it is a deeply interesting journal, and is steadily improving. Heston's pictures are interesting, amusing, and instructiv, and I hav heard people say that they show up some of the absurdities of the Christian religion much better than the best written article could do. Even some of my Christian friends had to laugh at the picture of Adam plowing with a hog, which appeared in your paper last fall. Success to Heston!

I am especially pleased with the stand you take in regard to the Anarchists. I do not believe in murder, neither do I believe in hanging scven Anarchists because some Anarchist or Socialist has committed a murder.

Putnam, Reynolds, Denslow, Si Slokum, Bowman, and many others among your contributors are dealing heavy blows at orthodoxy, and Mrs. Colman in her "Reminiscences" givs hard facts, very unpalatable to the average Christian. I also read the "Children's Corner," and feel encouraged when I see so many young people breaking away from the bondage of superstition, and who on Sunday do not hav to hurry off to church to learn a batch of silly, nasty fables from that most indecent of all Christian books, the Bible.

I am a compositor on a highly Christian temperance paper. The editor's wife is president of the W. C. T. U. of this state. They think it is a sin to read THE TRUTH SEEKER, or any other paper that dares to advocate the rights of laboring men and women, or that dare to hav opinions of their own on religious subjects. I rejoice that a few journalists dare to advocate the right, and fear neither American capitalists or the Jewish God they pretend to worship.

This is a very Christian town. Gospel mills are plenty, revivals are conducted each winter with great vigor, and if we may believe the newspapers, nearly all the sinners are converted. The Salvation Army marches around with its drums and tambourines, and there is a large Catholic factory and one Catholic church. And yet saloons and other institutions too vile to be mentioned, but generally found flourishing side by side with the churches, also are plenty.

Success to the grand old TRUTH SEEKER. May it liv long, and successfully battle error, superstition, and oppression. I believe the course you are now pursuing satisfies the great majority of your readers.

W. H. H. PEARSON.

CRAWFORDSVILLE, OR., March 6, 287.

MR. EDITOR: I hav no advice to giv you about how to conduct your paper, but it seems to me that it would be a safer and more prosperous way to giv no credit. I know that there are many poor but honest Liberals; but there are some that are dishonest, and not Liberals, who would wrong their best friend. I am poor, and perhaps may be glad to get your paper on credit, but I believe that it would be better for both you and me if you had a rule to never giv credit, except when personally acquainted, and then to use your own judgment whether you do or not. I see that a great many want you to make a book of THE TRUTH SEEKER cartoons, or tract, or a book of doleful sayings, or something else. Now, these things may do well enough as suggestions, and although they may appear feasible to the writers, and they would take a copy or more, yet we are so different from each other that it is doubtful if it would pay to act on all such suggestions, even if your company was rich enough to do so. I think we that don't hav the responsibility don't consider the expense and probable income from such ventures. As a friend of mine used to say when about to giv advice, "You know your own business best." It takes money to run a large printing-office, as well as a farm or foundry, and although I often see something that just suits me, yet I will not let the wish be the father of the belief that it would be profitable for you to put it in book form. I particularly like John Peck's "Christian Absurdities," and "An Orthodox Fraud," by T. E. Longshore.

It was refreshing to find at least one who did not know everything; I refer to Helen Gardener on the "Social Heresies." Many who knew less would hav written all about them. Of course you employ many other writers who swing a free pen, each of whom has their specialty, and I like them. I hav received all of the books that I hav ordered, and hav not missed a number of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I hav been here six years, and when I came here had not a rag to my back, but now hav plenty of them. No, I meant to say, we had nothing but our clothes, but by economy hav lived and saved a nice house and barn, and a few acres of rich land, and furniture, and two cows, with an average of $400 per year, and now don't hav to pay rent or buy fuel or vegetables. I say this for the benefit of workingmen, for I am a carpenter, and hav worked in New York, Brooklyn, Chicago, St. Louis, and San Francisco, and never could save anything in any of the large towns, but don't think that there are any special inducements to come to Oregon. I think that I could hav done as well or better in almost any of the eastern states if I had bought a small piece of land and built a cheap house in the country, and improved as fast as I could.

Pittsburgh, Pa., Feb. 3, 1887.

Mr. Editor: As my wife's step-father used to say, "I shall die without reforming the world," but the next half-century will see much more advancement in all branches of knowledge than my short span of seventy-nine years has beheld, though I hav lived through the grandest age that the world has any true historical account of. The old Egyptian, Assyrian, and Hindoo stony records show that the world has lost some arts known to the ancients, and possibly they may be recovered by future researches in the earth, or in the written records of the Bramans or the Chinese. Let us hope that those mines of knowledge—claimed to be thousands of years back of our era—may be opened up in the early future. There are, however, many things about to be brought in in the not very distant future that will immeasurably improve the condition of the human race, and it should be the business of reformers to urge them forward. No intelligent reformer can doubt the right of every human being to light, air, water, and earth; to all the elements provided by the creator—call it God, spirit, essence, force, or what you will—for the use of the successiv races that hav inhabited and are destined to inhabit the earth. No race, much less an individual of a race, nor any number of individuals in combination, hav a right to monopolize the elements to the exclusion of any individual from the equal enjoyment of them, and any such monopoly and exclusion is the robbery of right—what I call God-given right. It is objected that we must not interfere with vested rights; that the legal owners hav paid their money for the land, and that it would be all wrong to interfere with them in any way whatever. In reply, it is not desired nor designed to do this directly, but to make it desirable to themselvs to sell that portion of their ground which they cannot use to advantage without oppressing others. The land was stolen (appropriated) originally by force against right, i.e., by robbery, sold by the robber, and by that purchaser to another, and another, and another, down through a long succession of holders, who passed laws confirming their title, and then called it vested right. But it being a robber title in the beginning, all the holdings through twenty generations could not giv a just title any more than the passing of a stolen horse through twenty holders could deprive the real owner of his right. This you may say is law, and, of course, the real owner would get his horse, but I am not talking of law as it is, but as it ought to be—equity. Every child when born is part owner of all God-given or natural elements, and all the law-making power we justly possess in the case is to secure to the child these natural rights. The law has just as good right to deprive me of light, air, and water, as of land, and the coal, iron, and other materials in and on the earth, which it now deeds to Tom, Dick, and Harry, who are thus rendered independent, and able to compel, through his necessities, servitude from their landless neighbor. The law-making power should be exercised only to protect the natural rights of every sentient being, and to further the interests of all humanity. I hav a good deal more to say, but will defer if for the present. I may bore you with it at a future day.

I will say here that I hav believed for many years, and hav discussed in my family, and among a few friends, that man was given his hands to make a living by work—of course, using his brain so as to work intelligently—but that he has not the right to use his brain-power for his own personal advantage, but should use it for the furtherance of the best interests of the race.

Portville, N. Y., Feb. 28, 1887.

C. J. Curtis, Bradford, Pa., Dear Sir: In a recent Truth Seeker I note a letter from you, in which you refer to my being a Spiritualist, and ask me to giv my reasons for being one through The Truth Seeker's liberal columns. Now, when a certain class of Materialists ask if I am a Spiritualist, I always feel like replying as did some one when asked that question on the witness stand; he said, "Yes, sir, I am a Spiritualist, but I am not a d——d fool!" Now, you will notice in almost all debates between Materialist and Spiritualist, after the latter has given the testimony of witnesses to phenomena that preve spirit return to be a fact—testimony such as would be received without question upon any other subject (as, for instance, the materializing, in the presence of Miss Fairchild, of Boston, of from fifty to one hundred spirit-forms in an evening, many of them babies, and this with the medium plainly in sight, and in the presence of a score of disinterested spectators)—the former will invariably ignore everything attested as having no weight, because he did not see it. Now, in giving a few instances of my own experience, I shall not hope to convince anyone, but simply do so in answer to friend Carl's request, thinking some one may find them of interest. "The beginning of my being a Spiritualist" was in reading the works of A. J. Davis, thirty or more years ago, and falling in love with the philosophy of Spiritualism. Nothing seemed more reasonable to me than the manifestations, and I am sure mere phenomena would never hav made spirit return seem so real had I read nothing of the philosophy in the beginning. Mr. Curtis says he has thoroughly investigated Spiritualism. This I hav never had an opportunity to do. We began by having private circles among a few friends in our neighborhood, about twenty years ago. We were mediums, and all investigators only. Remember we were not paying our money to be hoaxed by frauds. Our mediums were our friends, our neighbors, who had no object in deceiving, and none of them hav ever become public mediums, although many possess wonderful powers. One, my niece, whom Mr. Curtis knew as Ella Stevens, and who, every one knows, is as pure and as honorable as an angel, has given us wonderful proof of spirit-power. As a healer, she cured herself of inflammatory rheumatism of many years' standing. Another honorable lady friend, Mrs. E. M. Pearsol, was often controled to repeat, line by line, as it was copied from her lips, long, beautiful poems, and lectures far beyond her capacity to do normally, as she had had but little literary culture, having married at thirteen years of age, and having eight daughters to rear in humble circumstances. I do not mention these cases as remarkable, but because they seemed to bring proof to my mind, knowing as I did all the attendant circumstances, and the noble character of the parties. I will only giv one more instance in my experience. It was a beautiful August morning, seven years ago, that my wife and I arrived on the Cassadaga camp-ground, near Cassadaga Lake. In less than an hour we were seated alone in the tent with Charles Watkins, the medium for independent slate-writing. He did not leave the room after we entered, and no one else came in. Previous to entering we had written several questions and rolled them into tiny pellets, and upon the medium's producing two clean slates, we placed the pellets between them, and he laid them on the table, placing his hands on them. In this manner three intelligible messages were written, one signed by my father, one by my wife's mother, and one by our son-in-law, Edgar Hall, whom you knew. There was no possible chance for collusion that I could see, as thousands were coming and going every day. You say you are satisfied that Spiritualism "has no scientific basis." Yet there are many illustrious names of scientific men who think differently, among whom are Professor Crookes, F.R.S., in England, who started out with a three months' investigation to prove that Spiritual phenomena were produced by odic force, but who, after two years' investigation, found indisputable proof of individual spirit existence and return. Professors Varley, Wallace, Zöllner, Hare, and many scientific men of authority attest the truth of his statements. It is true the laws governing these phenomena are little understood, but enough is known, it seems to me, to make men hesitate about setting bounds to scientific discovery. Of one thing I am assured, there can be nothing supernatural; whatever is, will and must be accounted for according to natural law. Neither, according to my belief, is it necessary to hav any divine, creativ power to execute said law. I omitted to rank D. M. Bennett among the illustrious few who found Spiritualism to hav "a scientific basis," as attested in a little pamphlet written by him on Spiritualism. Professor Tyndall, in "Fragments of Science," p. 73, says: "Besides the phenomena that address the senses, there are laws, and principles, and processes that do not address the senses at all, but which must be spiritually discerned." And again he says, wisely, "You never hear the really philosophical defenders of uniformity speaking of impossibilities in nature. They best know that questions offer themselvs to thought which science, as now prosecuted, has not even the tendency to solve. They keep such questions open, and will not tolerate any unlawful limitations of the horizons of their souls.

Trusting I hav not written at such length as to make myself unwelcome, or trespassed upon the forbearance of our friend The Truth Seeker, I will close.

Yours for all truth, John L. Brooks.

Middle Falls, N. Y., March 7, 1887.

Mr. Editor: Judging from the number of communications received bearing on the subject, my little squib in The Truth Seeker of February 19th has created quite a little breeze among the spelling reformers and deformers. Some of the letters of my correspondents are amusing, as illustrating the ignorance of their writers regarding the subject with which they are attempting to grapple, and some are so peppery in their composition as to indicate that orthography correctors are not invariably persons of good breeding. I hav not time to reply to all of my correspondents, and would prefer to hav them send their communications direct to The Truth Seeker office, so that your readers may hav the benefit of their alleged correction of the faults of our admittedly crooked English spelling. It may surprise some of these wiseacres to learn that I am a spelling reformer myself, and hav been an advocate of such reform for years; but nothing short of a radical change will suit me—the selection and adoption of nine new characters to represent the letters which we lack to express the sounds of the language, without making some letters do double, quadruple, and even sextuple duty, as the letters a and o do now. With each vowel sound denoted by a single character, and the substitution of j for soft g, k for hard c, the transposition of those consonants that need it, and the elimination and omission of all not sounded, the orthography of our language would be so simplified no child would need to spend the tedious years of drudgery now necessary to learn to spell. Such a change, I am satisfied, would shorten our printed matter at least one-quarter, possibly two-fifths, according to the proportion of changed words used in our discourse; i.e., three-quarters of the space now occupied in each number of The Truth Seeker would contain all its printed matter, leaving room thereby for more than one-fourth additional matter. So sweeping a reform would, of course, produce an almost total change in the structure of our language in its represented form, destroying the tracing of our words to their sources in the original roots, and involves many difficulties familiar to every student; but, notwithstanding, so great would be the benefit accruing from the change I would heartily welcome it, and be glad to see it adopted by every periodical and every educational institution in the land. We who hav finished our "a-b, ab's," would never become accustomed to it in our days—it would pain the eye every time we looked upon a printed page—but to coming generations it would be a blessing, and we ought to be willing to sacrifice something of taste for the good of those who are to follow us. But, I would ask my would-be critics, May we ask for the adoption of such a radical overhauling of our orthography with any prospect of success? and more especially can we accomplish anything by taking three small words (for the other words changed in The Truth Seeker, such as genunin, feminin, and the like, occur so infrequently as to be scarcely noticed), and curtailing them to present a decidedly "bob-tailed" appearance, any more than we could hope to change the organization of some lordly oak by sending a man into it annually to lop off the extremities of three small twigs? There is no more reason why the final letter of have, give, and live should be omitted than the final letter of shall, will, and fill, not a particle, and yet there is a very good reason why it should be omitted from all six, as well as hundreds of other words, and I only mention it to show the inconsistency of spelling "deformers." The old, and as generally worded, offensiv adage that "every little helps" does not apply in this case, except in the one item of space saved, and that, in each issue of The Truth Seeker, will not amount to five full lines.

Nothing of moment can be accomplished by those who are trying to grapple with so grave a subject by pruning and lopping among the twenty-six characters we now hav. Twenty-six letters cannot be made to represent nearly forty sounds, except by making each vowel do more than double duty, as I hav mentioned, and the difficulty will only be overcome by the adoption and making of additional type. I do not understand how a half dozen papers are going to effect a reform by changing the termination of less than a half dozen words; and even these words are made to conform to the established orthography when the article in which they appear is to be printed in book form, and in some cases where it is not, or at least not so specified. If the readers of The Truth Seeker will turn to the number in which my little complaint appeared they will find therein a two-column article by the leading Freethinker of the age, in which wherever the words hav, giv, and liv occur they are spelled each with four letters, which, I think, will bear me out in my assertion that "contributors will not take kindly to a system that givs an unfinished appearance to their best thought." True it is that the departure of a word in spelling from the established usage offends the eye simply because it has been so long associated with it in another form; but something is due to taste as well as utility (else there would be no premium on beauty), and a displeasing innovation should not be sanctioned unless the end sought justifies the proceeding and compensates for the discomfort involved. There are people to whom a straggling, out-of-line row of fruit or shade trees looks just as pleasing as a precise line, and who would gaze with the same emotions upon a bog-covered swale that they would upon a well trimmed lawn; but all are not constituted alike, and while a thoughtless person might stroke a cat's fur the wrong way and see nothing incongruous in the operation, such a proceeding would offend the nerves of a more sensitiv one; and so in the case of the three words under discussion, their uncouth, abbreviated appearance offends the eye wherever they occur in that form. I admit that as usually spelled these words are not in accord with the principles of phonetics, but cutting off the final letter does not mend the matter, and neither of them, in the amended form in which they appear in The Truth Seeker, is spelled as it will be if the principles of spelling reform are established, since the fourth sound of a and the second sound of i as heard in the words hav and liv are not now represented in our alphabet. There are other amendments needed in connection with the use of our language equally with the spelling reform. Not a day passes but each writer sees the need of having a third personal pronoun, one which shall express personality without denoting gender, and it has been suggested that we use for the nominativ case the word e, and inflect it as follows: Nominativ, e; possessiv, es; objectiv, em. With such a new pronoun we should not hav to "work around the point" by writing as we do now, "Everyone is the architect of his or her own fortune;" and many a word now needed to make our meaning clear could be dispensed with; but I do not know of any journal willing to undertake to introduce the practice. In conclusion, I trust I shall not be misunderstood by your readers. I am in favor of the spelling reform movement just as I am in favor of the adoption of the metric system, which would, if it came into general use, save an incalculable amount of time and money in our exchange with foreign countries and between our own states, and which I should be glad to see established everywhere throughout the world. If the spelling reform movement shall be made sweeping and thorough enough to need no reforming itself, it will compensate for all the annoyance and inconvenience of the years during which we are becoming accustomed to the altered appearance of the language, and will be the grandest achievement of the age. So with the metric system if it come into universal use. But if only one or two isolated merchants adopt it, or, to make the analogy nearer perfect, if one uses one table of it only, while another uses a different one in his business, and the great bulk of the people ignore it altogether, it will only "prolong the agony" as in the case of that kind-hearted but mistaken son of the Emerald Isle who, wishing to curtail his dog, lopped off a small piece of the tail each day in order that "the poor craythur might become accustomed to the pain by degraaes."

Or like the precious ores of earth?
Why are they like the flowing rills?
Why are they like a dozen mills?

Why are they like the flowers that blow?
Why are they like the driven snow?
Why are they like blacksmiths' drills?
And why, oh why, like thirteen mills?

Why are they like the mountains grand?
Why like a little grain of sand?
Why are they like the daffodils?
And why, oh why, like fourteen mills?

Why like oceans, lakes, and ponds,
But not like copper, nickle, bronze?
All other things the reader wills,
And adding evermore the mills.

Correspondence.

PRINCETON, MASS.

When I had anything hard to do, I used to cry. Now I laugh, which makes me feel better; it takes my strength to cry. . . . Mamma, to me you are like a rose that blooms in spring, blooms in summer, autumn, and winter. PSYCHE CERES HEYWOOD.

ZALESKI, O., March 2, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I saw so many boys and girls writing for the Corner I thought I would write one too. I hav seven brothers who read THE TRUTH SEEKER and think the pictures are very nice. We hav organized a Congress Club, of which I am president. I hav a hard time putting the questions and keeping order. I am a little girl seven years old. If you can read this and would print it I will write again. CLELIE JAMES.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Feb. 18, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav not seen any letters from this city, I thought I would write one. We do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER, but we intend to take it as soon as possible. We hav a friend here who takes it, and he lets us take copies to read. I read the Children's Corner, and all the rest I can understand. I will hav to close, wishing you success. Your Freethinker friend,

IRWIN REMICK.

FINDLAY, O., March 6, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As mamma was reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, I discovered in it the Children's Corner. I thought it would be nice to write you. I am nine years old. I go to school every day. I read, write, spell, study arithmetic, and geography. I belong to the Juvenil Temperance Society. There are two hundred in our lodge. We are expecting Mr. Putnam to lecture before long. Papa and mamma will hear him lecture.

Yours respectfully, MANONIE FILSON.

OSAGE MISSION, KAN., March 7, 287.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a letter for the Corner. I am a little girl eleven years old, and study arithmetic, geography, grammar, and spelling. I read in McGuffey's Fourth Eclectic Reader. My father and mother are both good Liberals. We liv near the Methodist church. They hav revivals, but they never get many mourners. My sister and myself went to church last evening. The preacher did nothing but abuse Infidels. Father says the church is in its dying agony, and that is the cause of the preacher's wrath. Your little friend,

MELISSA SIMMONS.

PRAIRIE CITY, IA., Feb. 24, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Seeing so very much correspondence to you from various boys and girls, I will pen you a few lines. My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER as far back as I can recall, and I am deeply interested in the puzzles, etc., in the Children's Corner, which I must say is conducted under the most skilful management. I am a boy fifteen years of age. At the age of ten I required a habit of writing stories, sketches, etc. Since that time I hav written many stories. I once wrote one for our home paper, which filled ten columns. Yours very truly,

FRANK V. DRAPER.

[Perhaps Frank will some time write a story for our Corner. But it would hav to be short, as we hav many correspondents and not much space.—ED. C.C.]

WARNIC, OR., Feb. 19, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like to read the Children's Corner and to look at the pictures. I am eleven years old. I hav one sister, she is eight years old, and one brother two years old. We call him Volney. I went to school a part of the winter, but on account of the snow, which fell ten inches deep, and the extreme cold weather, our school was discontinued until spring, when it will be resumed again. I read in the Fifth Reader, and spell in the highest spelling class in our school, study geography, arithmetic, and writing. My sister sent for the book entitled Aunt Elmina's "Little Lessons for Little Folks." Papa is going to send for the "Story Hour" for me. We liv thirty-five miles south of Dallas City, which is situated on the Columbia river. We hav a fine view of the surrounding country, in which we can see three perpetual snow peaks—Mt. Hood, Mt. Jefferson, and Mt. Adams. My papa, and two of his brothers, liv in one corner of the neighborood, and their farms all join, and the Christians call it the "Devil's Corner" because they take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and are Freethought men. A Methodist minister and his wife stayed here all night, and he asked if he could hav prayers, and papa told him no. If you think this worth printing, I would be much pleased to see it in print. I will close with kindest regards.

I remain your little friend,

MAMIE DRIVER.

SPICELAND, IND., Feb. 20, 1887.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: Though an entire stranger yet, I take the liberty of writing to you, for you are not an entire stranger to me and my family. We hav some of your books and read your articles in the Investigator and TRUTH SEEKER. My son Warren, thirteen years old, is reading your "Apples of Gold" now, seeing which gave me the idea of writing to you to thank you for the great good you are doing with your pen. It seems to me the greatest wrong we can do, almost, if not quite, is to teach innocent little children to believe things to be sacred truths which we ourselvs really don't know anything about. My greatest joy is that I and my children are entirely free, and fully satisfied in unbelief in the Christian religion, and that my dear wife never feared the author of her being, but loved, honored, and adored that mighty power which rules all worlds, and does all things well. She never doubted that the future, whether life or eternal sleep, would be for the best, but certainly not eternal suffering.

I was at a Sunday-school to-day where King David was extolled as being a model man—a man after God's own heart—a pattern for little children to imitate. He was the vilest man on record, Brigham Young not excepted, as I verily believe.

How honest people can teach and believe such a book as that Bible is a mystery to me. We hav the satisfaction of knowing that Infidelity is gaining even more rapidly now in this community than light and knowledge in other matters; but scientific knowledge is the great cause of the increasing gain, and is itself gaining very rapidly. Twenty years ago my wife and I were the only Infidels here, and now a score may be found here. J. E. Remsburg was our guest and lectured for us two years ago, and B. F. Underwood in our hamlet of Greensboro a few years ago, also Jamieson, and some other Liberals, including Mr. Colby (Spiritualist), which, by the way, is a doctrin, in my judgment, not much improvement on the Christian ideas, except that eternal misery is not in their bill of fare.

Your article on Romanism, in the Investigator of the 16th inst., is most excellent and timely, and the subject is one which should receive the hardest hits, and most frequent, and the best writers should giv their best efforts in that direction.

Miss Helen H. Gardener has given Catholicism some hard hits, for which honor and thanks are due.

As I am no writer and a stranger, I hav already said too much, perhaps, but wish to thank you again for your good work, and especially for your interest in the little children, where innocence and honesty is most frequently found, and where the hope of the future will is to be expected and labored for.

Very respectfully, W. W. WILSON.

[We are very grateful for the good opinion of our brother Wilson, and it shall be our aim to continue to merit his, as well as the approval of all our friends who find pleasure in our efforts for the development of children in a natural, healthy, and intelligent manner. —ED. C. C.]

Physical Series.

6. Creation. Matter cannot be created. A seed may be planted and grow into a tree, but nothing is created; the matter of which the tree consists was absorbed from the soil and the air. A child is born and grows, but the matter of which the child is composed formerly existed as food, either of the child or of its parents.

When rain or snow falls to the earth, no new matter is brought into existence; the water rises from the surface of the earth and seas in the form of vapor, and afterward falls as rain or snow. The water which flows down rivers is supplied in this way.

Every particle of matter which exists now has existed through the countless ages of the past, and will continue to exist in the future. Nothing we can do, no treatment to which we can subject it, will either create or destroy the smallest conceivable particle of matter.

Hereafter when we speak of a body being destroyed, it must be understood that we speak of the body and not of the matter it is composed of. Thus, if a glass bottle be broken into small pieces, the bottle is destroyed but the glass is not.

7. Gravitation. Every particle of matter attracts every other particle of matter; this is called gravitation. What we call weight is the attraction between the earth and smaller bodies near its surface. The reason why bodies fall to the earth when unsupported is on account of this attraction. The weight of a body at a given place is the measure of the quantity of matter which it contains. We can do anything we please with a body, but we cannot increase its weight unless we add something to it, for, as we hav already learned, no particle of matter can be created, neither can its weight be diminished, for matter cannot be destroyed. Thus, when we want to know how much matter a body contains, we weigh it, because its weight is proportional to the quantity of matter it contains.

8. Remarks. The three facts which we hav now learned, that matter cannot be created, destroyed, or altered in weight, are as important in chemistry as in physics. They may be regarded as the foundation-stones of all natural science. It is necessary to understand them thoroughly, since what follows depends upon them. There is no supreme power creating and destroying matter at pleasure. Imagin the havoc which would ensue if there were. There could be no certainty, no law, no order, no substantial reasoning. We could draw no conclusions in regard to bodies if at any moment they might be destroyed or changed. We could not rely upon anything, for it might suddenly be destroyed, or something unexpected might be created. G. G. GROWER.

QUESTIONS.—(Note.—Do not be satisfied with a mere answer to a question, but always explain how you know the answer is right. Let the teacher and pupils ask other questions. Ask about the various things which you see occurring all around. You will thus learn the practical importance of what you hav been studying When you answer a question, always explain why.) SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE BIBLE.
SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.
SPIRITUALISM A NECESSITY IN GOD'S GENERAL GOVERNMENT.
SPIRITUAL MEDIUMSHIP.
OBJECTIONS TO SPIRITUALISM ANSWERED.

Like all THE TRUTH SEEKER'S publications, the mechanical execution of the work is all that could be desired. Good paper, clear type—in short, a neat little volume.

The primary object of the work, as its title indicates, is to sustain Spiritualism, but the absurdities of the Christian religion, and the abominations of the old Jew book, get a terrible shaking up. The book contains much to interest every intelligent reader. . . . Colonel Kelso has done much acceptable work in the cause of Freethought and Liberalism all over the land. Send for his new book—read it—put it into the hands of every Christian; it will teach him that the way of the fool is foolishness. Every Liberal who reads it will certainly find his "Spiritual" strength renewed.—Jo[illegible]rk.

The Conspirators.

Lo! the house with arch and steeple,
Where the black bands gather strong,
Still contriving 'gainst the people
Covert plot or brazen wrong;
Skilled an ancient lie to foster,
Hearts to harden, minds degrade;
Power the stake, the game imposture—
Keener sharpers never played.

If the good and elevated
Are in crowds among their friends,
'Tis because their schemes are baited
With pretentious moral ends.
Nurture, habit, special culture,
So may warp the wisest eyes,
Few detect the greedy vulture
Hidden in the dove's disguise.

Reason, ethics, logic, history,
Champions of the truth unawed,
Foes to mountebanks and mystery,
Each has slain their monstrous fraud;
But what boots the work of slaughter?
See! revive its vampire veins—
The true hydra, "born of water
And the spirit" in sick brains.

What conditions were coeval
With the priest's unchallenged sway?
Prostrate, hopeless of retrieval,
Freedom, art, and genius lay.
Their revival, what attended
If not superstition's wane?
Nation's where her might is ended
Rank the first in glory's train.

When, from interest, priests hav aided
Once or twice the cause of right,
How the instance is paraded!
What a mammoth grows the mite!
But in vain their specious glozing;
Truth—prevent her if you can—
Throws into the scale opposing
All the crimes 'gainst her and man.

Say, was superstition's martyr
Worth the sparkle of a coal?
Did he die for nature's charter,
Written on the human soul?
When the bigots rushed to chain him—
Bigots like himself, forsooth—
Did a patriot's cause sustain him
Or a sage's love of truth?

Fiends in strife for place and power
Failed their fellows to evict,
And, when came the torturing hour,
Felt but what they would inflict.
Or, at best, some vague abstraction
Touching naught that can concern
Man in healthy thought and action,
Made the wretches gag and burn.

Thanks to thoughts once judged felonious—
Judged and doomed without appeal—
If to-day the sanctimonious
Rage not still with stake and steel.
Priest and presbyter and preacher—
Take what name each sectary may—
All hav one essential feature—
The undying lust of sway.

Some would lord it with a miter,
Like a crocodile on end,
Some are "sepulchers" still whiter,
Not by frankness they offend.
Circe was not self-transforming,
Shams disdain no shape to wear,
Now the lion rampant, storming,
Now the fox, to sneak and snare.

They're divided! Hail the omen!
Hail, but close your ranks anew,
Join no faction of your foemen,
All are one in hate to you.
At the bar of Reason, vainly
Shall they plead: "We are at odds.
Justice should distinguish plainly
Who are Satan's, who are God's.

"Sons of Babel's painted ogress,
Those from hell's own cave hav swarmed,
Strike them! Spare the friends of progress,
The Protesting and Reformed!"
Spare the poison plant till riper,
Spare, in pity, spare the young
Of the vile, engendering viper
Till a thousand men are stung!

Streams from one unhealthy fountain,
Carrying death in all their course,
Fly them! Sink them! Move a mountain—
Anything to stanch the source!
Still beware! Can worse befall us,
Victors, than deceitful calm?
Force has fled, shall guile enthral us?
Wreathe no poppy with our palm.

To be free—how old the story—
Is to watch: 'tis worth the pains.
Let a moment's sleep come o'er ye,
Nations, and ye wake in chains,
Eloquence, amid your high rants
'Gainst enslavers of their kind,
Hav you none for subtler tyrants
That emasculate the mind?

Bolts and gyves may call for patience
If the free soul spurn their power,
But a priesthood's incantations
Palsy souls and then deflower.
Our worst foes are not conspiring
'Gainst our civic rights alone;
Freemen, rise and fight, untiring,
Every form of slavery known.

All in man that's undiluted
By faith's "sleepy drench" is yours,
All her arts hav not embruted
All that still aspires and soars.
Armed for conquest, crested, starry,
Science moves, alert, but calm,
Who her fateful thrust shall parry?
Not the cursing priests of sham.

Even their mythic foe abhorred—
Horror feigned, they do his best—
Wears no charm from foot to forehead
Proof against her lance in rest.
Soon the ruffian powers of evil
Playing man at pitch and toss
All shall vanish, God and devil,
Bigot-book and bloody cross.

Then, these silly terrors perished
("Vested rights" of their concern),
Quondam priests—faint hope but cherished—
May some honest calling learn.
They usurped our very nurseries;
There we'll teach the coming race,
Pointing to their wicked sorceries,
That they dupe, enslave, debase;
Till, in its perfected conscience,
Wonder wakens how and when
Brotherhoods of fraud and nonsense
Ever swayed a world of men.

Books.

LITTLE LESSONS FOR LITTLE FOLKS. By Aunt Elmina (Mrs. E. D. Slenker). New York: Truth Seeker Co. Pp. 98. Price 40 cents.

Every Freethought parent who has children should purchase this little book for them. It might hav been very properly entitled Juvenil Science Lessons. It should take the place in Liberal homes of the prayer, "Here I lay me down to sleep," and the "Sunday-school Catechism" in orthodox families. This book will cultivate the reasoning faculties in place of filling the young mind with superstitious ideas. The titles of these lessons are, "Stars," "Monkeys," "Fishes," "Fresh Air," "Matter and Life," "Books," "Clover," "Water," "Stones," "Animals and Vegetables," "Little Leaves," "The Nerves," "The Sense of Smell," "Heredity and Natural Selection," "The Camel," "The Frog," "The Cow," "Dolls," "Grass." Aunt Elmina is entitled to great credit for providing so valuable a book for the little ones.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Aunt Elmina Drake Slenker has out a beautiful little book called, "Little Lessons for Little Folks." By sending 40 cents to the Truth Seeker Publishing Company, 28 Lafayette Place, New York, this little work can be obtained. The book abounds in hints on health and self-preservation, put in such shape as to be very attractiv to little folks. The work is nicely bound, and will make a valuable addition to a child's collection.—The Queen Bee.

"Little Lessons for Little Folks," by Aunt Elmina (Mrs. E. D. Slenker) puts into 98 sensible pages many facts which children need to know, and teaches wholesome morality without religious imposition.—The Word.

We hav examined this handsome little manual on natural science for the young with care, and think it could be placed in the hands of every child to its lasting benefit. In fact, many older people could read it to advantage.—Ex.

I hav read "Little Lessons," and will say that it surpasses what I expected for it, and without any wish to giv undue praise, it is the best book for children I hav ever read. I would recommend every teacher to keep several copies of it in school for supplementary reading and composition work.—Theo. Romine.

TRY-SQUARE; or, The Church of Practical Religion. By Reporter. New York. The Truth Seeker Co., 28 Lafayette Place, 1887.

Under the guise of a stenographer taking notes the author givs an interesting volume of reports of conversations and discussion had in church and social meetings. Job Sawyer is a character with a great deal of "horse sense," and a blunt, plain way of expressing himself. He has opinions on church and state, religion and economics, which are worth reading. He and the parson are a capital pair. The book is breezy and radical. It sweeps the ground pretty thoroughly. Pp. 312.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM. The Present and the Future Republic of North America. By A Capitalist. Same publishers.

There is little need to recommend this book. It should be read, and carefully. Its picture of the New York of the near future is a brilliant dream, but nevertheless it presents a direct possibility. It is clear and well written.

"Little Lessons for Little Folks," by Aunt Elmina (Mrs. E. D. Slenker); "The New God," by Samuel P. Putnam, and the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC are works from the same house, whose special Freethought works are well known. Mr. Putnam's discourse, "The New God," is scholarly and eloquent, like all that comes from his pen or lips. In the ANNUAL there is a valuable compilation of the Sunday, oath, and blasphemy laws of the states and territories of the United States. The extent of some of these strange "survivals" is a surprising fact.—The Leader.

Not long ago Dr. Augustus Le Plongeon published a work entitled "Sacred Mysteries Among the Mayas and the Quiches," being the result of his explorations in Central America. His wife, Alice Le Plongeon, accompanied him, and has now written her own experiences, and printed them under the title, "Here and There in Yucatan." The book has 146 pages of quite interesting reading, and sells for $1.25.

---

The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC for 1887 has been received. It is a book of about 100 pages, replete with interesting and useful reading; containing a calendar with chronological table of important facts, "Freethought in the United States;" "Liberty," by Grover Cleveland; "The Coming Dawn," by D. Louis Bodge; "Freethought Abroad;" "Sunday. Oath, and Blasphemy Laws of the United States;" "The Right to Testify," by F. M. Holland; "The American Secular Union," by Samuel P. Putnam; "The Parson," a story by Si Slokum. It contains more than a dozen full-page engravings. The price is only 25 cents to any address. Published by the Truth Seeker Company, New York.—Home Advocate.

---

"THE Origin of the Christian Bible," by O. B. Whitford, published by the Truth Seeker Company, New York, is a very interesting treatis upon this complicated question. The author plunges headlong into a sea of arguments and reasonings, and while now and then a trifle too captious in his assertions, makes a very elaborate and readable article. In his closing remarks the author says: "Let us search for truth, the only object of the honest man, and exterminate the figments of hypocrisy by converting the many elaborate edifices of dogmatical worship into schools for teaching the arts and sciences. . . . Every independent mind, susceptible of philosophical reasoning, is a pillar of strength to the future prosperity of the human race. Then teach the coming generation to respect the entire human family by demonstrating that man is a being capable of receiving truth; that it is always falsehood which injures men—visibly traced to error, which has no remedy but reason."—Galveston News.

"The George-Hewitt Campaign," compiled by Louis F. Post, and Fred. C. Leubuscher, is No. 838 of Lovell's Library. The compilation givs a history of the nomination of Henry George for Mayor of New York and of his acceptance and campaign. Mr. Leubuscher was the stenographer who took down the speeches, and it is to be presumed that Mr. Post was the compiler of the volume. With a fairness that is commendable, these gentlemen hav given us, not only the speeches made by Mr. George and his supporters, but also those made by his chief opponent, Abram Hewitt, together with an account of all the important events of the campaign from begining to end, including the final result in tabulated figures. One of the best things in the book of nearly two hundred pages is Colonel Ingersoll's letter, read at the Cooper Union meeting. As to the compilers of "The George-Hewitt Campaign," it may be said that Mr. Post is a journalist of ability, and the author of Truth's "Sunday Sermons," which were weekly copied into THE TRUTH SEEKER a few years ago. Mr. Leubuscher is an enthusiastic young lawyer and supporter of Henry George, and gave his services as stenographer during the lively times last fall. He is one of the trustees of the Society of Humanity. This work will be of value whether the Labor party livs or dies. If that party reached its greatest hight last election day, the event was at least worthy of being recorded in history; and if the demonstration at that time was only an earnest of what is coming, then, certainly, it should not be lost sight of. The book sells for 20 cents.

The Truth Seeker Company has recently published a pamphlet entitled, "Economic Equities: a Compend of the Natural Laws of Industrial Production and Exchange," by J. K. Ingalls, author of "Social Wealth." It is an able and dispassionate consideration of the subjects of social industry, wealth, rents, values, wages, and motivs to labor. It discusses these topics in their economic phases, without any reference whatever to political and legislativ aspects. The same company has published "Little Lessons for Little Folks," by Aunt Elmina (Mrs. Slenker). The little ones are informed that they are composed of oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen, chlorine, and fluorine, which are gases; and carbon, phosphorus, sulphur, silicon, potassium, sodium, calcium, lithium, magnesium, iron, manganese, copper, and lead. It is hoped that none of them will be induced to make an ante-mortem examination of themselvs to ascertain if the statement is correct. They will be glad to know, if they do not already know, that plants manufacture protoplasmic food for themselvs from the primary elements, after these elements are combined into water, carbonic acid, and ammonia. Is is important that they should be informed, in case the subject was overlooked in their kindergarten instructions, that a Rhizopod is one of the Protista, and that the forming of protoplasm of Protista, of plant and animal life from protoplasm, and of protoplasm from the elements, is called spontaneous generation. Little boys will be more interested than ever in the monkey when they learn that he belongs to the class Mammalia and the order Quadrumana; and they will stare the longer at Barnum's camels when they know that the camel is of the genus Camelus, and the order Ruminantia. They will find sermons in stones when they read that there are three kinds of building stone—siliceous, calcareous, and composit. Little girls will love their dolls the more when they are told that the name "doll" is from Dorothy, or from idol, and the French name is poupée, the German puppe, from the Latin pupa, a girl.—Home Journal.

Obituary.

Departed this life from Eden Mills, Vt., February 20th, Mr. Charles White, aged 74 years, 7 months, and three days.

Although a nativ of Massachusetts, having been born at Uxbridge, Mr. White passed, with the exception of nine years, his long and useful life in Lamville Co., Vt., and was for fifty-five years a resident of Eden. Endowed by nature with an inquiring and acute mind, he early seized with avidity upon whatever opportunity for gaining knowledge presented itself, and with each succeeding year devoted more time to reading and meditation, until his mind was indeed a storehouse of valuable information. He was exceptionally conversant with the history and teachings of religion, both Christian and pagan. Strong in his convictions and tenacious of his opinions, he was, nevertheless, tolerant of spirit and respectful to all. Genial and affectionate in his family, faithful and obliging to his friends, upright, punctual, and diligent in business, always on the side of the oppressed, in him the friendless found a friend, and from him the needy would not turn away empty-handed. His religion was to do good, to lighten sorrow, to lessen need, and add to human joy. He leaves a wife, with whom he passed fifty-three years of more than ordinary domestic concord, four children, and several grandchildren to deeply mourn his earthly loss, while a large circle of friends and acquaintances lament the departure of so kind a neighbor and worthy man.

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attentiv while the truth is being brought to his mind.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

LAST Friday night a young woman was murdered and robbed, just outside the main streets of Rahway, N. J. The body has not been identified, and there is no clue to the murderer.

THE ocean race from New York to Cork Harbor between the two American yachts Coronet and Dauntless for a sweepstakes of $20,000 was won by the Coronet, which reached her destination on Sunday noon, after a tempestuous voyage of nearly fifteen days. The Dauntless was a hundred miles behind.

LIEUTENANT ZALINSKI has a gun planted at Fort Lafayette, in New York harbor, which throws 150-pound dynamite shells two miles and a half. The gun is sixty feet long and works by compressed air. The shells explode with terrific force when they strike. United States officers witnessed some satisfactory experiments with this new gun last Saturday.

THE ocean steamer Scotia with 800 Italian immigrants on board, went ashore last week on Long Island, and the passengers were landed in boats. She was two weeks overdue and the occupants of the steerage were nearly starved, and all of them are destitute. The captain mistook Long Island for New York, and did not know that land was near until his ship stuck in the sand. The New York authorities will look after the immigrants and will probably condemn the most of them as paupers and send them back to sunny Italy.

THE religious Janitor Titus, of the Hackettstown, N. J., Methodist institute, who outraged and murdered Tillie Smith, the housemaid, has had his sentence commuted from hanging to imprisonment for life. Great indignation is felt toward the judges who commuted the sentence, as Titus has confessed that he did the killing, and has added to his crime the infamy of traducing his victim. He now alleges that he had for a long time sustained intimate relations with the girl, and choked her to death in a fit of anger when she informed him that she was in trouble and asked him to help her. The testimony of the physicians positivly denies this story. If any man could deserve hanging, this Titus deserves to be hanged twice. It may be of consolation to religious people to know that Mr. Titus occupies the greater part of his leisure time in reading the Bible.

Odds and Ends.

IT would seem appropriate for Michiganders to marry Portuguese, but they seldom do.

FOR his good work in Boston, Sam Jones is said to hav received $19,000. But $19,000 worth of good work in Boston won't make much of a show.

"I HAV found out what it was the wild waves were saying," observed the snake editor. "What was it?" asked the horse editor. "Let us spray."

WHAT is the difference between a writing-pad that cost's a cent and an Irishman's pen? One is a pad for a penny and the other is a pen for a Paddy.

THE old style was to go around loose in tight trousers. Now the style is to go around tight in loose trousers. Styles change, but the young men remain about the same.

SAM JONES's brother has taken to preaching in Georgia, and they are talking of giving up Prohibition and going back to rum, in the hope that things will quiet down a little.

MISTRESS (severely): "I hav made the fire and cooked the breakfast!" New Servant: "Well, mum, you needn't wait for me. After this, sit down and ate whin yez get it ready."

WHEN a boy on his way to Sunday-school loses the nickel he has been carrying for the missionary box, he is torn with agonizing remorse because he didn't spend it for peanuts before it was wasted.

SOME St. Paul investigators hav decided that the word "toboggan" is from the Ojibwa word "odaban," which means any vehicle by which anything is drawn. Ergo, a corkscrew is a toboggan.

THE ancient proverb says, "You cannot get more out of a bottle than you put in it." That's an error. Besides what he puts in he can get a headache, a sick stomach, and perhaps ten days in the lock-up.

A PLEASANT young lad had a kfife
Whose pitch was as sharp as a knife;
So shrill was its shriek
That he "busted" his chiek—
And his neighbors are weary of klife.

"WHY does Congress take a recess?" asked Rollo; "to giv the members a rest?" "No, my son," replied Rollo's father, "to giv the country a rest. Congress never rests." "And why not?" asked Rollo, inquiringly. "Because," replied his father, "it never does enough to make it tired."

"THERE is one thing about me," said Dumley, as he wrote his name in the hotel register; "I pay as I go, and don't you forget to remember it!" "Any baggage?" demanded the clerk. "No." "Then you won't pay as you go; you'll pay as you come! Two dollars please, and remember not to forget it!"

PRESBYTERIAN minister (with warmth): "Ah, my pious friend, this is indeed a rare treat. I would to heaven more young men joined my church of their own free will. But you shall be rewarded——" PIOUS Young Lawyer (who has just opened an office): "That's it! The reward's what I'm after. The Methodist minister said there was no scandal in his church, and I didn't stand a ghost of a show of getting a law practice there, so I thought I'd come and see what arrangement I could make with your church. If you'll guarantee me fifteen hundred the first year I'll join at once. What do you say?"

"F. G. B." writes from Stamford, Delaware Co.: "The Delaware river rises in this town, starting from several large springs on the mountain side, about three miles out of the village. The river, where it passes through the village, is but a small brook, and during the dry season it is carefully guarded for fear that some stray cow will come along and drink it up, and thus cut off the people of that vicinity from a direct water communication with Philadelphia and the ocean via Delaware bay, and make Stamford forever an inland town."

SENATOR DAWES does not pose as a humorist, but his wit is keen at times. During the boundary line controversy between Massachusetts and Rhode Island the subject came up at a dinner-table in Washington, and a Rhode Island member of Congress, waxing indignant over it, exclaimed to Mr. Dawes: "Dawes, it's a shame for Massachusetts to attempt to steal a part of Rhode Island! a confounded shame!" "Don't make so much fuss about it," retorted Dawes. "If we should steal your whole state it would be only petit larceny, and a justice of the peace would hav urisdiction."

A WITTY critic, with his ready tongue,
Half jestingly, and half in earnest, said,
To the fair lady he was soon to wed:
"I cannot claim my pedigree among
The famous ones whose praises hav been sung;
Low-born am I, dear madam, and low-bred;
And of my relativs, alive or dead,
The only noted one, I've heard, was hung."
The lady answered him, with keenest wit,
"I'm sure, dear sir, you need not mention it;
I, like yourself, can claim but humble birth;
And if," she added, with a touch of mirth,
"No one was ever hung among my kin,
I doubt not, more than fifty should hav been."

SAM JONES received $19,000 for one month's work in Boston. It is now a "stand-off" as to which pays the best, being a professional face-pounder or a professional pulpit-pounder. Sam Jones and John Sullivan are both gathering in the shekels at about the same rate, and who knows but what, at no distant date, they will join forces and do the Twain-Cable act? John could come out on the stage and break a few faces, just to get the audience interested; then Sam could step forth while John was being rubbed down and save enough souls for a mess. Or, if there were a few souls present who refused to be saved, they could be brought on the stage and John could pound the religion into them. This double "Uncle Tom's Cabin" act would undoubtedly prove a great financial success, and every one would get the worth of his money.—Peck's Sun.

Gems of Thought.

THE idea or dogma of a savior or redeemer to save the world from destruction is one that the world has believed in as far back as history extends. Every religion and every nation has had its redeemer, and these hav been worshiped as the saviors of mankind.—D. M. Bennett.

DRUMCLOG MOSS is the next object that survives in my memory, and Irving and I sitting by ourselvs under the silent skies, with a world all silent around us. . . . It was just here, as the sun was sinking, that Irving actually drew from me by degrees, in the softest manner, the confession that I did not think as he of the Christian religion, and that it was vain for me to expect I ever could or shou'd. This, if this was so, he had pre-engaged to take well from me, and right loyally he did so, and to the end of his life we needed no concealments on that head, which was really a step gained.—Carlyle's Reminiscences. [NOTE.—We hav here as candid a confession of faith, or want of faith, as Carlyle has anywhere treated us to. It is humiliating and pitiful to think that, through all his life, he never took the world into his confidence so completely as he took his friend, Edward Irving, that glorious night in Drumclog Moss. It is a sad spectacle to see a man of Carlyle's vigor of mind binding himself to obsolete dogmas which he saw through and despised, and was yet unable to shake off. He continued all his life to "sit on the fence," and was ever ready to giv a bishop or Voltaire a rap over the knuckles, as opportunity occurred. Tros Tyriusve was his motto. If the Christians care to claim the author of "Sartor Resartus" they may hav him. For honesty and straightforwardness of purpose, we decidedly prefer the author of the "Age of Reason."—Hylax.]

THE myths of paganism are as dead as Osiris or Zeus, and the man who should revive them in opposition to the knowledge of our time would be justly laughed to scorn; but the coeval imaginations current among the rude inhabitants of Palestine, recorded by writers whose very name and age are admitted by every scholar to be unknown, hav unfortunately not yet shared their fate, but even at this day are regarded by nine-tenths of the civilized world, as the authoritativ standard of fact, and the criterion of the justice of scientific conclusions, in all that relates to the origin of things, and among them of species. In this nineteenth century, as at the dawn of modern physical science, the cosmogony of the semi-barbarous Hebrews is the incubus of the philosopher and the opprobrium of the orthodox. Who shall number the patient and earnest seekers after truth, from the days of Galileo until now, whose lives hav been embittered and their good name blasted by the mistaken zeal of Bibliolaters? Who shall count the host of weaker men whose sense of truth has been destroyed in the effort to harmonize impossibilities—whose life has been wasted in the attempt to force the generous, new wine of science into the old bottles of Judaism, compelled by the outcry of the same strong party?—Huxley's Origin of Species.

THERE is a moral sentiment in the human breast which, like intelligence, is born of obscure instincts, and which gradually becomes developed. Since the gods of men are the reflected images of men, it is evident that as men become developed in morality the character of their gods will also be improved. The king of a savage land punishes only offenses against himself and his dependents. But when that people become more civilized, the king is regarded as the representativ of public law. In the same manner the gods of a savage people demand nothing from their subjects but taxes and homage. They punish only heresy, which is equivalent to treason; blasphemy, which is equivalent to insult, and the withholding of tribute and adoration, which is equivalent to rebellion. And these are offenses which, even among civilized nations, the gods are suffered to punish severely. But the civilized gods also require that men shall act justly to one another. They are still despots for they order men to flatter them and to giv them money. But they are not mere selfish despots, they will reward those who do good, they will punish those who do evil to their fellow-men.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

THAT the doctrin of endless punishment will be fully, and frankly, and in every form discarded while the popular religion—Christianity—survives, cannot be expected. For, as has been declared, the article is an essential part of that religion, and will be maintained, literally or figurativly, by those who are interested in keeping the system alive. But that it is vanishing away before the brighter intelligence and the better heart of the modern world is very certain, and equally certain it is that into the shadow of oblivion will go the kindred tenets with which it is associated.—Frothingham's Dogma of Hell.

DUNCAN is in his grave;
After life's fitful fever he sleeps well.
Treason has done his worst; nor steel nor poison,
Malice, domestic, foreign laws, nothing
Can touch him further. —Shakspere's Macbeth.

THE GRAND ARMY OF DRONES.

Notes and Clippings.

THERE is a rich man in the Black Hills, says the Bismarck Times, who dates the beginning of his fortune from the day when he sold his wife for $4,000.

THE Rev. Justin D. Fulton is crusading against the Catholic church. He preaches twice a day at Masonic Temple, this city. What he has to say about Catholics bears with much the same force upon Protestants.

SIR WILLIAM THOMPSON says: "I think it would be exceedingly rash to assume as probable anything more than twenty million years of the sun's light in the past history of the earth or to reckon on more than five million or six million years of sunlight for time to come."

IDA JONES was tried in this city last week for violating the Sunday law in selling a one-cent collar button to Policeman John J. Cummings of the Fifth street station on Sunday. Mrs. Jones told the court that the policeman had knocked at the door of her store at 242 Bowery, said that he had lost his collar button, and she gave him one, for which he laid down a cent, and then arrested her. She was fined $5.

THE Assembly committee which has been investigating the officials of Brooklyn was ordered to report to the Assembly April 1st. Mr. Bacon, the chairman of the committee, asked for an extension of time, which was opposed by Assemblyman Sheehan. The investigation, said Mr. Sheehan, was for political ends. Mr. Bacon was instigated by conspirators, chief of whom was "Anthony Comstock, who livs off reputable men, in order to conceal his own nakedness and wickedness." It seems that Comstock is gradually being found out.

THE order-book of the House of Commons, says Charles Bradlaugh, now presents a curious instance of pious unity for the annoyance of an Infidel enemy. Mr. W. Johnston, the ultra-Protestant Ulster Conservativ, has joined himself with Mr. de Lisle, the English Roman Catholic, in blocking the Affirmation bill.

IN Justice Knipmeyer's court at Higginsville, the Rev. Richard R. Highleyman, of Kansas City, Mo., was found guilty of an assault upon Mrs. Laura Huddleson, the wife of a farmer who livs on a farm owned by Gov. Jo O. Shelby, and fined $40 and costs, amounting in all to $60. The assault consisted of forcibly kissing the woman against her will and playfully pulling her ears. The Rev. Mr. Highleyman has been pastor of the North Methodist church at Aullville, Lafayette county, for the past year, and the lady was one of his flock.

A BOSTON jury has decided, as a matter of fact, that barber-shop shaving on Sunday is not "a work of necessity or charity," and is therefore unlawful. What queer ideas, exclaims the World, hav filtered down to the dwellers at the Hub, through many generations of Puritans and Pharisees! Shaving on Sunday is, of course, not a work of charity, as the little checks that follow it call for a cash payment. But if one of these jurymen had been accustomed to the services of a "tonsorial artist," and should undertake to shave himself of a Sunday morning, he would very quickly conclude that public shaving is a work of necessity. If the custom of the good old town calls for clean faces on Sunday morning, as is the fashion in other cities less highly civilized than Boston boasts of being, the necessity of shaving is again apparent. And if the old "Blue Laws" hav so far lapsed into a state of innocuous desuetude as to permit a husband to kiss his wife on Sunday, a smooth chin becomes a matter of charity, if not of necessity.

THE Rev. Dr. James Curran, formerly of St. Stephen's church, has been directed to retire to a Hoboken monastery for ten days to do penance because he appeared upon the platform at the Academy of Music on Tuesday of last week when Dr. McGlynn spoke. Dr. Curran's ecclesiastical superior was displeased with his action in appearing with Dr. McGlynn at Jones's Wood on St. Patrick's Day, and it was by way of disciplin that he was sent to Ellenville, Ulster county. His appearing with Dr. McGlynn at the Academy has brought down upon him the order into retreat in Hoboken. His penance will consist of ten days of strict seclusion, during which he will observe fasts and perform religious exercises. Independent action by priests is not a success in this diocese from a personal convenience point of view. But as long as men choose to be slaves to other men, let them accept what their voluntary servitude brings them. There is no ball and chain attached to them that prevents their leaving the church, and civil laws are still superior to ecclesiastical rules.

SOME time ago some letters published in the Times of India by "a Hindoo lady" made a profound impression upon those who read them. This lady, whose is named Rukmibhai, was married, according to Hindoo usage, at the age of eleven, to a youth some years her senior. She remained at her parents' house, was carefully educated, and grew up, according to all accounts, into a refined and highly cultivated girl. Last year her husband tried to get her to liv with him, and on her refusing instituted a suit for the restitution of conjugal rights in the Bombay High Court. The case was tried in the first instance by Mr Justice Pinhey, when, it having been proved that the husband was too poor to support her, was utterly ignorant and uneducated—in fact, a mere coolie—and was, moreover, consumptiv, the judge expressed the opinion that it would be a barbarous, cruel, and revolting thing to compel her to liv with such a man. He further held that such suit could not lie under Hindoo law, and dismissed it. The husband appealed, and the case was argued before the chief justice and Mr. Justice Bayley. These learned judges, while expressing their entire sympathy with Rukmibhai, felt compelled to rule that Mr. Justice Pinhey was wrong in law, and remanded the case to the Lower Court for trial on its merits. It has now been reheard before Mr. Justice Farran. Rukmibhai's counsel could only repeat that his client had never consented to the marriage, and never regarded the man as her husband, that the husband was poor, ignorant, and unhealthy, and that if ordered to return to him she would be obliged to disobey, and was prepared to take the consequences. The court had no option save to pass an order that she should join her husband within a month. Should she fail to do so she would be liable to six months' imprisonment.—National Reformer.

Miracles and Miracle Workers.

Consult your encyclopedias in regard to the magi of the East, and you will find they were ministers of Zoroaster. They were those who came to see the infant Jesus (or, at least, they visited the infant Zoroaster and the Christians stole the story), and were considered wise men.

They were supposed to be acquainted with certain properties and affinities of bodies which enabled them to produce effects truly astonishing to the uneducated. From magi the word magician is derived. To the vulgar the magicians performed wonderful feats, but they were the result of natural causes, and yet they got credit for supernatural and miraculous powers. And this is all there ever was to any miracle, whether performed by magi, magician, saint, apostle, or Jesus Christ himself.

Nearly all the early Christians believed that these magicians wrought miracles, but they claimed that the wonderful works were done by the help of demons.

The magicians used to pit themselves one against another, and fight like dogs.

Moses and Aaron turned all the waters of Egypt nto blood. Pharaoh laughed, "Ha, ha, ha!" and said, "Your hocus-pocus tricks ain't worth a picayune over here in Egypt." So he brought forth his magicians, and they turned all the waters into blood, and got a great deal better blood, and more of it, from the same water, although Moses and Aaron had worked it over once. Then they brought forth the frogs, and the magicians did the same, and got bigger frogs and better jumpers.

Then they turned their rods into serpents, and the magicians made their rods squirm too. But Moses's snakes swallowed the others, and then Moses and Aaron were unfair enough to run off and delare a victory. Whereas, if they had only waited until the magicians could have got some larger rods, which they could have worked into bigger snakes, these would not only have swallowed the other snakes but Moses and Aaron too.

Putting humor aside, is it not a disgrace to the age that such men as Cook and Talmage should take up the gibberish of idiots and peddle it out to what purports to be the cream of intelligent people, for the holy word of God? One would be led to think that Cook and Talmage could be imposed upon to-day by the pretended miracle worker if his Fe-fi-fo-fum were only pronounced solemnly in the name of God.

Irenæus affirms that "the disciples of Christ received grace from him, and wrought miracles, cast out devils, had the knowledge of future events, visions, and prophetical sayings, healed the sick, raised the dead, each according to the gift which he had received."

Are there no true "disciples of Christ" to-day? I would ask; or has Christ lost his power? There are none of those wonderful things done now, not even one poor prophet in all the land. No devils are "cast out." No physician depends on the gift of Christ as a remedy. Nobody would bury a dead friend if it were possible to raise the dead. What I want to get into the mind of the Christian is that the laws of nature never change; that these things are as possible to-day as they ever were; that Irenæus was either deceived or else he lied.

Tertullian tells of a "sister who converses with angels and with God—sees mysteries and knows the hearts of men." He also tells of a "woman who folded her hands in the attitude of prayer, after she was dead."

Every system of supernatural religion has its miracles and wonderful men, who are stationed somewhere between vulgar mortals and imaginary beings out of sight. Each devotee believes so much of the impossible as is woven into his own system of religion, and generally discards the impossible in other systems. Few realize that ideas, however erroneous, impressed upon the young mind, generation after generation, become fixed, and act like instinct. To reason with those is like trying to persuade the dog not to bark, or the birds to sing differently from what they do.

There is a lie somewhere concealed in everything which is said to have transpired beyond the natural.

As the race advances all systems of supernatural religion will decline, and the people will only have confidence in the real and the natural. Human good will be the object of all, and scientific investigation the only means of grace.

Narcissus, bishop of Jerusalem, turned water into oil when the lamps failed at the vigil of Easter. This is upon the authority of Eusebius. It is not strange that such wonderful things should happen among an ignorant and superstitious people. The wonder is that intelligent men should be imposed upon because a lot of interested pious lunatics like Cook and Talmage have taught in each generation that God has been engaged in such can-trap nonsense.

Could we know all the wonderful things which have been written and taught by the early fathers, miracles could not be put upon the market for a cent on the dollar.

In the Acts of Philip it is related that when Mariamni was stripped, her body was found to be a glass chest filled with light. Had the Acts of Philip been voted a part of the New Testament, this miraculous statement would have been believed by all Christians. But still the Christian is unable to see that this is just as good a miracle as any. The difference is, this was voted out and the ones which he believes were voted in.

The laws of nature are unalterable or they are not. If they are unalterable, then a miracle has never been performed. If they are fickle and changeable, then at any moment planets might leave their appointed courses, and, without law or order, crash against each other, involving the ruin of worlds.

If the intellectual power of the whole human race could be centered in one brain, it could not vary a single law of nature in the slightest degree.

It has been demonstrated by the best scientists which the world has ever produced that the earth, in her diurnal revolution, has not varied the hundredth part of a second in a thousand years. And yet the Christian believes that the shadow was turned back on the dial, and that power was given to bloody old Joshua to turn two days into one. The truth is, these statements are untrue, and if they had been written down in all the so-called sacred books which have ever originated in the brains of impostors, they would still be lies.

If all the men who have ever posed as miracle workers, and all the men to whom divine honors have been paid, including popes, saints, and saviors, should tell me that the law of gravitation has ever been other than it is to-day, I would not believe them. Is the law of gravitation one thing to us to-day, and was it another thing to Elijah? Is it possible that the same law which holds us down to the earth could make another ascend upward?

If I could be made to believe the story of Elijah I should be in constant fear of losing our darling "Bob," for if ever there was a man too good for earth, I think he is the man. A man who believes that a human being was ever taken up bodily from the earth is on the verge of insanity.

If a hundred men in whom I had the utmost confidence should tell me that in a certain district the law of gravitation had been reversed, and that water was running up hill, and rocks and trees were flying into the air, I would not believe them. It would be a hundred times easier for me to believe that they had been deceived, or that they wished to deceive me, than to believe that there ever had been an infraction of nature's laws. These laws were the same two thousand years ago as they are to-day. If so, the miracles of the New Testament were impossible. Whatever can be done without a violation of the laws of nature is no miracle. Talmage may rant, but he could not produce sufficient evidence in a court of justice that a miracle has ever been performed to obtain a judgment for a nickel.

In the first place there is no substantial evidence as to who told the stories of the miracles as related in the New Testament. In the second place there is no evidence as to when the stories were told. Think of a witness on the stand making a statement in regard to a transaction, and then saying that he had the statement from somebody else, and unable to tell from whom, and then unable to tell when the transaction occurred. What weight would an impartial jury give to such statements?

Talmage may rant about believing every word of the Bible, but if put upon the witness stand he would be in just this dilemma.

With these facts before our eyes, is it safe to believe that a dead man was ever brought to life, or that a man ever ascended from the earth bodily, nobody knows where? Would not fire have the same effect upon the tissues of the human body three thousand years ago that it has to-day? If so, what is the story about the three Hebrew children worth? It is said that Christ ascended into heaven. Did anybody see him arrive there? or did he telegraph back that he had a prosperous journey?

How does it happen that devils were so much more plenty in ancient times than they are now? Half of the people were filled with devils two thousand years ago. The last authentic account that I have had of a devil was when one tried to enter Luther. But Luther beat him with his inkstand and came off victorious; so I fight him with ink too. Even no longer ago than when I was a boy he was invested with a great deal of power, and much to be dreaded. But now little boys fish with pin-hooks on Sunday, and the smallest kind of a devil does not come after them. If this goes on for another generation, as Heston would put it, the devil will become a "defunct functionary."

Just imagine yourself back among the people two thousand years ago, so that you may get an idea of this devilish business. In the first place, it must be understood that everyone who was crazy, or had fits, or Saint Vitus's dance—in brief, half of the people who were sick—was believed to be possessed with a devil or demon.

There were very few, even of the most intelligent who did not carry with them some manner of charm to keep off the demons or evil spirits.

As soon as a child was born, a piece of paper with certain characters written upon it, or some kind of powder, or something which acted as a charm or spell, was concealed about its garments to keep away demons.

Sometimes it was a black cat's tooth, or the dried head of a snake, or some part of a toad. A person could scarcely be found who did not have some charm or plan or device for relieving demoniacs. In order to be let into the secret of this ancient deviltry, and understand how all classes believed in devils and were filled with them, it is only necessary to refer to Joshphus's "Antiquities of the Jews," book 8, ch. ii, §5.

In speaking of Solomon, he says, "God enabled him to learn that skill which expels demons, which is a science useful and sanative to men. And he left behind him the manner of using exorcisms by which they drive away demons so that they never return, and this method of cure is of great force unto this day. For I have seen a certain man of my own country whose name was Eleazar, releasing people who were demoniacal, in the presence of Vespasian and his sons, and his captains, and the whole multitude of his soldiers."

The manner of the cure was this: He put a ring that had a root of one of those sorts mentioned by Solomon to the nose of the demoniac, after which he drew out the demon from his nostrils; and when the man fell down immediately, he abjured him to return into him no more, making still mention of Solomon and reciting the incantation which he had composed.

And when Eleazar would persuade and demonstrate to the spectators that he had such a power, he set a little way off a cup or basin of water and commanded the demon to overturn it, and thereby to let the spectators know that he had left the man.

Let it be borne in mind by all Christians that this story is told and indorsed by Josephus, one of the most learned men of his time; that that miraculous feat was performed in the presence of Vespasian, one of the great emperors of Rome, and in the presence of his family and of all his officers and his whole army.

Now, if these great men could be imposed upon with a ring and a root, and a hic-hoc-horem ceremony, what must have been the condition of the vulgar masses? This was about seventy-five years after the time of the supposed birth of Christ.

Is it any wonder, in such an age, and among such a superstitious people, that young virgins were tampered with by Holy Ghosts and brought forth young Gods? that men were jumping out of their graves and would not stay buried? that men were going up into the air bodily, buttons and breeches, before a balloon was thought of? that God was engaged in the book business, and had saints and apostles and "the devil and all" to help him?

Then Josephus speaks of this trick, or sleight, or power of casting out devils, as a "science" which could be taught and learned like the science of chemistry or astronomy—that is to say, with the hic-hoc-horem lingo or "the incantation which Solomon had composed," and the "ring" and the "root," anybody could cast out devils.

My mother was a New Jersey woman, and many times she has had a hearty laugh about certain words which she was taught to repeat when a child to keep witches from interfering with her. Cannot anyone see the close relation between these silly words or charms or devices for keeping off witches, and the "ring" and the "root" and the "incantation" of Solomon? Think of a real, thoroughbred, full-grown devil being pulled out of a man's nose with a "root" and a "ring," and then kicking over a basin of water! Oh, how long will the Christian continue to wallow in the mire of superstition?

I saw a man cut off a rooster's head, and then cause the rooster to strut and craw. This, with other similar tricks, so impressed my boyish mind as to leave a lasting effect. And I think God and Solomon had just as much to do with the rooster trick as they had in helping Eleazar to cast out devils. There is nobody but a Christian lunatic who can be imposed upon by such balderdash.

Some day the schoolmaster will outgrow the minister, and the schoolhouse will overshadow the church, and then Christians will find out how they have been fooled by miracle workers. JOHN PECK.

Idle Tales About Washington.

The story of Washington praying at Valley Forge can be accounted for. A writer in Leisure Hours states that Captain Morton, of a Pennsylvania regiment, resembled General Washington, and that he was both patrotic and pious, and was in the habit of praying in the woods, and was doubtless mistaken by some one for the Father of his Country.

One of my old school books stated that General Washington requested the privilege of partaking of the "Lord's supper" in a strange church. It is such fables as this that giv Christianity its standing, and so long as Freethinkers fail of supporting schools of their own they will hav to endure such slanders in the school books. J. P. GUILD.

English as She Ought Not to be Writ.

I am glad that Helen Gardener has touched upon the subject of "English as she is writ." Very few people outside of a printing-office realize how much trouble would be saved editors, proof-readers, and compositors if those who hav something to write only knew how to write it with propriety.

There is an error generally prevalent that anyone who pens a fair hand, and can spell correctly, is prepared to produce an article, or even a book, worth reading, while, as a matter of fact, these qualifications can scarcely be termed essential. Many great authors write a miserable scrawl, and know less about orthography than the mechanic who puts their manuscript in type. The colossal "nerve" which some people display in appearing before the public as au thors is a matter of astonishment to those who can appreciate the magnitude of it. I recently handled the manuscript of a retired jurist who, wearied of the rugged course of law, had turned his enfeebled steps toward the paths of literature, and had written a book. He knew little about the subjects of which he was to treat; but that is not to the point. His great mistake was in thinking, as he evidently did, if he thought upon the subject at all, that gram mar and diction were of no account, and that writing a book was merely a matter of mechanical execution, of which pen, ink, and paper were the only indispensable auxiliaries. If he had contemplated appearing as a composer or as an artist, possibly the notion would hav struck him that a little preliminary study of the technique of music or painting would be advisable; but that rhetoric is an essential factor in the expression of ideas was the thought farthest from him. This man is a type of the class who, merely to gratify their self-conceit, cumber the shelves of publishers with unreadable and unsalable trash.

'Tis pleasant, sure, to see one's name in print;
A book's a book, although there's nothing in't.

The greater number of poor writers are prevented from making their total ignorance known to the world by the vigilance of compositors and proof-readers. If an editor is attacked by an illiterate correspondent, the most effectual way of crushing the dissatisfied person is, not to reply to him, but to print his letter verbatim, as was done in the case of Mr. Irvine, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 5th. I once saw a note in a Western paper in which the editor said that if an esteemed citizen did not cease sending poetry to that office, he (the editor) would certainly print some of it. This warning was given out of consideration for the friends of the aforesaid esteemed citizen.

But newspaper writing is not always good. What kind of English is this, from the St. Paul Globe?

It looks like religion was making progress when the pulpit lets go of the ballet and jumps on the décolletté dresses.

The use of "like" for as if is too barbarous to escape the notice of civilized people. "Was" for were is bad enough.

Innumerable gross forms of expression are in current use among careless writers, and they reproduce themselvs by other careless writers copying them. As an example, the novice thinks it is the hight of sarcasm to call somebody a gentleman and introduce an interrogation point in parenthesis after the word gentleman, thus, (?). This is intended to question the propriety of applying the term gentleman to the person referred to. I object to it because it is inane and witless. If you don't desire to call a man a gentleman, then call him what you think he is, or say nothing. Innuendo is not justifiable. "You lie, you villian, you lie," said Horace Greeley. That sentence has at least the merit of being direct.

We often see the words "the same" used instead of the pronoun it. A correspondent writes, "I send an article for your columns, and would be pleased to see the same in print." Why not it? The words are appropriately used by Bret Harte in his "Truthful James:"

Which I wish to remark,
And my language is plain,
That for ways that are dark
And for tricks that are vain
The heathen Chinee is peculiar,
Which the same I would rise to explain.

The ordinary business letter is a model of bad form:

BOSTON, 3—20, '87.

T. S. Co., Gents: Yrs recd this P.M., and contents noted. In reply w'd say. [Then follows whatever is to be communicated.] Yrs &c.

Why not write March 20, 1887? Why say gents? Gent. may be excused as an abbreviation, but there is no authority for appending the final s, as the plural of gentleman is not formed by the addition of that letter. Is life too short to admit of spelling yours and received and would in full? As an abbreviation for afternoon, P.M. is proper only when accompanied by the figure denoting the hour—as 3 P.M. "In reply would say." Who would say? "Yours, &c.," is an offensiv vulgarism, and means nothing.

Abbreviations should be used sparingly. I hav frequently seen "the rev. gent." in manuscript and sometimes in print. Again, people with a weak sense of the fitness of things write that "the Dr. was sent for." Others hav lived in N. Y., or in N. H., or in Ills., or in some other abbreviated state. The only proper use of Dr. for doctor is when it precedes the name of the doctor spoken of. The names of states can be shortened with propriety when they follow the names of towns or cities, as Boonton, N. J. "Mr. J." for Mr. Jones is not countenanced by use among good writers.

One of the most entertaining writers for THE TRUTH SEEKER sometimes puts "had hav" together, thus, "If I had hav known." Others say "had of." Both are ungrammatical.

Bad writing does not always proceed from ignorance, but often from a desire to be ornate or hifalutin. From an article by Cora Lynn Daniels, entitled, "A Letter on Prayer from the Duke of Argyll," published in the North American Review for March, 1887, I extract two sentences. Can anybody tell what they mean?

Following the Darwinian theory of evolution from its earliest conclusions of primeval history, ages before the earth became habitable by man, up to the laws of evolution in society, which are proven with the same painstaking care and illustration, Mr. Fiske presents the whole scheme of existence in a clear and ever deepening and broadening stream of logic, until it flows with majestic current and irresistible force into the ocean of the invisible.

Perhaps it is possible to follow a theory of evolution, but it would be better to adopt or accept the theory and follow the evolution. The conclusions reached would not be the conclusions of evolution nor the conclusions of primeval history, but the conclusions of the student. "Conclusions of primeval history" cannot possibly be understood. Then we hav "the laws of evolution in society proven with the same painstaking care and illustration." The same as what? "Mr. Fiske presents the whole scheme of existence in a clear and ever deepening and broadening stream of logic." Absolutely meaningless! "Until it," that is, the scheme of existence, "flows with majestic current and irresistible force into the ocean of the invisible." And as the scheme of existence flows into the invisible, common sense takes to the woods.

Here is the other:

By entertaining writers whose exact deductions are still poetic, and whose justice both ways toward the psychical and the physical do not interrupt, but rather emphasize, the rhythmic harmony of their interaction, the reader who understands the grand theme at all must necessarily fall into the swing and flow of their intellectual current, and be borne easily and strongly on to a satisfactory result.

No matter how valuable an idea may be contained in that sentence, the reader must earn it before he gets it, and then his intellect will be so far exhausted that he will never be able to assimilate what he has acquired. The previous quotation cannot be subjected to grammatical analysis at all. Here we hav a violation of one of the simplest rules of syntax in the words "whose . . . justice do not interrupt, but rather emphasize." The Rev. John Jasper's famous sentence, "The sun do move," thus finds a distinguished parallel.

It is a mistake to suppose that the reason we do not understand these swoshy writers is because the thought sought to be expressed is too subtle and profound for our comprehension. The truth is, they do not understand themselvs. Their language contains no meaning, and it is not worth our while to put one into it. The educated person who thinks clearly will write clearly. Thomas Paine was always the master of his subject, and we hav no better examples of plain English than he has given us. But there is evidence that Paine's style was a carefully studied one. Daniel Webster reached the hight of eloquence in his day; yet any one who has had the opportunity to read his greatest effort—the "Invocation for the Preservation of the American Union"—as he uttered it, and as it was printed after careful revision, will be able to judge how much he owed to the rules of rhetoric. No writer can match Colonel Ingersoll in beauty of style, and at the same time none could exercise a greater care in the choice and arrangement of words. It would be as reasonable for an artist to put the requisit colors into a squirt-gun and eject them upon his canvas, expecting a beautiful picture as a result, as for a writer to string a quantity of words carelessly upon paper and expect the types to convert them into a readable essay.

A weak cause often leads to weak or obscure writing. For proof of this compare the turgid utterances of Gladstone with the clear-cut periods of Huxley in their discussion on "The Order of Creation." There is little excuse for bungling writing nowadays. Almost numberless books on rhetoric are to be had, and no person, it seems to me, should trust himself to write a letter until he has at least taken a few hints on the subject of literary construction. There is Blair's "Rhetoric," which has been in the book market for half a century or more. It is true that Blair violates many of his own rules, and so does Lindley Murray, but it is not necessary to adopt their errors. Alfred Ayres's "Verbalist" is a valuable work. A brief scrutiny of the last part of the ordinary school grammar is better than nothing. Herbert Spencer's "Philosophy of Style" cannot be read without profit. The subject is not a dry one, but is full of interest, and, to those who hav ideas to express, the importance of its study can hardly be overestimated.

To unskilled poetry-writers we may say nothing except "Don't." There is no other kind of writing quite as absurd as verse that is "mechanically" defectiv. Mr. Seaver of the Investigator has a quaint way of dealing with amateur poets. He puts the effusion in the waste-basket and then publishes a little note to the writer relating the fate that has befallen the poem. Then he adds that when he was young he wrote poetry himself, and some of it was printed, to his subsequent regret, and so out of kindness he refrains from publishing the verses of his correspondent. There is a concealed philanthropy in this course of the venerable editor which all poets will be able to discover as soon as they reach the period of discretion. Still, I believe that almost anybody can by study become a fair versifier.

I do not know what percentage of writers take account of style when expressing their thoughts on paper; but I know that, as regards the selection and arrangement of words, one-half the printed matter that comes under our daily observation ranges from the bad to the execrable. This after the reviser and proof-reader hav done their duty by it. What must it hav been originally? There is no road to literary excellence except through study, and there are no completed rules that can be given in a newspaper article without extending it to a great length; and, as Herbert Spencer says, "a clear head, a quick imagination, and a sensitiv ear will go far toward making all rhetorical precepts needless." "Good composition is far less dependent upon acquaintance with its laws than upon practice and natural aptitude." Beginners will find that the use of simple words and short sentences will do much toward promoting clearness. I would say: Avoid both the highflown and the slangy. Reserve superlativs for occasions which demand their use. Leave foreign words and phrases in the back part of the dictionary where we all know you found them. You will forget what they mean in a little while, and then you will feel embarrassed if anyone asks you to translate them. Don't go into a subject beyond your depth. When you are in doubt as to the propriety of a sentence, erase or amend it. Gibbon, it is said, wrote his "Memoirs" six times. Shun the use of superfluous words, which are usually adjectivs, and be free with your particles. When you find that a sentence is growing long and involved, cut it in two. Quote sparingly. Books of "Familiar Quotations" are useful chiefly for reference; nevertheless, as the force of an observation lies in its application, phrases may sometimes be borrowed from others with good effect. Finally, keep clearness in sight, and sacrifice everything that obscures your meaning. Put the largest amount of thought into the smallest number of words. Be natural, and write from your head instead of the volumes on your shelf; otherwise somebody may catch you away from your books and make an unpleasant discovery; while those who hav formed an acquaintance with you through your writings will be disappointed when they meet you personally.

I trust that the few hints which I hav thus thrown out may not be wholly without value to some apprentice in literature. If I had received them a dozen years ago, there would not be so many things in what I hav written since then that, when I recur to them now, make me feel like concealing myself.

News and Notes.

Saturday night, March 19th, I reach the brilliant city of Los Angeles, the marvel of Southern California, with its sixty thousand inhabitants, and hastening on to a hundred thousand; the paradise of invalids, where they can get cured of all the ills that flesh is heir to, and make money in real estate. It seems as if each one carried an Aladdin's lamp, and discovered riches in the most barren spot. One might shut his eyes and buy anywhere, and he is sure of doubling his investment.

The first man I found was J. E. Clark, a vigorous campaigner, who had organized our forces and prepared the way for effectual work. Mr. Clark has been for years on this Western coast, and always in the front. He is an outspoken Freethinker, no matter what the consequences. He is an ardent reformer and nothing can dim the fires of his enthusiasm. He believes in doing something, and doing it well.

Dr. York, our famous pioneer, has had full houses and created great interest. I am obliged to him for his labors in this field. He has broken the ground pretty effectually, and I find things in a favorable condition for my own endeavor. Dr. York's Australian tour has made him a greater power than ever, and I hope he will receive a cordial welcome in the East. I hav not met him yet, and am quite eager to shake hands with this eloquent preacher of humanity.

Sunday morning I find myself in the pleasant home of John Riggin, on a hill overlooking the city, which is embowered in green and tropical magnificence, while all around shine the Delectable mountains.

John Riggin is seventy-seven years of age, with buoyant spirit and philosophic calm. He says that sixty years ago he discovered he had lost no soul, and from that time on has not troubled himself about the matter, but lived for the sweet enjoyment of this world, in health and virtue, with happy submission to what could not be helped, with hope for life and no fear of death—not anxious about either—but perfectly willing to liv a couple of hundred years longer if nature permits. He has the vivacity of youth, and I guess he will see his one-hundredth birthday.

Sunday evening there was a large and appreciativ audience present at my lecture, and the enthusiasm manifested shows that Liberalism has a very strong hold upon the people of Los Angeles, and that they are in sympathy with its radical demands. I shall lecture at Los Angeles again and shall hav more to say about it and the friends here in my next letter. Monday morning I came to Santa Ana, a city of about four thousand inhabitants, and one of the most flourishing places on the coast. A league was formed here several years ago with Wm. Chestnut for president, and D. Edson Smith for secretary, and it has been doing a quiet but very successful work with its social meetings, etc. In fact, a Baptist minister declared that he was unable to get up a revival in Santa Ana on account of the influence of the Liberal League. Good testimony that to the value of organized effort, however simple its means of achievement.

I found a genial resting-place in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Edson Smith, where I could easily imagin myself to be in the tropics, so luxuriant was all the landscape about. Mr. Smith has ten acres, which he cleared himself. He bought this land several years ago for one hundred dollars per acre. It and the adjacent lands are now worth, in the market, one thousand dollars per acre, and will soon double in value. With good management it is easy to make a net profit of one hundred dollars per acre. An orange grove of five acres will giv from two thousand to five thousand dollars' worth of fruit each year. It produces all the year round. On the same tree from which you pluck the golden orange are the green oranges and the orange blossoms in abundance. As I landed at the station a furious "Santa Ana" was making clouds of dust so that the mountains could hardly be seen. The Santa Ana river flows through the valley, out of the Santa Ana cañon. To the southward is the Santa Ana range, and to the northward the snow-covered peaks of the Sierras. From between the mountain walls occasionally there comes a rushing, mighty wind called a "Santa Ana," which blows seaward from twelve to forty-eight hours. It is said to be the precursor of a rain, but while it blows the sun shines brightly and not a cloud is to be seen. Dana, in his "Two Years Before the Mast," who was on this coast fifty years ago, describes the "Santa Ana" which swept so furiously from shore that the ship had to get up anchor and seek mid-ocean. These gales, however, come but seldom, and they do good by clearing the atmosphere. It is like house-cleaning, and earth and sky receive a brilliant polish, and for months afterward all is pleasant as a lady's smile when she sits in her nicely-scoured parlor with the happy consciousness that all dirt is abolished.

The "Santa Ana" had full swing on the first night of my lecture, but I was greeted with a good house, and on the second and third nights the audience was double, the wind having subsided, and the skies were "deeply, darkly, beautifully blue," gemmed with more stars, I think, than I ever saw in the Eastern heaven. The nights here are simply delicious—never hot, but cooled by constant breezes from the mountains or the sea.

Tuesday night after the lecture I rode over to Anaheim, a distance of eight miles, alongside the scented groves, the flowering fields and evergreen archways and the tall eucalyptus-trees, as if I were speeding through the delightsome vale of Cashmere, to the home of our good friends Mr. and Mrs. Parker, where we arrived about midnight. The next day I reveled in the landscape that spread its sparkling pictures before my eyes. Thirteen years ago Mr. and Mrs. Parker came to this country, which was then one vast cactus plain. In these years all this remarkable change has been made in the valley of Santa Ana. Our friends were among the earliest inhabitants, and by hard work hav developed the resources of the soil, which, when well watered, can produce almost everything. In their charming home at any season of the year one can behold the fruits of the earth. The palm-tree, the banana-tree, the fig-tree, are all here. Oats, wheat, barley, corn of the most excellent quality can be raised, though at present the land is too valuable to be used for such purposes. Down toward the sea-shore is what is called the "Gospel swamp," and this is the cattle and hog country.

Mrs. Anna Parker is one of the occasional contributors to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and is a most earnest and genial Freethinker, and so is her husband, Mr. Leonard Parker, and in two years they will reach the fiftieth anniversary of their wedding. They hav a big family—ten children and I don't know how many grandchildren—and these make in themselvs an army of Freethought. I met Mrs. Handy and Mrs. Tucker—the daughters of Mrs. Parker—and Mr. Joel Parker, her son, and his wife, who reside at Orange. Mr. Joel Parker is one of the prominent citizens of the village of Orange, toward which the Santa Fé Railroad is now being built, and which is in the enjoyment of a boom of the first order, and real estate is rapidly advancing. Mr. Parker, however, does not forget Liberal ideas in the midst of material prosperity, and he is one of the most generous supporters of our cause.

At the closing lecture, Wednesday evening, I had the largest audience of any, and in every respect I feel satisfied with the work done here. I like the spirit of our friends in Santa Ana, Orange, and Anaheim, and believe that in the future they will do much for social and intellectual advancement. Mr. G. W. Thurston and his wife came twenty-five miles to attend the meetings. They were formerly Mormons, and lived in Utah, but are now robust Liberals, whom it is pleasant to see. Emil and Julius Goepper furnished excellent music for the occasion. Mr. Edson Smith, the secretary, is a live worker, and most Liberal-minded, and devoted to Secular affairs, while in the philosophy of Spiritualism he finds hope for something beyond. Mr. William Chestnut, the president of the League, believes only in this life, but he does that to good purpose. Mr. Herman Goepper, J. W. Towner, B. J. Salisbury, J. S. Haywood, Noah Smithwick, Gustave, William, and Charles Schmitz—three brothers—J. P. Hutchins, M. C. Peters, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Gardner, of Orange, J. L. Berry, R. B. Guthrie, and others, are among the pleasant acquaintances I made while in Santa Ana. Mr. D. M. Baker, editor of the Standard, is not afraid to speak his editorial mind, and gave excellent notices of the lectures, which editors, I am sorry to say, are not always ready to do, even if they are Liberals—as most of them are, for they hav too much knowledge to be anything else.

Thursday, March 24th, I come to Norwalk, sixteen miles from Santa Ana, and here I find a good stopping-place at the ranch of A. K. Coward, who has been in this country for years, and is a good fighter for our cause through thick and thin, and with him James Hay and John Goeddel—"Uncle John," as they all call him, for even the Christians like him, and come to him for help in time of trouble, though never for prayers—and S. W. Burke, John Severs, J. E. Courtney, all prominent citizens of the place. Norwalk is not so large nor so well advanced as Santa Ana, but it is rapidly growing. It is twenty miles south of Los Angeles. It is a little too cold and near the sea for oranges, but is favorable for all other fruits.

The house was full on both evenings, and with a most attentiv audience These were the first Freethought lectures ever given in Norwalk, and but few of the listeners had ever heard anything of the kind before, but with few exceptions there was a cordial recognition of the truth. So I feel that a good start has been made here, and I expect to return and complete the organization of a Secular Union. Mr. and Mrs. Coward are both earnest workers, and believe heartily in Liberal advancement and culture. As parents, they realize the necessity of Freethought social life and attainment for the benefit of their children. Besides those already mentioned are Mr. S. G. Baker and family, A. Sproul, L. C. Bridges, James Baldwin, I. V. Dilley, Dr. Randall, Jas. A. Smith, John Doland, D. B. Johnson, O. D. Thompson and family. The Norwalk Brass Band gave us entertaining music for the second evening. Mr. S. W. Burke presided, and made a good closing address.

I am quite encouraged with the spirit and enthusiasm of the friends in Norwalk. A majority of the community are Liberal, and I think that a flourishing Union will be established. At the earnest request of friends, I expect to make another visit to southern California if time allows.

I shall be at Los Angeles to-morrow; at Tulare City, Visalia, San Francisco, Oakland, until April 3d and 10th; at Sonoma, April 7th and 8th; at San José, April 17th and 24th; at Santa Cruz, between these dates; at Stockton, May 1st and 8th; at Sacramento and other places in California, until June 1st; in Oregon, during June; and Washington Territory during July; and then eastward as heretofore noted.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Norwalk, Cal., March 24, 1887.

Mr. Reynolds in Michigan.

March 12th I bade farewell to Bowling Green, Ohio. Two distinct causes operated against the advance of Freethought there. First, the oil and gas wells had created a furor of speculation and excitement; secondly, and far the most formidable obstacle to success, was the fear of Mrs. Grundy. Too many Liberals there lack the courage of their convictions, and humbly obey the dictation of the church, giving liberally to maintain what they at heart despise. The church accepts such gifts, and, in their absence, ridicules the giver.

I suppose it is obtuseness on my part, but I utterly fail to recognize the sense, justice, or consistency of Liberals giving of their means to support priests and parsons, furnishing the whips to be lashed with. I meet Liberals who tell me they giv $25, $50, $100 to the church, yet when asked to subscribe $3 for a Liberal paper that advocates their own views they protest they "really cannot afford it." I respect those who, believing in the church, giv generously of their means to maintain it; but how can I enthuse over those who giv to what they denounce and withhold from what they profess to love?

I rejoiced to start for that Meeca of my pilgrimage, the hospitable home of Elias H. Gault, of Kalamazoo, Mich. Through delays of trains, I did not arrive at his house till half-past one on Sunday morning. In response to his sleepy "Who's there?" I sweetly warbled those soul-inspiring lines, "There's a land that is hotter than this," and in a moment the door flew open, and I received a most glad, warm welcome.

I proposed to remain at Kalamazoo and recuperate, but on Monday received a letter forwarded from Bowling Green. Mr. James Taylor and that venerable old son of Scotia, Mr. Thomas, had advertised me for three lectures at the Court House, Chelsea, Mich., the 15th, 16th, and 17th. So Tuesday morning I departed to Chelsea, and was most cordially welcomed. Under the lead of such stanch, outspoken Liberals as Thomas and Taylor, the weakest mollusks soon develop backbone. I had good attendance, and succeeded in awakening considerable interest.

March 18th, I returned to Kalamazoo, and, thanks to the earnest labors of the popular and indefatigable Elias H. Gault, a full house greeted me on Sunday evening at the Opera House, to hear "Religious Persecutions of the Nineteenth Century." The leading paper of the city, the Gazette, gave a very excellent synopsis, and published it both in the daily and weekly edition, so that hundreds who would not otherwise hav been benefited read "Love and Knowledge." I sold a large number of publications, and the genial Uncle Lute (Lucius West) and Elias H. Gault devoted two days in aiding me to secure subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER, resulting in fourteen new subscribers. When Mr. and Mrs. Gault moved from Rochester to Kalamazoo only about five copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER were taken. Now, and mainly through the efforts of Mr. Gault, there are over forty. Despite his outspoken Infidelity, Elias H. Gault is the most popular man in his ward, and the best citizens of both parties are urging him to accept the office of alderman. Another evidence that outspoken Liberalism, with its principles lived out, so far from injuring, increases respect and popularity.

BRIGHTON, IND.—We took a dip into Indiana at the solicitation of that able young Secularist, Dr. W. A. Ferguson, and March 24th we arrived at Lima, and the doctor took us six miles to Brighton, and deposited us at the hospitable home of young Mr. and Mrs. Wade. The attendance at all four of the lectures was excellent, and I never found more earnest attention, and on Sunday afternoon, after a lecture on "Salvation," I organized the Brighton Liberal Society. A bitter cold and fierce snowstorm raged all day on Sunday, which prevented the attendance of many residing at a distance. Yet nineteen adults became members, and the following excellent selection of officers was made: President, C. A. Shattuck; vice-president, Mrs. Emma Wade; secretary, Dr. W. A. Ferguson; treasurer, Richard Wade; Vigilance Committee, W. L. Wade, Mrs. Julia Gunthorpe, H. J. Hern; Educational Committee, Dr. W. A. Ferguson, Mrs. Della Lint, Thomas Gunthorpe; Social Committee, Peckett Stead, Alex. Lint, Ida Hopkins.

Mr. and Mrs. Hopkins are veterans of Liberalism; a very aged couple, yet heart and soul devoted to promoting the happiness of their fellow-creatures. Mr. and Mrs. Shattuck and Friend Wheeler are like Mr. and Mrs. Gunthorpe and Mr. and Mrs. Wade, outspoken Liberals, living in a bigoted community of Dunkards, yet their lives are exemplary, their justice, kindly nature, and genuin Liberalism hav gained for them the respect and love of all, even of those who deplore their lack of Christianity.

Sunday night, the Prohibitionists having possession of the hall, despite the bitter cold and storm I went to Mongo, a goodly delegation from Brighton accompanying me. The lack of due notice and the severe weather prevented large attendance. Monday, March 28th, I reluctantly bade the new-found but earnest, good friends of Brighton farewell, and long for the time of returning to again enjoy their generous hospitality and kindness. Cheered and invigorated, we started with good Father Wade, the treasurer, to Lima, and took the train for Eaton Rapids, Mich.

Ingersoll on McGlynn.

From the Brooklyn Times.

The attitude of the Roman Catholic church in Dr. McGlynn's case is consistent with the history and constitution of the Catholic church—perfectly consistent with its ends, its objects, and its means—and just as perfectly inconsistent with intellectual liberty and the real civilization of the human race. When a man becomes a Catholic priest, he has been convinced that he ought not to think for himself upon religious questions. He has become convinced that the church is the only teacher—that he has a right to think only to enforce its teachings. From that moment he is a moral machine. The chief engineer resides at Rome, and he givs his orders through certain assistant engineers until the one is reached who turns the crank, and the machine has nothing to do one way or the other. This machine is paid for giving up his liberty by having machines under him who hav also given up theirs. While somebody else turns his crank, he has the pleasure of turning a crank belonging to somebody below him.

Of course, the Catholic church is supposed to be the only perfect institution on earth. All others are not only imperfect, but unnecessary. All others hav been made either by man, or by the devil, or by a partnership—and consequently cannot be depended upon for the civilization of man.

The Catholic church gets its power directly from God, and is the only institution now in the world founded by God. There was never any other so far as I know, except polygamy and slavery and a crude kind of monarchy—and they hav been, for the most part, abolished.

What right has a priest to go into the thinking business? He must kiss the toe of the pope—and even a corn on that toe has a far better right to think than he. And anyone who has bowed to this authority can only regain his independence by open revolt.

The Catholic church must be true to itself. It must claim everything, and get what it can. It alone is infallible. It alone has all the wisdom of this world. It alone has the right to exist. All other interests are secondary. To be a Catholic is of the first importance. Human liberty is nothing. Wealth, position, food, clothing, reputation, happiness—all these are less than worthless compared with what the Catholic church promises to the man who will throw all these away.

A priest must preach what his bishop tells him. A bishop must preach what his archbishop tells him. The pope must preach what he says God tells him.

Dr. McGlynn cannot make a compromise with the Catholic church. It never compromises when it is in the majority. Now and then a priest, or a member, who wishes to do a little thinking for himself—one who wishes to hav a little freedom—says to the Catholic church, as the rooster did to the horse, "Let us agree not to step on each other's feet;" but the church never makes the agreement.

I do not mean by this that the Catholic church is worse than any other. All are alike in this regard. Every sect, no matter how insignificant; every church, no matter how powerful, asks precisely the same thing from every member—that is to say, a surrender of intellectual freedom. The Catholic church wants the same as the Baptist, the Presbyterian, and the Methodist—it wants the whole earth. It is ambitious to be the one supreme power. It hopes to see the world upon its knees, with all its tongues thrust out for wafers. It has the arrogance of humility and the ferocity of universal forgivness. In this respect it resembles every sect. Every religion is a system of slavery.

Of course, the religionists say that they do not believe in persecution; that they do not believe in burning and hanging and whipping or loading with chains a man simply because he is an Infidel. They are willing to leave all this with God, knowing that a being of infinit goodness will inflict all these horrors and tortures upon an honest man who differs with the church.

In case Dr. McGlynn is deprived of his priestly functions, it is hard to say what effect it will hav upon his church and the labor party in this country.

So long as a man believes that a church has eternal joy in store for him, so long as he believes that a church holds within its hand the keys of heaven and hell, it will be hard to make him trade off the hope of everlasting happiness for a few good clothes and a little good food and higher wages here. He finally thinks that, after all, he had better work for less and go a little hungry, and be an angel forever.

I hope, however, that a good many people who hav been supporting the Catholic church by giving tithes of the wages of weariness will see, and clearly see, that Catholicism is not their friend; that the church cannot and will not support them; that, on the contrary, they must support the church. I hope they will see that all the prayers hav to be paid for, although not one has ever been answered. I hope they will perceive that the church is on the side of wealth and power, that the miter is the friend of the crown, that the altar is the sworn brother of the throne. I hope they will finally know that the church cares infinitly more for the money of the millionaire than for the souls of the poor.

Of course, there are thousands of individual exceptions. I am speaking of the church as an institution, as a corporation—and when I say the church, I include all churches. It is said of corporations in general that they hav no soul, and it may truthfully be said of the church that it has less than any other. It livs on alms. It givs nothing for what it gets. It has no sympathy. Beggars never weep over the misfortunes of other beggars.

Nothing could giv me more pleasure than to see the Catholic church on the side of human freedom—nothing more pleasure than to see the Catholics of the world—those who work and weep and toil—sensible enough to know that all the money paid for superstition is worse than lost. I wish they could see that the counting of beads and the saying of prayers and celebrating of masses—and that all the kneelings and censer-swingings and fastings and bell-ringing amount to less than nothing—that all these things tend only to the degradation of mankind. It is hard, I know, to find an antidote for a poison that was mingled with a mother's milk.

The laboring masses, so far as the Catholics are concerned, are filled with awe and wonder and fear about the church. This fear began to grow while they were being rocked in their cradles, and they still imagin that the church has some mysterious power; that it is in direct communication with some infinit personality that could, if it desired, strike them dead, or damn their souls forever. Persons who hav no such belief, who care nothing for popes, or priests, or churches, or heavens, or hells, or devils, or gods, hav very little idea of the power of fear.

The old dogmas filled the brain with strange monsters. The soul of the orthodox Christian gropes and wanders and crawls in a kind of dungeon, where the strained eyes see fearful shapes and the frightened flesh shrinks from the touch of serpents.

The good part of Christianity—that is to say, kindness, morality—will never go down. The cruel part ought to go down. And by the cruel part I mean the doctrin of eternal punishment—of allowing the good to suffer for the bad—allowing innocence to pay the debt of guilt. So the foolish part of Christianity—that is to say, the miraculous—will go down. The absurd part must perish. But there will be no war about it as there was in France. Nobody believes enough in the foolish part of Christianity now to fight for it. Nobody believes with intensity enough in miracles to shoulder a musket. There is probably not a Christian in New York willing to fight for any story, no matter if the story is so old that it is covered with moss. No mentally brave and intelligent man believes in miracles, and no intelligent man cares whether there was a miracle or not, for the reason that every intelligent man knows that the miraculous has no possible connection with the moral. "Thou shalt not steal" is just as good a commandment if it should turn out that the flood was a drouth. "Thou shalt not murder" is a good and just and righteous law, and whether any particular miracle was ever performed or not has nothing to do with the case. There is no possible relation between these things.

I am on the side not only of the physically oppressed, but of the mentally oppressed. I hate those who put lashes on the body, and I despise those who put the soul in chains. In other words, I am in favor of liberty. I do not wish that any man should be the slave of his fellow-men, or that the human race should be the slaves of any god, real or imaginary. Man has the right to think for himself, to work for himself, to take care of himself, to get bread for himself, to get a home for himself. He has a right to his own opinion about God and heaven and hell; the right to learn any art or mystery or trade; the right to work for whom he will, for what he will, and when he will.

The world belongs to the human race. There is to be no war in this country on religious opinions, except a war of words—a conflict of thoughts, of facts; and in that conflict the hosts of superstition will go down. They may not be defeated to-day, nor to-morrow, nor next year, nor during this century, but they are growing weaker day by day.

This priest, McGlynn, has the courage to stand up against the propaganda. What would hav been his fate a few years ago? What would hav happened to him in Spain, in Portugal, in Italy—in any other country that was Catholic—only a few years ago? Yet he stands here in New York, he refuses to obey God's vicegerent; he freely givs his mind to an archbishop; he holds the holy Inquisition in contempt. He has done a great thing. He is undoubtedly an honest man. He never should hav been a Catholic. He has no business in that church. He has ideas of his own—theories, and seems to be governed by principles. The Catholic church is not his place. If he remains, he must submit, he must kneel in the humility of abjectness; he must receive on the back of his independence the lashes of the church. If he remains, he must ask the forgivness of slaves for having been a man. If he refuses to submit, the church will not hav him. He will be driven to take his choice—to remain a member, humiliated, shunned, or go out into the great, free world a citizen of the republic, with the rights, responsibilities, and duties of an American citizen.

I believe that Dr. McGlynn is an honest man, and that he really believes in the land theories of Mr. George. I hav no confidence in his theories, but I hav confidence that he is actuated by the best and noblest motivs.

"Are you to go on the lecture platform again?"

"I expect to after a while. I am now waiting for the church to catch up. I got so far ahead that I began almost to sympathize with the clergy. They looked so helpless and talked in such a weak, wandering, and wobbling kind of way that I felt as though I had been cruel. From the papers I see that they are busy trying to find out who the wife of Cain was. I see that the Rev. Dr. Robinson, of New York, is now wrestling with that problem. He begins to be in doubt whether Adam was the first man, whether Eve was the first woman; suspects that there were other races, and that Cain did not marry his sister but somebody else's sister, and that the somebody else was not Cain's brother. One can hardly overestimate the importance of these questions—they hav such a direct bearing on the progress of the world. If it should turn out that Adam was the first man, or that he was nor the first man, something might happen—I am not prepared to say what—but it might."

It is a curious kind of spectacle to see a few hundred people paying a few thousand dollars a year for the purpose of hearing these great problems discussed: "Was Adam the first man?" "Who was Cain's wife?" "Has anyone seen a map of the land of Nod?" "Where are the four rivers that ran murmuring through the groves of paradise?" "Who was the snake? How did he walk? What language did he speak?" This turns a church into a kind of nursery, makes a cradle of each pew, and givs to each member a rattle with which he can amuse what he calls his mind.

The great theologians of Andover—the gentlemen who wear the brass collars furnished by the dead founder—hav been disputing among themselvs as to what is to become of the heathen who fortunately died before meeting any missionary from that institution. One can almost afford to be damned hereafter for the sake of avoiding the dogmas of Andover here. Nothing more absurd and childish has ever happened—not in the intellectual but in the theological world.

There is no need of the Freethinkers saying anything at present. The work is being done by the church-members themselvs. They are beginning to ask questions of the clergy. They are getting tired of the old ideas—tired of the consolations of eternal pain—tired of hearing about hell—tired of hearing the Bible quoted or talked about—tired of the scheme of redemption—tired of the trinity, of the plenary inspiration of the barbarous records of a barbarous people—tired of the patriarchs and prophets—tired of Daniel and the goats with three horns, and the image with the clay feet, and the little stone that rolled down-hill—tired of the mud man and the ribbed woman—tired of the flood of Noah, of the astronomy of Joshua, the geology of Moses—tired of Kings and Chronicles and Lamentations—tired of the lachrymose Jeremiah—tired of the monstrous, the malicious, and the miraculous. In short, they are beginning to think. They hav bowed their necks to the yoke of ignorance, and fear, and impudence, and superstition until they are weary. They long to be free. They are tired of the services—tired of the meaningless prayers—tired of hearing each other say, "Hear us, good Lord"—tired of the texts, tired of the sermons, tired of the lies about spontaneous combustion as a punishment for blasphemy, tired of the bells, and they long to hear the doxology of superstition. They long to hav Common Sense lift its hands in benediction and dismiss the congregation.

Absurd Bible Stories.

The Bible says that the earth brought forth grass and herb yielding seed, and tree yielding fruit, before the sun existed (Gen. i, 12); that Cain had a wife before there was a woman on the earth, except his mother (Gen. iv, 17); that "when the sons of God came in unto the daughters of men, they bare children to them."

It is said in the book of Ezekiel that God visited harlots, waited on them, and entered into covenant with him, and they bare him sons and daughters (Ezek. xvi, 7, 8, 20–26; xxiii, 2–5).

The Bible is crowded with stories of robbery and murder, said to be expressly commanded of God. As samples, see the following: Ex. xxxii, 27; Num. xxxi, 7, 17; Deut. xxv, 19; 1 Sam. xv, 2, 3; Ezek. ix, 6; Luke xix, 27. See also God's law how to satisfy a jealous husband (Num. v, 11–31). Read the account, and see how God treats married women. Read all these passages here referred to, then ask yourself how it can be possible for anyone to believe that God would hav inspired men to so terribly blacken his own character that it even pains the clergy to hav the matter investigated.

God is represented in the Bible as a bloodthirsty and barbarous murderer. (See Deut. xxviii, 53–57; xxxii, 22–27, 42; 1 Sam. vi, 19, 20; 2 Sam. xxiv, 15; Isa. ix, 19–21; Jer. xix, 9.) And the priests hold that the Bible is true, yet they teach people contrary to what the Bible teaches, and they assume that God is good, and that the devil is bad; but if the passages above referred to were ascribed to the latter, then there would be sufficient reason to pronounce him bad; but since they are ascribed to God, the devil is far the more respectable of the two, for there is no account that he has ever taken anyone's life or anyone's property; and there is no proof that he ever told a single lie. The one laid to him in the Garden of Eden was no lie at all; it proved true, every word. Yet he is called a liar and a murderer, without a particle of proof to rest upon. Nevertheless, he is said to be the father of those Jews that believed on Christ (John viii, 31–44). And so it says in Luke vi, 36, that they should be merciful as their father.

Now, since God's chosen people (especially those who are said to hav believed on Christ) are declared to be the children of the devil, then whose children are we to suppose those to be who were unbelievers? It says in John, "Neither did his brethren believe in him" (John vii, 5).

And so the Bible teaches that the earth has four corners (Isa. xi, 12; Rev. vii, i); that it rests on pillars (1 Sam. ii, 8; Job. ix. 6); that the sun runs around it (Eccl. i, 5; Ps. xix, 5, 6), and moves forward and backward (Is. xxxviii, 8; 2 Kings xx, 11); that a man built a city ten years after he is said to hav been dead and buried (1 Kings xvi, 6, 8; 2 Chron. xvi, i); that one man was two years older than his father (2 Chron. xxi, 5, 20; xxii, 1, 2); that a father and his son were both of one mother (1 Kings xv, 1. 2, and ver. 8–10).

The writers of the books of Matthew and Luke hav attempted to giv a genealogy of Christ. Although both claim he was begotten by the Holy Ghost, yet they also both claim that Joseph was his father. However, they must hav been ignorant concerning Joseph's descent, because when the name of Joseph's father is required they seem to hav lost the track, and each makes his own selection of names for his list. Matthew says, Jacob begat Joseph (Matt. i. 18), and Luke says it was Heli (Luke iii, 23). And in this manner they proceed, disagreeing till they reach David, and no doubt his reputation was familiar to both writers, so his name was enrolled in both lists. And during that period from Joseph to David Matthew has on his list twenty-seven names, which are supposed (by Christians) to be the exact number, and the proper names in their right places, and within the same period Luke has forty-two names on his list, and which are also supposed to be the exact number and the right names. Yet only two names are alike in the two lists—that is, from Joseph to David.

Now, since these two writers were unable to trace the lineage of Christ even to his grandfather, without making such blunders, how, then, can we suppose that they could make a true record of his more remote ancestors?

If God inspired men to write an account of Christ's lineage, why did he not do it before he had forgotten most of the names of the ancestors? Had it been written while Joseph lived, he might, at least, hav told them the name of his father.

The probability is that so long a period of time had passed when the gospels were written that all traces of Christ's lineage were lost, and that the whole story regarding Christ and the miraculous conception was an afterthought, the fabrication of designing priests.

The writer of the book of Matthew has made up a genealogy of the Jewish kings down to David, except those he has left out by mistake. It says in chap. iv, 8, that Joram begat Ozias (Uzziah), who, as stated in the Old Testament, was not born until sixty-one years after Joram was dead and buried, and during that period three generations were produced, and their names Matthew has omitted. They were Ahaziah, Jehoash, and Amaziah. Uzziah is also called Azariah, the son of Amaziah (see 2 Kings xv, 1, 2, 7, 32; 2 Chron. xxvi, 1, 3, 23; 1 Chron. iii, 11, 12). Read these passages that you may form an idea of what credit you can giv to this gospel writer.

The gospel makers tell us that Christ was of the seed of David. However, they contradict themselvs on that point, since they tell us that the Holy Ghost was his father. And as they hav failed to giv us any account of his mother's pedigree, then what evidence is there left to ascertain the true descent of Christ? Not any at all.

It is not Joseph's pedigree we want, as that has nothing to do with the ancestry of Christ, unless Joseph was his natural father; if so, then his divinity is disproved. Yet it cannot be proved that he was a descendant from David, especially since the genealogical lists are contradicted in the Old Testament; besides, they contradict each other in every particular, and are consequently unfit to prove anything, least of all God's descent from David. If Mary was the only earthly parent of the son of God, we should hav had her genealogy instead of that of Joseph. The fact is, that a true genealogy of Christ is nowhere to be found.

As to who was the real father of Christ, his mother's opinion ought to hav more weight on that subject than the opinion of others. But there is no evidence to the effect that she believed her boy was the son of a ghost. It says in Luke ii, 41, that "his parents went to Jerusalem every year [not to Egypt as Matthew says], and when he was twelve years old," his parents lost sight of him at the feast of the passover, and with their utmost effort could not find him till after three days; and when they found him his mother said to him (verse 48), "Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? behold, thy father and I hav sought thee sorrowing."

But Mary's testimony has been of no use to the church, as there could be no money in it, therefore it has not been acceptable. Because a story about a son of Joseph would cause no better result for impostors than a story about any other man's son. So that, had not the ghost story been invented, it would not hav been practicable for designing priests to obtain money from people by offering them Christ's security, notwithstanding there is not a priest living who knows whether either Christ or the Holy Ghost ever existed; and by way of proof, they can adduce no better evidence than the tale of a dream.

Egypt's Concealed Religion.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I was much interested in reading an editorial in the Christian at Work of March 8th concerning an Egyptian mummy recently unwrapped in New Brunswick, N. J. The writer says that "these mummies . . . reveal the belief of the Egyptians in the resurrection of the body." and asks, "Where did they get this doctrin?" Where did the Jews get it? In fact, where did they get their entire religious system? Largely from Egypt. Philip Smith, "The Ancient History of the East" (Harper & Bro., 1879), says, page 195: "Herodotus learned that the Egyptians of Thebes recognized one supreme God, who had no beginning and would hav no end;" and further, page 196, that he was called Nuk-pu-nuk—"I am that I am" (see Ex. iii, 14). Again, on the same page, he says: "Other papyri tell us that 'he is the sole generator in heaven and earth; and that he is not engendered—that he is the sole living God who has engendered himself—he who is from the beginning—he who created all things, but is himself uncreated.' That the original worship of Egypt was in accordance with this theology is indicated by at least one ancient monument, the temple of King Shafre [of the fourth dynasty], in its freedom from idols and symbolic decorations; and perhaps by the oldest pyramids." Thus the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob was the God of the highest Egyptian theology. Egypt had, in fact, two religions; one, the absurd polytheism, with crews of apes, ibises, bulls, etc.; the other, of which the priests barely allowed Herodotus to catch a glimpse, but which we now know, was the worship of one supreme God. The priests—and perhaps the king—had the sole knowledge of this latter religion. Now, as Moses lived in the reigns of Rameses II. and his son-successor, Meneptha—about 1430 B.C. to 1332 B.C.—and the era of the fourth dynasty, above-mentioned, is about 3200 B.C., it seems very probable that he had got a sight of that religion of which Herodotus was "barely allowed to catch a glimpse." Not only did the Jews get their idea of God from Egypt, but their idea of the trinity as well, for in the Egyptian polytheism there are several triads—father, mother, and son, as Osiris, Isis, and Horus; Phtha, Pasht, and Mouth, etc. Further, in the Egyptian "Ritual of the Dead," which may be called the Egyptian Bible, we may read (Smith, page 215): "'I hav given food to the hungry; I hav given the thirsty to drink; I hav furnished clothing to the naked.' Tradition ascribed its oldest parts to Hesepti, of the first dynasty, and Menkare, of the fourth, and chapters of it are found on monuments earlier than the Hyksos [about 1900 B.C.]." It seems that the Egyptians were also acquainted with the story of Atlantis—"Atlantis, which was beyond the pillars of Hercules." It is probable that the story of the Deluge owes its origin to Atlantis. "Solon visited Saïs (a capital of ancient Egypt) in the reign of Amasis—about 570 B.C.—and from a Saïte priest learned the fable of Atlantis" (Smith, page 167). As the Egyptians had the oldest civilization, so they must hav had the oldest religion; and I dare say their "Ritual of the Dead" does not contain as many absurd, immoral, and self-contradictory stories as the Christian Bible of to-day.

But I am allowing my pen to run away with me, and must close. Before I do so, however, I must ask you to let the above see printers' ink through the columns of your truth seeking paper. By the way, don't you think Brother Hallock might relish the foregoing remarks? INFIDELIS.

Christianity, Murder, and Anarchy.

Before God, if you were to go home and drive a dagger to the heart of your mother it would not be so great a sin as is the sin of unbelief. There is no avoiding these truths if the word of God is true (Evangelist Dr. L. W. Munhall, Clarendon street Baptist church, Boston, March 1, 1887, as reported in Boston Globe March 2d).

This man, if he can be called a man, declares "before God" that unbelief is a greater sin than matricide, and bases his authority on "the word of God." It is very probable that he can prove his assertion by that "word," for human life is rated very low in its sacred pages, and belief in the Jewish Jehovah and the Christian savior very high; especially is the life of woman of but little account. I think the consistent evangelist, Munhall, can prove by the words of his Lord and master, Jesus Christ, that unbelief in himself (Jesus) is a greater sin than hating all one's relations, for did not this divine teacher affirm, "If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple?" (Luke, xiv, 26.) And did not his father, God, command good, old, faithful Abraham to sacrifice his own son in order to test his belief in him? I'm quite sure Evangelist Munhall can support his theory by Bible texts innumerable, but that only makes it so much the worse for the Bible, unless we are going to believe that murder is less a crime than to doubt that Jesus is the son of God, and equal with him, or disbelieving that his blood (that he never shed) at the eleventh hour will launch a matricide into the presence of this God and redeemer, forever to enjoy uninterrupted bliss. To disbelieve these, and similar fables, we are taught is worse than any crime we can commit. Is it not plainly to be seen that such teachings are subversiv of all good morals?

Suppose an ungrateful, disobedient son, after listening to this ranting effusion of Munhall's, had reasoned thus: "Now, I hate my mother. God don't think it would be much of a sin for me to kill her, and why should I? Not half as great a sin for me to kill her as to doubt God's goodness and reject his glorious scheme of salvation! Now I do believe all that the evangelist said to-night. I do believe God will save to the uttermost all who come unto him believing. Now, if I kill my old mother—she's good for nothing, she's right in my way—if I kill her, believing Christ's blood will save me, it will save me; I hav only to believe. There is the promi all sure for the next world, and I'll manage it for this world so as not to get caught. I'll escape detection. I'll put the old woman out of the way, and nobody will ever be the wiser for it."

Now, we will suppose this son returns home and "drives a dagger into the heart of his mother," intending to set fire to her clothing, thereby concealing the crime, then giving the alarm as if he had returned and found her on fire; but a neighbor is accidentally too quick for him, and enters as he is withdrawing the dagger, and seizes him. The poor old mother, with her dying gasp, declares that her son stabbed her, and the neighbor saw it with his own eyes. Now, what are we going to do with this man? What is the law going to do with him? The criminal protests that he should not hav murdered his mother but for listening to Evangelist Munhall's sermon that evening. He tells his pathetic story, which is true. Again, I inquire, what shall be done with him? And now, I inquire, what shall be done with Munhall, who incited him to commit the deed? Shall he be allowed to go on throwing his evangelical bombs into the camp of weak-headed Pocasset Freemans until little children and venerable, loving mothers are sacrificed to the dynamite Christianity of frenzied evangelical Anarchists.

Political protection requires that eight men be hung for their incendiary bomb-shell language; ought not, then, such religious Anarchists as Munhall, the "two Sams," Moody, Harrison, and the Salvation Armyists, to be restrained when they are constantly using such religious Anarchical language as here reported, frightening people into insanity, murder, and suicide? Pray, let us be consistent, and if we can hang men for incendiary state Anarchical language, let us not encourage tramping revivalists with their mouths full of Christian Anarchical blasphemy, whose fittest place is an insane asylum, penitentiary, or dungeon, where they will be prevented from longer fattening on the weak imbecils, who, we read every day, are forsaking all they hav to become followers of these peripatetic wanderers.

To conclude: Would any other such monstrous, unnatural falsehoods as are uttered in the name of God by these Christian lunatics be tolerated in a civilized country like the United States? Would not some way be devised to suppress such a criminal nuisance? But it is religion and must not be meddled with, we are told. So is Mormonism a religion, but our government found a way to squelch its polygamy when it became disastrous to the republic. What is Mormonism when compared with this Christian religion as a whole? What is state Anarchy? Why, this religion is state and church Anarchy combined, of the very worst kind, making murder in the eyes of God and man of but slight consequence compared to unbelief. Unbelief in what? "Believe or be damned." ELLA E. GIBSON.

Beecher in Hell or Heaven—Which?

ANOTHER REPLY TO THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

GENTLEMEN: I hav your card asking, "Why am I not a Christian?" But how am I to know what is Christianity? Christ never wrote anything, and all that we know about it we get from a book which we cannot understand. The Catholics believe that Martin Luther is in hell, and the Protestants believe him to be in heaven. Then, from this book somebody made a creed, and no doubt did as well as they knew how; and, according to this creed, founded on the Bible, the soul of Henry Ward Beecher now is being tortured in eternal fire.

According to the Bible, Christ forgave a thief, and also he forgave his murderers, and they are now in heaven, and yet they were all unbelievers, for they did not believe him to be the son of God. If, as I suppose, Mr. Beecher did believe Christ to be the son of God, it won't do for you to say that he now is in hell, unless you consider him worse than a thief and a murderer. And I do not believe that Mr. Beecher ought to be damned for not having been a Presbyterian, or a believer in the Congregational creed.

Now, if those Chicago ministers who refused to send their sympathies to Mrs. Beecher are right, the soul of Henry Ward Beecher now is in hell. And if one of them had been called to preach his funeral sermon, and he had the courage to stand by his creed, he might be able to comfort the widow by saying: "The Congregational ministers of Chicago would hav been glad to send you their sympathies had they been sure it would not hav offended God. But you hav this comforting consolation of knowing that we hav a just God, and he knows best how to treat the one whom you lose. Yes, poor man, he made a mistake in his theological opinions, and must suffer now in hell, but as God is merciful, let us hope that he will make him as comfortable as will be consistent with the creed of the Congregational church."

CHARITY FOR THE CHICAGO CLERGY.

Honest men are entitled to the respect of honest men, but if wrong in their opinions, their opinions, and only their opinions, should be condemned. The press has been a little unkind in its condemnation of the Congregational ministers who at Chicago voted against sending Mrs. Beecher an expression of sympathy for her and of sorrow that the one whom she loved was dying. Now if these men believed that Henry Ward Beecher was a preacher of a doctrin that would be the means of sending men to hell, they should hav rejoiced at his death, and they would hav been a set of hypocrits had they said that they were sorry for the death of such a man. Therefore I respect them for their honesty, not for their opinions.

After all, religion consists in just this, and that is about all there is of it: It is either heaven or hell for everybody. Now, as good men differ in their opinions as to the condition of men after death, I will giv the opinion of the Rev. J. E. Richards, who for many years preached at the Congregational church at St. Johns. When under oath in court he swore that he believed that God will say to the wicked, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." Now, as this opinion was given under oath, I suppose that it must be Congregationalism; and, if those Chicago ministers believed that Mr. Beecher, by his system of false theology, was the means of leading men to eternal destruction, their expression of sorrow at his death would hav been a libel. I honor them for their vote, but I condemn their theology.

Mr. Beecher's great soul was so full of humanity that he could not believe that the great majority who hav passed over the river are now being tortured by devils in eternal fire. He differed with Mr. Richards and other good men as to the condition of men after death, and had no respect for the religion of heaven or hell for everybody, and almost everybody for hell. And whether right or wrong, if honest in his opinions, he should hav the respect of all honest men. And while I say this much for Mr. Beecher, I am just as ready to say as much for those ministers of Chicago. Whether right or wrong, if they were honest, they were entitled to the respect of honest men.

I differ with them in my opinions, and believe that if they are honest they should be considered simply objects of pity, as those who are the victims of superstition, and who, unlike Mr. Beecher, hav not been able to evolute out of the old ruts of the dogmas of the past. But let us all hav charity one for the other, and never abuse any man for his honest opinions.

You will notice that I hav said if honest, these ministers were entitled to respect; but if you will read the following item, which appeared a few days later, you will see that those ministers were either dishonest, or a set of cowards who were ashamed to stand by their barbarous creed and be ridiculed by an intelligent public:

The Congregational clergymen of Chicago, with two dissenting votes, hav passed resolutions of eulogy for Beecher and of sympathy with his wife. But it is of comparativly little importance now. Those who objected before showed their uncharitableness, and a subsequent deference to public opinion does not wipe out that fact.

The very last words of Christ before he died upon the cross were against damning unbelievers. He was against John Calvin's creed, and against the Presbyterian creed, and against all creeds that are in favor of damning unbelievers. His prayer was "Father, forgiv them, for they know not what they do." He was for forgiving, but, gentlemen, your creed is for damning, so I will ask, as you asked me, Why are you not Christians?

BEECHER AND CALVINISM.

Gentlemen, you hav asked why am I not a Christian; but what am I to do? Beecher claimed to be a Christian, and Calvin claimed to be a Christian, and each one had a multitude of believers. Beecherism hates Calvinism, and Calvinism hates Beecherism. Now, please read the following evidence of love and good fellowship between professed Christians:

ANOTHER CRACK AT BEECHER.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., March 11.—The Northwestern Presbyterian, published here, contains a bitter attack on the late Henry Ward Beecher, saying that "his treatment of Calvinism and the religion of our fathers would cause the devout to shudder." The article expresses the belief that Mr. Beecher should hav died sooner.

Now you see, according to the report, the Presbyterians think that Mr. Beecher should hav died sooner; that is, if God had known as much about Beecher as the Presbyterians did, he would hav killed him, or arranged to hav him die sooner. You see, they did not like to hear him talk against Calvinism and the religion of their fathers, Now, first, let us see what was Calvinism. A short time since, I expressed my opinion for a Detroit paper in these words, which the editor published with his comment:

What is Calvinism, and what is Beecherism? Calvin believed that a few had been elected to be saved, and that at the outset it was ordained that all others should be damned. He burnt Servetus at the stake with a slow fire made of green wood so as to prolong his torture as long as possible. He burnt him with fire for two hours in this world, and believed that God will and ought to burn him forever in the next world. Calvinism, if it had the power, would hav burnt Beecher, and also would burn Dr. Rexford, and every Universalist and Unitarian now living, for believing just as Servetus believed, and for which he was put to death. Servetus believed that Christ was the son of God, and the son of God only. Calvin's creed was eternal fire for all who did not believe as he believed. Mr. Beecher did not like such a creed, and is reported as saying that "the God depicted in orthodox creeds was an infernal demon, worse than any imagined by Dante, and he would not worship such a God, even if he were damned for it." The trouble with Beecher was that he had too good an opinion of God to be popular with the truly orthodox.

Now, Calvinism, as barbarous as it is, is indorsed by many good people, who are among our best friends. Everybody has the right, of all isms and creeds, to select the one which suits him best. And as for me, I rather like Beecher's creed of humanity in preference to the creed of eternal fire. I do not believe in kicking a lion after he is dead, and hav given a specimen of Calvinism as an offset to the attack on Mr. Beecher by the Northwestern Presbyterian. M. BABCOCK.

[Calvin prosecuted Servetus and approved of his death; but objected to burning as an "atrocity," and wanted him put to death by the sword.—ED. JOURNAL.]

Now, in his criticism, the editor admits that Calvin was a murderer, only he, the founder of the Presbyterian church, preferred to see Servetus butchered by having his head cut off with a sword. Now, let us see what was the religion of their fathers that the Presbyterians so love.

They believed in witches, and they believed in whipping women upon their bare and bleeding backs, while, tied to the end of a cart, they were dragged through the streets of the town. They whipped these poor Quaker women because they were not Presbyterians, and because they thought it would make God feel good to see them maul those poor, pitiable creatures for having a better opinion of him than they had. Let me giv a Presbyterian hymn, which should hav been entitled "The Mother's Consolation:"

For hell is crammed with infants damned
Without a day of grace.

The Rev. Mr. Ambrose, in a sermon on "Doomsday," drew this picture:

When the damned hav drunken down whole draughts of brimstone one day, they must do the same another day. The eye shall be tormented with the sight of devils; the ears with the hideous yellings and outcries of the damned in flames; the nostrils shall be smothered, as it were, with brimstone; the tongue, the hand, the foot, and every part shall fry in flames.

And such was the religion of their fathers which Henry Ward Beecher denounced, and for having done so the Northwestern Presbyterian thinks that he should hav died sooner. M. BABCOCK.

The Indians.

Giv me where to stand and I will lift the world.

Thus said Archimedes to show the power of a lever upon a fulcrum.

Go into all the world and preach this my gospel unto every creature (Christ).

I am determined to know nothing among you, save Christ and him crucified (St. Paul).

Hence Christians regard Christ as the moral lever, the cross as the fulcrum, and the pulpit as the place to use it for the moral elevation of the world. Eighteen centuries of trial and failure prove their mistake. The Liberals among all classes hav adopted free thought, free speech, and free men as their lever, with science as their fulcrum. But they are not agreed as to the stand from whence to work. One party claims that Spiritualism is the strong point; the other party claims that the Secular Union League is all-sufficient. But good common sense tells us that redress should begin where the wrong commenced. Our first national sin was to take the Indians' land without giving them an equivalent. Then we took the negroes' toil without pay, and, to cap the climax, we are forcing them to believe our religion or be damned.

A reverend editor of a Christian Advocate affirms that because "they refuse to believe the gospel they must perish from the earth." Another editor affirms that we, like the Lord's people of old, hav a divine commission "to slay the heathens" (Indians) and "to take their land for an heritage." An eminent Christian lady (Mrs. Jane Swishelm) said, in the Rev. Dr. Sunderland's church, Washington, D. C.: "If I were a man I would hunt, shoot, trap, and kill Indians the same as I would kill wildcats and wolves;" and in her published account of the lecture, she said, "When I uttered that there was such a loud and long applause that it seemed as though the roof would burst from the church." This was spoken on account of the Minnesota Indian raid in 1862, when the northern tribes had been robbed of all their annuities for five years, amounting to five hundred thousand dollars, and after they had given due notice that if not relieved within a given time they would fight for food rather than die like starved dogs.

I hav just read the item in your issue of February 19th under the caption of "The Indian Problem." I agree with you that the government "policy is a stupendous failure," and that it is as impossible for the Indians to be elevated by the teaching of conflicting creeds as it is for water to flow above its source. I hav just read in the Banner of Light of Feb. 19, 1887, of the treachery practiced to capture and kill a distinguished chief: "General West sent a message to Mangus, an Indian chief, in Arizona Territory, expressing a desire to make a treaty of peace. In obedience to the summons, the old chief appeared, when he was at once seized by the general and ordered to be placed in the guard-house, and the guard was instructed that if he stirred during the night to kill him. The old chief, being informed of the order, was extremely quiet, until a hot iron was thrust through a small opening near his hip, which caused him to jump to his feet. He was instantly killed, his head cut off, and his skull sent to the Smithsonian Institute at Washington."

I will giv one more case out of scores of similar cases which are on authentic record, in the hope that their enormity may arouse public sentiment for a prompt redress.

Early in October, 1854, Major Lupton, of Southern Oregon, came into the room where the jury were sitting (I was present), during court week, at Jacksonville, and said: "Gentlemen, I hav been to the camp of redskins below here, and I hav put them off their guard by telling them that they will not be troubled by the whites any more, so they may stay where they are in peace. Now, I propose that we organize three companies to go round and kill the entire band."

There was only one voice heard in protest against this horrid proposition. The companies were formed, and on the following Sunday night approached near the camp, and at early dawn of morning fired simultaneously upon two hundred sleeping men, women, and children, and then, with their revolvers, shot down as many as they could of those who were able to run for life. A few escaped, and the next day burnt ten houses and killed fifteen people. The Oregon newspapers reversed the occurrences so as to make it appear that the massacre of the Indians was to chastise them for the burning, etc.

There is no subject of such great importance, so greatly misunderstood, as the Indian problem; and, as cheating them was the first, if not the greatest, of our national sins, therefore restitution is the right place for Liberals of every class to try with their moral levers to elevate this oppressed race, as a necessity, before it is possible to raise themselvs to the desired position. JOHN BEESON.

A "Converted Atheist" Sample.

From Houston, Tex., a friend forwards the following invitation:

"HOUSTON, March 24, 1887.

"DEAR SIR: You are respectfully invited to the lectures of B. P. Barnum, M.D., at Gray's Opera House, beginning Sunday, March 27th, at 11 A.M. and 8 P.M.

"He was but recently, as you are perhaps aware, a distinguished Atheistical writer and lecturer, but is now speaking and writing with still more energy and power, to build up that which he heretofore endeavored to destroy.

"Very respectfully,

"THE CHURCH OF THE STRANGERS."

In behalf of several thousand Atheists we beg leave to state that we are not aware that Mr. Barnum, M.D., was but recently a distinguished Atheistical writer and lecturer. Within our recollection, and to the best of our knowledge and belief, we never heard of him, of his writings, nor of his platform work. His fame could not hav been blown very far, or some echo of it would hav reached the East.

It is of such pretenders as this Barnum that the church makes capital, and her gullible followers take the fellows at their own valuation, and derive great comfort from the supposititious exercise of the Lord's power in bringing them to Jesus. The chances are ten to one that pretenders of this class are unprincipled rogues seeking to make money easily by playing the converted Atheist role, and thereby getting into the pockets of the churchmen.

It is not impossible that an Atheist should be converted to Christianity, for men's reason will sometimes forsake them; but such instances are rare, and when found, it usually happens that the converted lecturer is more knave than fool.

Three Logical Preachers.

A Methodist writes to his church organ that at different times he has been puzzled by the words of his preachers. One said that "morality had nothing to do with the Christian religion." Another, that "moral men were the worst men in the community." A third implored his hearers "to giv up their morality and come to Christ."

There is nothing in this which should puzzle a Christian. Morality and religion are widely separated. The moral man is he who does right in this world—that is, deals with the world honestly, abuses no one, is kind to all, and does what he can to make the people with whom he comes in contact happier. A religious man is controled by different sentiments. He is occupied in honoring "God," cajoling Christ into accepting him as a lamb, and in general doing what he can to get to heaven. A religious man also attends to other people's business with a fervor, the temperature of which is regulated by his civil power. Morality is a calm doing of justice. Religion is a tropical sentiment seeking to profit by a huge injustice—that of loading the consequences of sin upon an innocent person.

Christ reckoned morality as secondary to faith. His emphatic affirmativ command was not, Be moral! but, Hav faith! No evangelical church holds that morality will "save" a man, but all teach that "except ye believe and are baptized ye cannot be saved." It is true, Christ denounced iniquitous conduct and foul thoughts, but the tenor and general drift of the four gospels is, Hav faith; thy sins, though many, are forgiven, for thy faith hath saved thee.

The preacher who said that morality had nothing to do with the Christian religion was right. There is no connection between them. The most immoral man in the world can believe in Christ as his savior, and be, therefore, a good Christian. According to the teachings of the church, he can also reach heaven, and thus obtain his reward for his belief. The preacher who thinks moral men the worst men in the community is right, from his standpoint. A moral man in a community, who is an unbeliever, keeps more victims out of the fold than an immoral man can drag into it by joining the church. From the minister's ground the moral man is the worse. The preacher who urged his hearers to giv up morality and seek religion probably had in mind the distinction between morality and religion; and as he regarded religion as of more importance than anything else in the world, he also spoke accurately. He did not intend that they should become immoral in action, but that they should drop their comforting dependence upon good works and seek religion.

The value of the words of these preachers depends upon the way existence is viewed. If this world is of the most importance, then the moral man is the best, and to surrender the conviction that morality is of the greatest value would be a mistake fatal to civilization. If this world is a vale of tears, and the next a place of happiness to be gained at whatever cost, then certainly the moral and irreligious man is not acting as well for himself as the devotee.

But who can prove that there is another world? And who cannot prove that this world needs all our efforts to make it habitable?

A Mohammedan Christ with Cash.

There is a pious Mohammedan prophet in the Punjaub of India who has a divine mission. He thinks himself and his book capable of converting the world, and he backs up his opinion with cash. A few days since a St. Louis man received a letter from him as follows:

"From Gulam Ahmad, an humble servant of the eternal God. and a follower of the chief prophet (Muhammad):

"With all respect and humility I (the compiler of 'Burahin-i-Ahmadia') beg to say that the almighty has commissioned me to try, like the Nazarene prophet (Christ). to amend the morals of mankind with utmost humility, lowliness, respect, submission, and meekness, and to point out to the unacquainted the straight way by which we can obtain salvation. perceive the manifestations of heavenly life, and by which the marks of being loved by the almighty become visible even in this physical world. For this purpose the book entitled 'Burahin-i-Ahmadia' has been compiled, of which 592 pages hav been printed and published, according to the synopsis of contents given in the accompanying notice. But as the publication of the entire book will take a long time, it has been determined, for the sake of conviction, to invite the dissenters by sending out this special epistle, together with the inclosed notice, to all the distinguished clergy and Jews of note throughout all the continents of the world, as far as its transmission may be possible, and similarly to the chief leaders of Buddhists, Brahmas, Aryas, naturalists, Parsis, and the bigoted Maulanis (who do not believe in the existence of miracles and unusual deeds, and are hence suspicious against me)."

He then invites the gentleman to come over and be convinced, and in case he fails to prove his religion to be the true one he will recompense the investigator for his time. With true religious dogmatism he writes:

"If you do not come, you will yourself be answerable to God. After awaiting your arrival for three months, the statement of your indifference will ipso facto be noted in the book as stated above; but in case you do come, and fail to behold any heavenly signs during your stay with me for the time specified, you shall be paid 250 rupees per mensem (besides food and accommodation, which will be supplied free to all) as compensation to cover your damages, or as a recovery of fine in default of my promis. If you deem this sum inadequate to your dignity, I am even ready to pay as damages or fine for unfulfilling promis whatever suitable sum you propose yourself, proportionate to your rank, if it be not beyond my means. It is, however, necessary that visitors desirous of recovering damages or fine should ask my permission beforehand through a registered note of their intent of coming over to me to enable me to limit the number according to the availability of my estate, but it is not requisit to do if otherwise. Finally, I thank God that he has been pleased to display, through his infinit grace, the reasons and doctrins of this true religion, and has placed me for the spread of it under the protection of the liberal government of the British nation, to whom I am grateful through the sense of obligation and gratitude. 'Peace to all the followers of righteousness.' With due respects, I beg to remain, sir,

"Your obedient well-wisher, MIRZA GULAM AHMAD,
"Of Kadian, District Gurdaspur, Punjaub, India, Asia."

Here is a pointer for the missionary societies. Instead of sending preachers to India, let them invite the followers of Mohammed and Buddha to this country, pay their expenses, and operate upon them at their leisure. If they hav as firm a faith as this Mohammedan, they should make it known and bac it up with cash.

Tomfoolery.

To the Congregationalist must be awarded the cap and bells. It says:

"We are asked why no report in the Andover case is heard from the Visitors. We hav no means of knowing more of this matter than our readers, but it is fair to assume that on so grave a question abundant time will be taken to review all the points concerned, and reach a conclusion which shall carry not only weighty but conclusiv reasons with it, whatever the decision may be. Judges in our civil courts sometimes reserve their judgment many months in cases of far less importance than this."

The Congregationalist talks foolishly. How in the world can a court, even if composed of such eminent gentlemen as the Andover Board of Visitors, arrive at any conclusion upon a matter about which no human being can by any possibility know anything whatever?

The question for the Visitors to decide is, Shall the doctrin be taught in Andover College that the heathen who hav lived and died in ignorance of Christ and his alleged mission are given a chance after death to learn Christianity and thus escape hell? Whether such a theory shall be taught in Andover the Visitors may decide. Whether the theory is true, no son of woman can ever affirmativly know. It is beyond the range of possibility. If the whole Christian scheme were true, this point could not be settled without a new revelation from the author of the "second probation." And as the whole Christian theory of the creation, fall, and "redemption" of man is pretty well settled to be the work of ecclesiastics, and not to hav even a small foundation of truth, the laborious review by the Andover Visitors of all the points concerned is, to say the least, a work of supererogation.

Supposing the Visitors do sometime reach a conclusion, and supposing they declare in behalf of the second probation theory—what then? Who believes that they know anything about it? And what grounds hav they for knowing? The opinion of the nakedest little heathen in Africa is entitled to the same weight as the voice of the grave and reverend seigneurs whose "decision" is so anxiously awaited.

We Explain to Mr. John Smith.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 26th we told Mr. John Smith that our reason for capitalizing the words God, Christ, Bible, Christian, is because they are proper nouns. Mr. Smith rejoins:

"PITTSBURGH, March 25, 1887.

"In your reply to John Smith you say the reason you use capital letters in printing God, Christ, etc., is because they are proper nouns. I was under the impression they were only 'proper' nouns in the eyes of the religious world, but that you did not consider them so. As you print them you are merely following in the footsteps of all religious papers. JOHN SMITH."

A little fuller explanation may be more satisfactory. In the first place, be it known to Mr. John Smith, there are Gods and gods. The pagans had many gods. These were lumped together and called gods with a small g. The name was a common noun. The name of any particular god, however, is a proper noun. So with the Hebrew god, Jah, Jehovah, or Yahweh, it is a proper noun. Christians hav changed this to God, and by the word we know that the Jewish Jehovah is meant. It is no answer to say that the Jewish Jehovah, or the Christian God, does not exist. We admit that. But neither is Allah a real personage, though the rules by which the English language is written would be flagrantly violated did we print the name of the Mohammedan god with a small a. Odin and Thor, Pan and Momus, and the hundreds of other ancient gods, are myths, but Mr. John Smith isn't writing to the authors of all the Mythologies asking them to spell the titles with small initial letters.

As it is with God, so is it with his alleged son. Christ is a title, and custom has imposed upon the printer the task of reaching to his "upper case" when setting such words. Jesus of Nazareth is only one of several Christs, but that portion of the world in which we liv has given him also the name of Christ, making the word as truly a proper noun as Jesus. Whether he ever lived or not is doubtful; the weight of evidence is against the existence of any such man as it is pretended he was. But if he ever did liv, we may be sure there hav been an awful lot of lies told about him by the churchmen.

Custom has also decreed that Christian shall be capitalized. It is the name of a particular sect of religion, as Mohammedan, Jew, Confucian, or Buddhist, and as such is a proper noun. How does it look to spell confucian and buddhist this way?

The word bible, in itself, means the books. Of itself, and when used that way, it is not necessary to begin the word with a large B, as when we say of the Koran or The Kings that they are the bibles of the Mohammedans and of the Confucians. But in this country the Bible is the name of a particular collection of books, bound together, and more or less connected in subject matter, and as such is a proper noun and properly capitalized when written. How does the title of the american newspaper directory appear to Mr. Smith written this way?

There is no argument in writing God with a small g, though we hav such eminent authority for it as Mr. John Morley, and until there is we see no good reason for distinguishing the Christian deity by making him an occasion for breaking the rules of grammar. We do not wish to hoist him into greater prominence than he now enjoys.

Where is the Pope.

The Rev. Edward McGlynn, Roman Catholic, says man has no right to private property in land, and he quotes scripture to prove it. Henry George's doctrins, he also says, are not opposed to the doctrins of the Catholic church.

The Rev. Henry A. Brann, Roman Catholic, says man has a right to private property in land, and he likewise quotes the Bible in support of his assertion. He adds, too, that the pestilential theories of Mr. George are contrary to the institutions and doctrins of the Catholic church.

Holy brethren, are not these diverse interpretations of the Word somewhat akin to the private judgment heresy of the Lutherans? If a sinful layman may, we crave you to know who shall settle the dispute when so much piety is at odds with itself.

Bismarck's Lapsus Lingua.

The Catholic press of this country has for the past few weeks been vociferous in claiming honor for the pope for preserving the peace of Europe by instructing the Catholics to vote for Bismarck's septennate bill. Bismarck had said that unless the bill passed he would not answer for peace an hour. To insure the election of members of the Reichstag who would vote for it, Germany's great minister sought an alliance with the pope. The pope's action, said the Catholic press, was solely because he desired peace, and great credit to Catholicism did they take therefor.

In the upper house of the German Parliament, on the 23d ult., Mr. Bismarck made a speech advocating the abolition of the Falk ecclesiastical laws. These are the laws which hav oppressed the Catholic church most grievously, and which the pope has fought to the extent of his power. In concluding his plea for their abrogation Bismarck said: "I cannot allow myself to break my word to the pope. At least, I shall personally carry out all I promised him."

This was rather an unfortunate expression of the prince's for those journals which hav assured their limited world that Leo XIII. was seeking peace for Europe, and not power for himself and his church. Probably Bismarck had not read the Catholic journals, and did not know to what depths of confused embarrassment he was subjecting the pious editors.

The Vincents' Opinion of the "Truth Seeker Annual."

From the American Nonconformist.

Mr. Macdonald certainly has the knack of getting up calendars that will pay to keep on account of their intrinsic merit. The information that he manages to condense in these ANNUALS is just exactly what is needed, and what almost everybody ought to hav at hand. Besides some very valuable articles from experienced authors, this ANNUAL contains the Sunday, Oath, and Blasphemy Laws of the States and Territories of the United States. This alone is worth five times the price of the book, because residents of very many of the states and territories will be able to learn from this ANNUAL, for the first time, what barbarous laws disgrace their statute books, and they will know what needs to be done to insure their abolishment. The price is 25 cents, and the advertisments alone are worth more than this.

Editorial Notes.

THE Boston Transcript thinks that when new cardinals are "hatted" by the pope, they are "hated" by some of their less fortunate brothers. The Transcript seems to understand the character of ecclesiastical politicians.

LAST Sunday was the first day of spring that in this city could be enjoyed out of doors. Central Park was crowded, but all that could be seen of the Metropolitan Museum of Art and the American Museum of Natural History were the outside walls. Mayor Hewitt and his fellow-directors should hasten a little in opening the doors of these institutions.

MR. ANDREW JACKSON PEASE—whoever he may be—in a circular called the Industrial Money-Maker says:

"THE (Un)-TRUTH SEEKER—widely read by Infidels and Socialists—has been publishing horribly executed cuts, blaspheming Bible history, etc. Such Anarchistic caricatures should not be allowed to desecrate mail bags and should be fire-ed."

We are calmly awaiting Mr. Jackson Pease's onslaught.

DR. FOOTE'S Health Monthly for April contains the doctor's argument before the Judiciary Committee of New York's Assembly against the passage of Comstock's bill which makes it a penal offense to advertise patent medicins or sell medical books for popular use. It is a good argument, and should be widely circulated. The Monthly contains also facts about the vice agent which, when the people know them, will make him less dangerous.

THE New York Observer says: "We are compelled to believe that at the end of this boasted century of missions, while not three million converts, nominal and real, hav been won to Christianity in pagandom, heathen and Mohammedan are two hundred million more than they were at the beginning of the century. The votaries of these faiths increase seventy times faster than the followers of Christ." At that rate, the prospect of converting the world is slim.

A NEW church for Catholic worshipers in this city has been dedicated to St. Veronica. This saint, it will be remembered, is the first person who possessed a picture of Jesus. While on his way to crucifixion, Veronica gave Jesus her handkerchief with which to wipe his face, and he returned it to her with the impress of his features upon it. We do not know whether the church in Washington street possesses that identical handkerchief or not, but no doubt it it can be produced in hundreds of churches.

As we predicted last week, Mayor Hewitt finds it easier to promulgate his order for Sunday closing of stores than to get it enforced. The police commissioners, to whom the mayor wrote, passed the order on to the superintendent of police, and he reports back that he hasn't men enough to obtain evidence of the violation of the law. He has, however, passed the order on to the captains of the police, who will instruct the patrolmen to enforce the law, and the patrolmen will do just what they hav done all along—be conveniently blind. The Sunday laws are a stupendous humbug, useful only to develop hypocrits.

MR. R. T. BUSH, the owner of the yacht Coronet, which won the ocean race, is a good specimen of a certain class of Christians. Mr. Bush is very pious, attending church two or three times on Sunday, and all the week evening meetings. He would not say "yacht" on Sunday for the world, and as to making a bet, if he did such a thing he would expect to lose heaven forever. But Mr. Bush is a business man, canny and shrewd as a Scotchman. He had a yacht on his hands that he did not want, and few people knew what a good yacht she was. So he challenged all other keel schooner yachts to race across the ocean for a sweepstakes of $10,000 each. This was not offering to bet $10,000 that his yacht would win, explains Mr. Bush, for there was no chance about it; he knew his yacht would get across first, and where no chance enters into a contest, there is no gambling. Mr. Bush called the race a match "for the purpose of testing and comparing the sea-going and sailing qualities of keel-schooner yachts built and now owned in this country." But the moment he heard the result of his bet, he offered the boat for sale. He sailed to win, and he won to sell! Then he sent a check for $500 to the Beecher Monument Committee, explaining that it was a portion of the "premium from the Coronet-Dauntless race," and thus eased his conscience of the sin of using money won by gambling on a yacht race. Whatever rating Lloyds may giv Mr. Bush's ships, they would class his piety A1 from now till his death.

Two weeks ago we noted that the mayor and excise commissioners had asked the legislature to pass a bill allowing them to issue special licenses for the sale of light wines on Sunday afternoons. The action of the mayor has aroused the Methodists, and they are opening their churches to "indignation meetings" of their parishioners. At one of these last week the pastor said:

"I hav seen some pretty bad mayors in New York in half a century, but I never knew any of them to favor anything half so disastrous as this law will be to the city if it goes on the statute-book. It is a burning shame that a mayor of New York should advocate such an outrage on the church people of the city."

This hot language was followed by a still hotter resolution:

"Resolved, That we regard this proposition as the most infamous ever made by any chief magistrate of this metropolis, an indignity to all moral and religious people and an insult to that God by whom kings rule and mayors govern and who hath said, 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy;' and we call upon all moral, order-loving people to unite with us in preventing the passage of the proposed law."

The heated pastor falls into several errors. The government of this country derives its just powers from the consent of the governed. Unless God is a nativ-born or naturalized citizen of the United States, he can hav no voice in making our laws. The mayor of this city is elected, not appointed. And even if God did say, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," it was Saturday he meant, not Sunday. The Methodists seem to be poorly instructed.

SAYS Pomeroy's Democrat: "THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 19th has a red-hot—no, a lukewarm—picture that has a bushel of meat in it. In front of the wall and heavy barred gate duly locked, the word Sheol being over the gate, sits his Satanic majesty, barefooted, on a small box of brimstone, trying to warm his feet by a small outdoor fire of sticks. Beside him is his bundle of linen and a three-tined pitchfork. The devil looks as disconsolate as does a hard-shell Democrat after being fired out of the White House for applying for an office as the representativ of his people, and suggests the stage of happiness the great protector of Mugwumps may yet come to. On the wall of sheol is a notice to the effect that the old hell having been flooded and put out, the place is to be let for a theological seminary. The picture is naughty, but full of pints."

JUDGING from the number of papers received containing favorable reports of their lectures, the Freethought missionaries in the field are not only winning fame for themselvs, but are having a good effect upon the populations they visit. Mr. Reynolds is called "able and eloquent," and his manner of presenting his themes "dramatic and picturesque." Mr. Putnam is described as "of pleasing address and a finished orator." His style, we are told, "is cultured and refined," and his action "graceful and expressiv." Mr. Remsburg sustains his reputation for presenting "masses of facts in a scholarly and eloquent way," and Mr. Jamieson is set down as "eloquent and solid." Mr. Bell pleases the timid ones of the fold, because his "scholarly periods do not offend." Dr. York is very generally called the "Ingersoll of the West," and Mr. Watts is reported from Canada as "holding his audiences in rapt attention." He has challenged all the ministers of Toronto or of any other city throughout the Dominion, to debate with him, but so far without finding a victim. Captain Adams, of Montreal, is doing yeoman service in lecturing to the intelligent of his city and in writing letters to the Montreal journals. One of his recent letters upon the Sabbath question—which is up for discussion there—is the best, for a short review, that we hav seen. Mr. J. D. Shaw, of the Independent Pulpit, has taken the field in Texas, and the papers say he givs excellent satisfaction, being a "logical, forcible, and pleasant speaker." His oratory is "chaste and refined, and he wins many warm admirers." It is pleasant also to learn that he obtains many subscribers to the Pulpit wherever he lectures. Of the other speakers we hear less; but Dr. Severance was a power in the recent Labor Convention at Cincinnati; E C. Walker is fighting the best he can from behind the iniquitous bars of a Kansas county jail; J. H. Burnham occasionally emerges from his retirement at Saginaw City, and electrifies an audience; Colonel Kelso keeps the church stirred up around Longmont, Col.; Mrs. Freeman speaks for all who wish, and her auditors, we are told, are more than pleased. Helen Gardener is at present living here in New York, but when she does go out the reporters hasten to throw themselvs at her feet. Mrs. Colman is warned by age not to tax her strength upon the rostrum, but her reminiscences are enjoyed by a larger audience than any grand opera house would hold. She has had her share of aged eggs and crowns of glory for her magnificent work for liberty, and now livs quietly in Syracuse. L. K. Washburn is going West, and when he gets where Liberal lectures are appreciated, we shall expect to see in the papers of all the towns he visits appreciativ reports of his ornate, epigrammatic, and beautifully-rounded sentences, delivered in a musically ringing voice. For Mr. Washburn is second to but one as an orator, and piles up his facts in rivalry of Remsburg. We wish we had space to reproduce all the good things the press say of our missionaries, but they must accept the will for the performance, for there is a limit to the columns of even so large a journal as THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Lectures and Meetings.

CHARLES WATTS will lecture twice for the Friendship Liberal League of Philadelphia on Sunday, April 17th. At 2:30 P M. his subject will be "Morality and Religion." At 7:30 "Nature and the Supernatural" will be the theme. At the evening meeting Mrs. Watts will giv dramatic readings. The League meets at Industrial Hall, Broad and Wood streets. The seats are free, and the public is cordially invited.

C. B. REYNOLDS lectured at Eaton Rapids March 28th and 29th, at Ionia from March 30th to April 1st, and will be at Belding, Mich., from April 3d to 13th. He has engagements at Cleveland, O., April 24th, and at Columbus, O., May 1st. and with the district attorney of Morristown, N. J., May 10th, Mr. Reynolds writes that he is much disgusted with this last appointment, and, while he intends to keep it, hopes he will hav no more of the kind.

Spreading Mr. Tucker's Notions.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: When I sent you some months ago a correction, as brief as I could make it, of an error into which you had fallen regarding the difference between Mr. Appleton and myself, I had no intention of using your columns as a medium of discussion with him, nor hav I any such intention now. Consequently I shall not answer the article from his pen which appeared in your issue of April 2d. But I would like to state to any reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER who may take an interest in the matter, that Mr. Appleton has made a still more elaborate statement of his position in a recent number of Liberty, and that I hav subjected his arguments to searching criticism, and that a copy of the paper containing his article and my reply may be had, free of cost, on application to me.

Letters from Friends.

CHATHAM, N. Y., March 21, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please giv the inclosed dollar to the devil. It is too bad that he should be turned out upon a cold and unfeeling world in his old age to tramp. (See illustration in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 19th.) T. R. BURROWS.

LEROY, ILL., Feb. 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I thank you for sending the paper to me. I am in my 84th year—not able to get around much in cold weather. There are but few Liberals about here. There are two churches in town, and they hav blown their horns all winter. I can't learn that they hav found any lost sheep. I take great pleasure in reading THE TRUTH SEEKER.

D. NETTLETON.

LOS ANGELES, March 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Dr. J. L. York has given three lectures here—one in Odd Fellows' Hall and two in the Grand Opera House—to good audiences. Dr. York will speak here again March 6th and 13th. By that time the field will be cleared for Brother S. P. Putnam for his lectures on the nights of the 20th and 27th, when we trust that the germs of Freethought will begin to sprout from the steril soil of superstition. J. E. CLARK.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., March 20, 287.

MR. EDITOR: How is the political outlook? It is very encouraging indeed! There are about 35,000,000 Nothingarians, 15,000,000 Christians, and 5,000,000 unbelievers in the United States. Now all that is necessary is to keep political pirates from stealing our thunder, the very popular and ornamental plank of "Total separation of church and state." We Secularists most certainly hav the right to let the contract to no party except the one that means to carry it out

JOHN W. ABBOTT.

PRAIRIE CITY, IOWA, Feb. 27, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5. I think Heston's pictures are just the thing. They attract the attention of the young. I am a farmer, and keep hired men, who always look at the pictures, and if they do not understand, ask for an explanation. Then they read some, and if the preacher knows any more about hell or heaven than you or I (which he doesn't), they are lost sure. If Watson Heston needs help financially, we will help him. I will do my share.

ALVA F. WILSON.

COLES, ILL., March 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In your excellent paper of March 26th, on page 206, is some poetry signed by Eugene Hough. This poem, headed, "Why?" is stolen property. I hav it in a scrap-book, taken from Turf, Field, and Farm, published at Atlanta, Ga., several years ago. It was written by J. A. Stewart. The original can be found in the hands of R. G. Ingersoll. Eugene Hough has changed the language a very little, but it has all the marks of the original.

J. B. COOPER.

[Mr. Eugene Hough will hereafter be excluded from the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER.—ED. T. S.]

SNOWVILLE, VA., March 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I want to thank Mrs. Colman for all her letters, and, more than all the others, for her letters concerning the visit to Mrs. D. M. Bennett. I am so glad to find Mrs. Bennett is still living in the same home and amid the same surroundings as when Mr. Bennett was with her—though I, of course, hav no faith in the personal presence of the grand old man being with her. But it is pleasant to think of her as being there among the things they two admired and loved together. I wish she would now and then let the TRUTH SEEKER friends hav a personal word from her. Should I ever go to New York again, I shall surely go and see her.

ELMINA.

CONCORDIA, KAN., March 7, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I find that I cannot get along and feel that I am doing my duty without taking your paper. It appears to me that of late it has increased in interest. I hav been much interested in the articles communicated regarding the labor question, and hope that such communications are not being shut off for any reason, as they seem to be less plenty than they were last summer.

I think you take the right ground regarding the Anarchists. If I had ever entertained the idea of stopping the paper, your stand on that matter would hav overcome it.

Mrs. Colman's reminiscences are exceedingly good, and Peck and Heston are both unequaled in their way.

THOS. LAMEN.

BURNETT, NEB., March 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: We had W. F. Jamieson here on the evenings of the 8th, 9th, and 10th of March. It is saying very little to say the lectures were immense. We had a fair audience, and every one was well pleased, all acknowledging him the smartest man that ever spoke in this place. We were unsuccessful in getting out many of the Christians to hear him. They were afraid to come for fear it would lessen their faith, of which they hav but very little at best. They did everything they could to keep anyone from going. Some said Mr. Jamieson ought not to be allowed to speak in the place. They encouraged young men to throw clubs upon the tin roof over our heads while he was speaking, and to disturb the lecture in every way they could, but it did not seem to make any difference with Mr. Jamieson in the least. He said it was Christian-like; he was used to it. He is the right man in the right place, and whoever employs him will not regret it. I wish I could induce Mr. Putnam to come through here on some of his tours. I think such localities, where there are but few Liberals, are just where he ought to visit. This lecture cost me about $20, which is more than I am able to pay, and I find that most of the towns on the line of the Elkhorn Valley road are in the same condition. Mr. Jamieson is the first lecturer that has been west of Creighton. I wish Mr. Putnam would make a trip over the whole line of this road as soon as he can make it convenient to do so. I will do everything in my power to make it a success here and elsewhere. D. W. WHITNEY.

TOUTI, ILL., Feb. 20, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $3.50. After deducting pay for the books ordered, please send balance to Watson Heston as a slight token of my regard for the work he is doing. "The mighty hunter trees a 'possum!" Could language portray the ridiculousness of calling a book inspired that asserts that a certain man was a mighty hunter before the Lord, as plainly as that picture does? Couldn't you hav the one in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 29th (A Memorial to Thomas Paine) enlarged, suitable for framing? I would like one to hang where my neighbors could see it. What a happy thought those cannons are! It does one good to look at them booming away at tyranny and superstition, and feel that all Christendom can't spike them. SARAH A. COPE.

GALION, O., March 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I received all of my order, books and pamphlets, in good condition. I read Denton's scientific treatis on "The Deluge," and would like to say that the TRUTH SEEKER readers who hav not read that lecture should possess themselvs or it. It is readable, understandable, and cannot be contradicted successfully. It is a death-blow to the Noachian Bible story, and no better document can be circulated among pietists and Bible-believers to start the germ of doubt. Elmina's "Lessons for Little Folks" fills an especial need. The "Lessons" teach old as well as young, and many aged folks will get their primary lessons from "Little Lessons." Try it. Little readers will be delighted, and usefully, in facts and truths. Success to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

JOHN P. FLICK.

STANFORD, ONT., March 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $4. Credit $3 to my subscription, 50 cents for two ANNUALS for 1887, and 50 cents for the book called "Exeter Hall."

I am truly sorry to see your Special Notice to subscribers. Can it be possible that when Freethinkers get rid of the fear of hell, the hangman's whip, they lose their principle also? But I think you are as much to blame for the Special Notice as your subscribers, by continuing the paper so long after the time expires. Promptness on your part is required as much as on the subscribers' part.

I would like to hav Heston's portrait. Long life to him, and John Peck, and all the other stars! Long may they liv to spread the gospel of universal mental liberty and dispel the mist of superstition! JOHN MCCLEMONT.

ST. THOMAS, ONT., March 16, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The Secularists of St. Thomas had the pleasure of listening to two very able and interesting lectures on Sunday last, entitled, "The Struggles and Triumphs of Machinery," and the latest of the late, namely, "Humbug," by friend Algie, who is a good speaker and a thorough Secularist. Both lectures abounded with matter of a historical, interesting, and entertaining nature. The church of the past and present came in for considerable criticism, which it has well earned. Of the two lectures, I think the first is preferable. And both are splendid for missionary work.

In reading THE TRUTH SEEKER I find considerable adverse criticism in regard to the course adopted by that paper on the Anarchist farce at Chicago, which some are in the habit of calling a fair and impartial trial. The course pursued by THE TRUTH SEEKER is the only way that a truth seeker should expect it to pursue.

The pictures by Watson Heston are simply immense.

A. HILL.

CHICAGO, ILL., March 13, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav waited to see some reply to the bad "break" J. R. Haggard made, February 19th, in his criticism of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S cartoon of January 8th. He says to the editor: "Your 'Slight Disagreement' is a wonder to me. You seem to forget, or not to hav noticed, two things: 1. That, as a general thing, all animals are afraid of man. 2. That, when God spoke to Adam, man had not sinned. A vast change must hav taken place after that event." Now, I would ask Brother Haggard to examin his Bible carefully, and see if he can find the place where "God spoke to Adam" anything about the beasts fearing him. Let him look at the quotation under the cartoon in question, and he will see that it is from Gen. ix, 11. Let him then turn to that chapter and see whom God is speaking to. In his criticism of Brother Bowman, in the same letter, he says, "He has never read the Bible with care and thought," etc. It transpires that the same is true of Brother Haggard himself. I could say much more about the same letter, but this may suffice to set Brother Haggard to reading his Bible with greater care.

And now, Mr. Editor, as there is so much written and said at present about the Andover theology, I wish that all who oppose the universal salvation theory, on the second probation plan, and still regard the Bible as "divinely inspired"—whatever that may mean—would carefully read Ezek. xvi, beginning at the forty-fourth verse. The former portion of the chapter shows that the prophet was instructed to "cause Jerusalem to know her abominations," after causing her to "see," by rehearsing her past history: "As is the mother, so is the daughter" (v. 44); "Your mother was a Hittite and your father an Amorite" (v. 45); "Thy sisters are Samaria and Sodom" (v. 46); "Thou wast corrupted more than they in all thy ways" (v. 47); "As I liv, saith the Lord, Sodom . . . hath not done as thou hast done" (v. 48); "Neither hath Samaria committed half thy sins" (v. 51); "They [Sodom and Samaria] are more righteous than thou" (v. 52); "When I shall bring again the captivity of Sodom and Samaria and their daughters, then will I bring again the captivity of thy captivs in the midst of them" (v. 53); "When they return to their former estate, then thou shalt return to your former estate" (v. 55). Read to end of chapter, and, if the Bible can be believed, the Sodomites, of whom it is said, they are "suffering the vengeance of eternal fire" (Jude vii, 7), must come forth again and receive God's blessing, for God is going to be pacified toward the Jews, who were far greater sinners than the Sodomites.

This is not to say that I believe it, but the time is not far past when I did, and I assure you nothing gave me greater joy than the thought that God was going to prove himself almighty by doing just what all reasoning persons would expect of such a being, viz., save all men and bring them into his joy. JOHN HUDSON.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., March 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 19th a townsman of mine, Sam Pfarrer, speaks of our already too free institutions. I would respectfully suggest to him, if our institutions are too free for him, that he emigrate to Russia or Mexico, where institutions are popularly supposed to be less free.

But what I most object to in his letter is the statement that you cannot find in Springfield any but sluggers, shoulder-hitters, etc., who defend a fellow-citizen wrongfully convicted of a crime which it was impossible for him to commit. Now, I hav lived in Springfield for the last twelve years, and am tolerably well acquainted, and I personally know a score of solid, respectable citizens who condemn the trial and conviction of the Chicago Anarchists; and further, I hav no doubt that I could stand in front of S. Pfarrer's eating-house and get the signatures of two hundred citizens to a petition for their release, and not a slugger, and hardly a whisky-drinker, among them.

I dare say friend Pfarrer means well enough, but he is sadly misinformed as to what a policeman will or will not do.

I inclose a money order for $5, being my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER for two years in advance.

Fraternally, HENRY WALKER.

DODGE CITY, KAN., March 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just been looking over the solid old TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 26, 1887, and find it does me a great deal of good to read its letters from friends, and feel that we are growing in numbers.

I see by Mr. Putnam's letter that in the eastern part of this state they are doing good work, and although we are few in numbers we are strong in sentiment here in our "city of the plains," and we hope in the near future to gain in numbers.

The weather was unfavorable for people in the country to attend Mr. Putnam's lecture here on February 20th, but some of our townspeople were pleased with his views of the Bible and the orthodox church, which heretofore hav taken very little of their attention. They, no doubt, with our now and then handing them THE TRUTH SEEKER to read, will become Infidels and truth seekers indeed.

I want to say something in regard to Mr. Putnam, but my command of language is so poor I can hardly express my esteem of that bright light in the cause of human liberty. He has made a lasting impression on my mind, and I shall always think of him as a reformer and good worker in one of the best causes.

Hoping he may liv long to continue his useful labors, and THE TRUTH SEEKER may giv us, from his brain and others', bright and happy thoughts, W. F. DEAN.

ORION, ILL., March 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith send you $2.50, for which send me Ingersoll's "Prose Poems." I heartily indorse the position you hav taken in favor of justice for the so-called Chicago Anarchists. These unjustly condemned men were not guilty of any crime. They were convicted upon purchased and perjured evidence, and sentenced to death by Christian public clamor, and by the clamor of the lying and falsifying capitalistic press. These men are very intelligent and eloquent labor leaders, and as such they were singled out to be summarily dealt with, in order to quell the eight-hour movement and to put down labor organizations. It is a question if the man that threw that fatal bomb was not hired to do it by the capitalists in order to place odium at the door of labor organizations. These men were indicted as accessories in the murder of Policeman Degnan, who was killed May 4th by a bomb thrown by an unknown man. That man was never arrested or captured, and it is not known who he was. It is not known whether he belonged to any of the Socialistic organizations or not. These condemned men were not connected by any evidence with the principal in the crime, which the law requires in such cases. The whole trial was a farce and mockery of justice. These men were indicted for murder and tried for Anarchism. The whole trial is a disgrace to the state of Illinois, an insult to humanity, justice, and right; but our state is a Christian state, and don't you forget it. There were eight unfortunate policeman killed by that fatal bomb, thrown, no doubt, by a hired assassin of the capitalists. Now eight innocent labor leaders must be selected and publicly murdered to appease the blood that flowed on May 4th. I hear that some of your subscribers are stopping their paper on account of the manly stand you took in behalf of the unjustly condemned men of Chicago. Keep right on as you hav been doing, and you will not lose subscribers. Where you lose one you will gain two. Those who stop their papers because you gave your opinion in this case are not true Freethinkers. Truth, justice, and right will win with all thinking men. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER better every week I read it. HENRY JOHNSON.

CLINTON, KAN., Feb. 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am an Agnostic, and want to do what little I can to liberate humanity from the fetters that bind them to superstition and fear. A certain young lady got under the superstitious influence at a Methodist revival at this place not long ago, and for some time it was a tight struggle for her to hold her grip, but the preacher tried to console her by saying, "The harder the cross to bear, the brighter the crown." Why did he not say, "The more the reason is destroyed, the greater the fool?" A certain man living north of here, who is a member of the United Brethren church, and is a very poor man, was compelled to refuse aid under the following circumstances: His neighbors, who are Liberals, wanted to get up a dance and giv him the proceeds. The poor man seemed willing, but upon consulting his brethren and the ministers, was debarred from accepting. Perhaps he will starve for God's sake, while the preacher passes around the hat accepting the proceeds of the last dance. The Lord's congregation is thus supported by contributions from the devil. True religion is what we do, not what we believe. I think a great deal of Colonel Ingersoll, though I hav never seen him. C. V. WILLIAMS.

NEW CARLISLE, IND., March 5, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I would like a word on the land question. The nationalization of the land is, in my opinion, all wrong. It may do a thousand years hence, but at the present time there is plenty of land for us all a home, and more too. Besides, there are many persons who own land, and hav a good, comfortable home, that would not part with it for more than twice its value. Of course, the present system is wrong. To allow any and every speculator to buy and monopolize all our best farming lands, and then rent them out at starvation rates to those that are unlucky enough to be poor, is a stigma and reproach on the laws of the United States, and surely ought not to be tolerated any longer.

I hav a plan in mind that I think would remedy all the evils of the present land system, and would work no harm to anyone, although it might make some of the big land speculators wince, and even curse a little. It is this: Congress should pass a law that would prohibit any person from holding more than a hundred and sixty acres of land in his or her own right. That is enough to make anyone a home, and it is more than one person can farm alone. Of course, where a man has a family, he should be allowed to buy (if he is able and feels so disposed) each child eighty acres, to be held in trust till the child becomes of age. This would effectually prohibit any speculation in land, and I can't see where it would wrong anybody. N. H. IVINS.

BOULDER, COL., March 5, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: S. P. Putnam delivered a lecture at the Opera House in this place last evening on the subject of "Universal Mental Liberty." The audience was fair in size, and of more than average intelligence. The lecture was well received, and the subject of complimentary remarks by many who are not Freethinkers. Such missionaries as Putnam spread the light wherever they go. Indeed, if more such men could be put in the field by the American Secular Union, equipped with the necessary credentials from the Union, and their expenses paid by the rich ones in the Eastern states who hav money, and are willing to spend it to further the truth, the Western states would soon respond by the organization of branches of the Union, and thus the good work of enlightening mankind would be the sooner accomplished. But with the desultory and sometimes erratic efforts of unauthorized speakers, and the odium frequently thus brought upon the Freethought movements, progress must necessarily be slow, and, under such circumstances, organization almost impossible. This thought is echoed by all the influential Freethinkers in this region with whom I hav conversed on the subject. It surely merits the serious consideration of all friends of the cause in the centers of wealth and population in the Eastern states.

Many here most sincerely hope that we may hav another visit from Mr. Putnam whenever his many engagements will permit. He does good wherever he goes. JOS. WOLFF.

SOUTH BEND, IND., Feb. 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find postal note of fifty cents for Remsburg's "Image Breaker" and "The Bible and Darwinism," by Arthur B. Moss. I made the assertion to a bigot that during the time of John Knox, in Scotland, he instituted laws, punishing those who broke them with death, such as remaining idle on Sunday, building fires, and other little, petty offenses. When I made the assertion, I was told that I couldn't prove it—which was partially true. Can you refer me to some good authority on this subject? Also, in what part of the Bible do you find the passage commanding the people to sell their spoiled meat to aliens?

WILL E. FARR.

[Knox was the leader of the so-called Reformers in Scotland, and among the acts passed by that party was one summarized as follows by Lingard's History of England (vol. vii, p. 294):

The administration of baptism after the Catholic rite and the celebration of mass in public or in private were prohibited under the penalty, both to the minister who should officiate and to the persons who should be present, of forfeiture for the first offense, of banishment for the second, and of death for the third. (See Champions of the Church, by D. M. Bennett, art. John Knox, p. 710.)

Deuteronomy xiv, 21, reads as follows: "Ye shall not eat of anything that dieth of itself: thou shalt giv it unto the stranger that is in thy gates, that he may eat it: thou mayest sell it unto an alien," etc. A half of the beauties of the word of God were never told to the average Christian.—ED. T. S.]

PIPPIN LAKE FARM, O., March 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Chas. B. Reynolds concluded, March 2d, a course of four Freethought lectures before the Kent Secular Society to full houses. The lectures were a cheering success in every way, far surpassing our highest expectations. Secularism and Christianity were contrasted to the evident detriment of the latter. From the Christian idol, the Bible, the speaker conclusivly proved that "no good man can be a true Christian, and no true Christian can be a good man;" that the Christians' devil deserves the credit of the introduction of knowledge; that their God is author and creator of all evil, and that the blind follower of the teachings of the Bible is on the road to the penitentiary. Smarting under such a true and awful indictment, Father Leeming arose in the audience to defend his faith. Invited to the platform to state his case, he vainly tried to uphold his church and its God by quibbling. But the lecturer's withering irony and the lateness of the hour silenced the good priest. He (the priest) announced that he would be willing to meet any Secularist in debate. Accepting his challenge, Mr. Reynolds said that Charles Watts would be in town soon and would be only too glad to meet him in debate. Hoping to hear a debate, a large audience assembled in Kent's Hall, Tuesday evening, March 2d, but Father Leeming, strangely enough, had a call to leave town. Still, we hope to meet the good father in debate, and as long as he has the manhood to dare to hear the truths of Secularism, we shall hope that he too may see the light and profit by it. MARIUS HEIGHTON,
Sec. Kent Sec. Society.

GARDEN CITY, KAN., March 7, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: We are somewhat tardy in telling you that Mr. Putnam has been among us. We hav been so busy arguing since his lecture that we hav not found time to write. He set the whole town to arguing. The shells he cast into the orthodox camp had a striking effect; at least, the defenders of that cause hav been industriously striking back ever since his departure.

Of course they did not offer any argument while he was here, except to go out and slam the door during his lectures. The going out and slamming was done only on the first evening by an old-time minister and two or three hoary-headed followers, who could not stand it when the speaker stated that Christ was not a God, nor a son of God, but a man—a Jew.

On the second evening we procured the services of a door-boy, to open and close the door softly, so that in going out they might go quietly, as we hav seen aged Quakers go when the new-fashioned Quaker congregations began singing.

Intelligence is gaining slowly, but it does not gain as slowly as courage. There are more people in our latitude who lack courage than there are of those who lack brains. No doubt there are millions of unbelievers who lack the courage to say so. They are afraid. They are in the same position we were in when we began to hav an inclination to say that Bibles are all of human origin, and all false. These people who lack the courage were told when children, told at the funerals of their dearest friends, in solemn tones, by gray-bearded and positiv men, that this living monster, God, would surely punish thinkers and unbelievers. They were told that we should fear this monster in order to gain his sympathy, that it was a dangerous thing to entertain a doubtful thought, that the most celebrated Infidels had recanted at the last moment, and died, in frightful agony, drunken beasts. Let us pity the cowards, and hav charity for their prejudices and fears. They will make honest Infidels when the pictures of hell cease to hav an effect on them.

A careful man is a free thinker long before he is a free talker. They are coming over slowly. They are waiting to see if it ruins others. We will hav all the cowards on our side as soon as they cease to be cowards.

Mr. Putnam gave his lectures at the Opera House in this city on the 20th and 22d of February. The town had been well billed, and "dodgers" were distributed on which were printed the Nine Demands. Admittance was free, and good audiences assembled both evenings, but much the larger the second evening. At the close of one of his lectures Mr. Putnam recited his poem, "Why Don't He Lend a Hand?" and his hearers seemed to hold their breaths for fear of losing a word. He gave us new hopes, made us better acquainted, and made a few more workers for the Nine Demands of Liberalism. We think we can send you a few subscribers soon. You deserve credit, Mr. Editor, for the many times you hav patiently explained that you do not advocate the opinions of Anarchists, but simply advocate their right to hold such opinions. There is no more harm in Heston's cartoons than in those of Keppler, Nast, or Gillam. CHESS BROTHERS.

RANDOLPH, N. Y., March 17, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I write to inform your readers that our little village of Randolph, noted far and near for its Infidel proclivities, has recently had a boom, such, in fact, as it never has had before. Although we hav a number of churches and several ministers of Christ, religion has been at a very low ebb for many years. Our Christians, as a general rule, would come under the head of backsliders. The awful sin of unbelief has attacked them, and a lukewarmness has spread like a terrible epidemic among the members of the various churches. Several of our most devoted Christians, who seemed to take the most interest in the situation, hav employed new ministers, who, after plainly pointing out the way of salvation, hav become discouraged. The Infidels would point them to the savior who came not to save the "righteous, but to bring sinners to repentance." Nearly all of our ministers for many years past hav raised the white flag while they were backed up with the powerful artillery of the almighty.

About the middle of February we received a visit from the Rev. Mr. Brand, a noted evangelist, whose success in bagging and flanking the enemy is well known. Our lukewarm church-members came out by hundreds to see the celebrated man of God turn his batteries upon the Infidels and the unconverted, but before the first sermon was ended, a large share of those who regarded themselvs as subjects of salvation were informed that they were still in their sins, and that the fiery billows of hell were rolling beneath their feet. Brother Brand takes no stock in backsliders, and shows very clearly that falling from grace is an unmitigated humbug, and one of the machinations of the devil. The evangelist informed us that persons after the age of fifty years rarely find the savior. The young and tender minds, he says, are more susceptible of salvation, which fact has been exemplified here. About fifty persons claim to hav found the "pearl of great price," a large majority of whom are children between the ages of eight and twelve years.

During the progress of this revival some "ungodly Infidel" deposited in the post-office a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER directed to Brother Brand, and during his next discourse your paper was advertised as it never has been before in this community. The evangelist poured out upon your devoted head floods of divine wrath that made the children tremble like an aspen-leaf. The publishers of THE TRUTH SEEKER were not sentenced for a term of years to the flames of hell (the word sheol was too easy), but "for ever and ever." During the delivery of this scathing sermon, where the smell of brimstone and the terrible sufferings of you TRUTH SEEKER fellows were painted in glowing colors, a number of the old gray-headed sinners occupying the front seats, exposed to the terrible batteries (though told that they were on the brink of a precipice), seemed oblivious to the situation.

The sequel to this revival is easily told. The church-members hav got into trouble, and are hating one another in the name of the crucified savior. One of our ministers has preached his farewell sermon, and accused and blackguarded members of his flock. At the close of the sermon one of his leading members modestly informed him that nearly everything he had said was an unmitigated lie. Such has been the influence of the gospel upon the Randolph Christians.

Mr. Brand says the devil runs THE TRUTH SEEKER. If that is the case, Satan is ahead; for since the evangelist left, THE TRUTH SEEKER is circulating extensivly among persons who previously were not aware of its existence.

FREDERICK LARKIN.

STOCKBRIDGE, MICH., March 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Prohibitionists in the state of Michigan are now striving to make deep impressions in the minds of the so-called wayward sons of unrighteousness. The contest, no doubt, will be a close one. Intemperance is a great evil. Every woman and man should do their best to raise the prostrate from the gutter of depravity, but is Prohibition the best mode to mitigate the evil of intemperance? I ask a fair consideration of all genuin Freethinkers who think more of intellectual liberty than of a dollar. My objection to Prohibition is founded on a number of reasons, some of which I will giv in this letter. If Prohibitionists are so deeply interested for the general welfare of humanity, why do the Prohibition party avoid the amalgamation of some other reforms more necessary at present than Prohibition to keep the wolf of want from the door of many poor, honest, temperate people who are battling against poverty because they cannot find employment? Is the single act of Prohibition going to better their condition? It is like all other ecclesiastical reforms, so-called. I object to its enactment mostly because in time it will attack the cause of Freethought. We know that Christians could persecute in the name of Jesus Christ with as much zeal now as in the past. The reason they do not is because they dare not face one-half their number of true, resolute Atheists. Prohibition will swell the God in the Constitution. I think he is too big now.

Who are the leaders of this movement? Mostly Methodist sky-pilots. Prohibition as a reform for the good of the people is very limited. Why don't they adopt a mode that has not so strong a tendency to revolution by adopting something similar to the following? I think intemperance could be wiped away in a few generations. Let them start by taking away the high license and hav free sale, but put a heavy penalty for drunk and disorderly conduct. If any man is found guilty of selling to another when drunk, fine him five hundred dollars, or giv him two years and a half in prison. If any officer does not do his duty, make him liable to a fine. Make selling of intoxicants to minors punishable by five years' imprisonment. Allow no adulteration of anything. Make everything subject to inspection. By this I mean whisky, wine, beer, tea, coffee, tobacco, baking-powder, in fact, almost everything we consume. How can we avoid intemperance when almost everything we eat or drink is adulterated with some opiate? As the next step, hav all alcoholic, vinous, and beer drinks manufactured and distributed by the government by salaried officers elected by each district and paid by the general government. I believe something like this is better than brute force. Prohibition has gained a foothold in those states only where little capital was invested in the manufacture and distribution of intoxicants. This shows plainly that Prohibition will not gain ascendancy in some states for a long time to come. How does it work in Prohibition states at present? It takes fifteen cents to buy a glass of beer. Whisky costs about the same as in other states. That beats high license for high price, and heaps evil upon evil by putting more money in the business. They make their brags about orderly conduct at large gatherings. Put a fine of fifty dollars or six months at hard labor for drunk and disorderly conduct, and I think peace will prevail everywhere. I believe in temperance. Be temperate in drinking, eating, working, in your religion, if you hav one; be temperate in trying to subdue evils of every kind. We want no more Puritan foolishness. If once more commenced, we do not know where it will end.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Spring Lessons.

If spring's fair messenger would bring
Some happy thought to mind,
A glad, triumphant song I'd sing
Of good to all mankind;

Then fling my prosy pen aside,
Nor weary you with rhymes,
But genius must with him abide
Who sings of better times.

I can but faintly voice the bliss
And joy of spring-time cheer,
And liken your dear lives to this,
The childhood of the year.

Learn from the lark its morning song,
And from the thrush its joy,
While life's full pulses throb along
Unmixed with sin's alloy.

Learn from the twilight hush of spring
To still your hearts to hear
The plaint some sorrowing one may bring
Unto your listening ear.

Learn from the birds, the sun, the dew,
The bee, and budding flower,
To happy be, and pure, and true
And thus improve each hour.

Too soon the summer's fervent heat
Will thrill the year with pain;
Too soon your sinless hearts will beat
With selfish lust of gain.

Oh, learn, then, e'er your youth has gone,
To walk in wisdom's way,
That you may speed the "golden dawn"
Of freedom's better day.

I start with a spring, but creep apace
Till I've lost my spring in some other place,
Where aye I leap from year to year,
Though every leap is a fall severe.
I am always going, but never get by;
I am passing away, but never die;
Though day and night my bed I keep,
I am never sick and never sleep.
I run without feet, but never walk;
I am always fluent, but never talk.
Though I sometimes rise, it may be said
I am always found upon my bed—
A bed whereon no man who sleeps
To sorrow wakes or ever weeps.
But, stranger still than all I've said,
At different ends my mouth and head.
And in my mouth, ah, woe is me!
A dreadful snag you oft may see.
With slender forceps, from your jaws,
Your aching teeth the dentist draws;
My snags, alas, are held so fast,
They oft require an engin vast.
The puffing monster pulls in vain,
And breaks its cable, rope, or chain,
Till, oft repaired, and strengthened oft,
It bears at last the roots aloft.
Ex pede Herculem!—forsooth,
I'd rather judge him by his tooth.
And, though I do not wish to brag,
Could Hercules boast such a snag?
That Latin chestnut! Ring the bell!
My poor old snags can crush it well.

Correspondence.

LISTOWEL, ONT., March 21, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav never seen any letter in the Corner from Ontario, I think I will write one. I am nine years old. I go to school and study reading, spelling, writing, and arithmetic. I hav two sisters and three brothers. Papa and mamma like THE TRUTH SEEKER very much. As this is my first letter I will close.

HETTY JICKLING.

OXFORD, March 13, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I go to school every day, and am in the Fourth Reader. I study reading, spelling, arithmetic, grammar, analysis, and geography. Pa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like to read the Children's Corner very much. As I never wrote before, I thought I would write for once. My brother is away, and I expect him home in the spring. I hav a little sister two years and a half old. I will be ten in October. Please correct mistakes and excuse bad writing.

Yours truly, ROBERT SCHURMAN.

TEMPLE'S MILLS, FLA., March 13, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for a long time. I hav read the Children's Corner a great deal, and like it very much. We hav several Liberal books—R. G. Ingersoll's lectures, "Life of Thomas Paine," "Age of Reason," "Antichrist," etc. They are books of good common sense. I think that every family should hav them. There are not many Liberals around here. I will close for this time. Hoping you will see fit to publish my letter, I remain, Your Liberal friend,

HARRIET M. HAGAMAN.

SMITH'S MILL, Feb. 16, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I inclose a poem for the Children's Corner should you regard it as suitable. Like many others, I am desirous of doing something for the Corner, but lack confidence in my own ability. There are few who, like yourself, are capable of guiding and instructing the growing minds of children. Did I possess such ability I should regard it as something "more divine than all divinities." I am not writing this for publication (unless you desire it), but as an expression of appreciation of one whom I regard as doing a great work.

Sincerely, MRS. JESSIE S. CROW.

CORNPLANTER, PA., March 13, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I did write one letter for the Children's Corner, and my parents did not think well of it, so I thought I would write again and see what success I will meet with this time in the way of their criticism.

We hav a piano, and I play some few lively pieces, but occasionally I play gospel hymns for my grandma, who thinks they are very nice. Where I went to school last summer my teacher had us sing religious pieces now and then, but I did not often join in the singing of them, but waited till something more lively was selected.

The Freethinkers is this district are not plenty. I guess my papa is the only person in this section who takes THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I hav a little cousin four years old, who has been taught that if he does anything that is naughty, God, who watches people all the time, would punish him. One day, to the surprise of his parents, he got the rat-trap and set it, and placed it on the table, and stood with his hands behind his back watching it all the time. When his mother asked him what he was doing, he said, "I am going to catch God in that so that he will not be watching everything I do all the time."

I hope you will not think this too long, as I should like to see it in print, as it is only the second time I hav ever written for a paper.

FANNY BURNEY MORRISON.

CHAT WITH CORRESPONDENTS.

WM. SCOTT.—Do not get impatient.

GEO. N. HILL.—Many thanks for the keepsake. It will be treasured with great care.

S. MAHER.—"A Bit of Bird Gossip" very soon. We are crowded with matter, which is the cause of delay.

MRS. H. E. HOWARD.—Your letter and poems received. They will appear soon. Thanks for your kind interest.

JAMES BREWSTER.—Your interesting and instructiv article will appear the first opportunity. We thank you for your kindness, and will always welcome you in the Corner.

J. C. WEYBRIGHT.—Your good words are very pleasant. It is a pleasure to work when we know we hav such a host of true friends all over the country who are always ready to aid and cheer us.

J. H. PAINE.—Yours received. We were sorry to learn of the death of our old friend and teacher. He was always just, true, and faithful as a teacher, and, we doubt not, was the same in every department of life which he filled.

MARIE STEWART.—Some time ago you sent us part of a story, and we never received the other part, so it was not printed. Fairy stories of that character are hardly suited to our bright children in the Corner, who know very well that there are no fairies who perform improbable things. Write a little true story of something that really happened; do not get it too long, and we will print it.

OLD BOY.—We are not easily frightened, but when we receive an unfinished puzzle in three long sections, enough matter to fill half the pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER, it is no wonder we stand aghast, and are only just able to ejaculate "Declined, with thanks." We went through with about half of the puzzle, but hav not time to finish it, but it is undoubtedly good. "Brevity is the soul of wit." It is also the heart of articles adapted for the Children's Corner.

ADA F. COLBY.—Our aim is to print every child's letter received. If you hav not seen your letter in print, it is because it has not come to hand. Sometimes a letter is lost, through misdirection or from some other cause. We receive a great number of letters, and those from children are printed as fast as room can be made for them. When a child does not see his or her letter in the Corner four weeks after it has been sent, it may be known that it has not been received, and he or she must write again, and direct carefully to the address of the editor of the Corner.

Joy Sunday.

Easter Sunday was originally called "Sunday of Joy," and a very pretty title is it of a day commemorativ of the awakening of the buds and blossoms of springtime.

Ostera was the fabled Teutonic goddess of spring, and in Northern Germany great festivals were made in her honor. Ostera came as a queen of light, love, and joy. She awakened nature from its long and icy sleep of winter. She breathed sweetly upon her, and the flowers sprang into being. She trod the earth, and the brown and wilted grass grew green and fresh again. Sun and cloud alternately smiled and wept for joy at her approach.

The Saxons brought the worship of Ostera into England and called her Easter, and the Anglo-Saxon name for April was Easter month. But the pagan worship of Ostera, or Easter, as beautiful and impressiv as it was, did not suit the early religionists, and failing to abolish its customs and observances, they changed its significance and adapted it to religious rites and symbols.

Its true meaning, however, the stirring of the roots, the unfolding of buds, the upspringing of the flower, the lifting of the snow, in a word, the resurrection of the world of nature, is beautiful and delightful. In this view of it, the whole world may join in its celebration, and the day, divested or its religious apparel, may be welcomed everywhere as indeed a "joy Sunday," white and sweet as the lovely blossoms that crown the fair brow of Ostera, the goddess of spring-time and new life.

You thought Easter had its origin in a different way, but there has been a great deal of falsehood woven around it by superstitious people.

The festival is older than Christianity by hundreds of years; in fact, nobody knows the precise time when it began to be observed as a holiday, but it can be traced back nearly two thousand years. The old-time people celebrated it by giving presents to the poor, by freeing slaves, and holding a general jubilee, sometimes lasting two or three days.

You wish to know what the egg has to do with the observance of Easter, as you notice the pretty Easter eggs in the store windows and the picture cards with designs of eggs on them. Well, the egg is associated with the germ of life, and at Easter is used to represent the new life stirring in the roots and swelling buds of trees and plants. In Scotland, in old times, the young people used to go hunting for wild birds' eggs, and it was considered a piece of good fortune which would last all the year round to find a nest of them. There were many customs, odd, quaint, and some of them silly, connected with Easter in old times. In the north part of England the men parade the streets on Easter Sunday, and every woman they meet they lift three times off the ground, and the woman in return must kiss the lifter or pay a forfeit of a silver sixpence. The next day this custom is resumed, the women doing the lifting. In Ireland some of the people think, even to this day, that the sun dances in the sky for joy on Easter morning; but, of course, you know that it no more dances in the sky on Easter Sunday than on any other day.

When does Easter occur? Since it was taken up and observed by Christians as the day of the resurrection of their savior, there hav been many disputes and disagreements as to its time of celebration. The emperor Constantine had the subject brought before the great Council of Nice in 325, and it was finally settled that Easter should always be the first Sunday after the full moon which occurs upon or next after the 21st of March, and if the full moon comes on Sunday, Easter day will be the Sunday following, hence there is no exact date for it, and it may come as early as the 22d of March, or as late as the 25th of April.

Easter is called the "Queen of festivals." We should celebrate it, if at all, only on account of its original significance, the upspringing of the flowers and awakening of plant life. Do you not think so?

It is refreshing and sweet, after the long and dreary winter, to note the first appearance or indication of new life that means warmth, sunlight, blue sky, springtime, showers, and green grass.

The blue blossoms of liverwort are among the early flowers, and are called Easter flowers. The lovely trailing arbutus is also called Easter flowers, as its fragrant buds bloom sometimes under the snow. Florists cultivate lilies in great profusion for Easter, and find a ready sale for them. Crocuses and daffodils are called Easter flowers because blooming about the time of Easter. The following poem by nature's poet, Wordsworth, entitled "The Daffodils," is very beautiful. Read it:

I wandered lonely as a cloud
That floats on high o'er vales and hills,
When all at once I saw a crowd,
A host of golden daffodils;
Beside the lake, beside the trees,
Fluttering and dancing in the breeze.

Continuous as the stars that shine
And twinkle on the milky way,
They stretched in never-ending line
Along the margin of a bay:
Ten thousand saw I at a glance,
Tossing their heads in sprightly dance.

The waves beside them danced, but they
Outdid the sparkling waves in glee;
A poet could not but be gay,
In such a jocund company.
I gazed and gazed, but little thought
What wealth that show to me had brought.

For oft, when on my couch I lie,
In vacant or in pensiv mood,
They flash upon that inward eye
Which is the bliss of solitude;
And then my heart with pleasure fills
And dances with the daffodils.

Every Sunday in the year should be a joy Sunday, a day of pleasure and meeting with friends, but it is pleasant to emphasize Easter and celebrate it as the new birth or resurrection of nature from the ice and snow of winter.

S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—What was Easter Sunday originally called? Tell what you remember of the fabled goddess Ostera. Who brought the worship of this fabled goddess into England? What is the meaning of Teutonic? Who changed the significance of Easter, and how did they adapt it? Who may join in recognition of its trues meaning? What is its true meaning? Is the festival of Easter very ancient? How was it celebrated in old times? What of the egg and Easter? Name some of the customs associated with the observance of Easter. When does it occur? When was the subject of Easter brought before the Council of Nice, and by whom? What is it called? On what account should it be celebrated, if at all. Name some flowers that are called Easter blossoms. Can you repeat the poem?

Like all THE TRUTH SEEKER'S publications, the mechanical execution of the work is all that could be desired. Good paper, clear type—in short, a neat little volume.

The primary object of the work, as its title indicates, is to sustain Spiritualism, but the absurdities of the Christian religion, and the abominations of the old Jew book, get a terrible shaking up. The book contains much to interest every intelligent reader. . . . Colonel Kelso has done much acceptable work in the cause of Freethought and Liberalism all over the land. Send for his new book—read it—put it into the hands of every Christian; it will teach him that the way of the fool is foolishness. ## The Enigma of Mercy.

Amen! Hallelujah! Forever
The Lord in his righteousness reigns!
The chosen are saved, and the many
Are lost as his goodness ordains.
The almighty boss won the battle,
Old Satan's put under his feet,
And smoke-clouds of anguish arising
Fill heaven with aroma sweet.

There stands a big bellows in heaven,
Right back of Jehovah's throne.
With air-pipes strung from its nozzle
Way down to the fiery zone;
And sometimes an angel gets lazy,
And rusts for the want of use,
His bright wings are flopping and twisted,
His harp-strings all dangling and loose;
Then Michael says: "Here, you dull loafer!
Just jump these 'ere bellows a spell,
And warm up your poor old mother,
A-shivering away down in hell."

There are those in this heavenly kingdom
With friends in the torment below;
But the cords that had bound them when mortal
Are broke, and the burden of woe
That sympathy bears for another
Rests never upon them again,
For conscience is freed from the kindness
That made them do good unto men.

A sweet little angelic cherub,
All rosy and smiling and bright,
With joy written over his forehead
In the glow of eternity's light,
Comes up from the beautiful river,
With ecstasy sweet and unshammed,
So send a blast down on a sister
Who went to a dance and was damned.

A father and mother together
Come up in ineffable joy,
To force down a whiff of pure justice
For the flames round a dear little boy
Who laughed by mistake when the deacon
Broke down with a cough in his prayer,
And died with the crime unforgiven,
To go down to hell and despair.

"All washed in the blood and made whiter
Than snow," and with purity crowned,
A murderer swung from the gallows
Comes joyfully walking around;
And creak goes the powerful engin,
And downward the rich stream is driven,
To blow up the coals that are roasting
The wife that he killed—unforgiven.

A pious, angelical deacon,
Who once distilled whisky on earth,
And sold it around to his neighbors
For thrice what it really was worth,
Takes hold of the handle and turns it
On one who from godliness fell
By drinking his orthodox whisky,
To burn in an orthodox hell.

O beautiful rest for the weary!
O joy that shall be to all men!
O beautiful scheme of salvation,
That saves about one out of ten!
Sweet message of love from the ages!
Sweet story that ever is new!
"Believe, or be damned" to perdition!
I believe! I'll be damned if I do!

Books.

The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL is this year equal if not superior to former issues, and is one of the most useful books of reference for the Freethinker to hav upon his table.—Liberal.

TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC for 1887 is a gem equal or superior to its predecessors. While the table of contents is all of superior merit, the one of special interest is a compilation of "Sunday, Oath, and Blasphemy Laws of the States and Territories of the United States." Paper (illustrated), 114 pp. Price 25 cents.—Light for Thinkers.

The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC for 1887 is received. It is got up in superb style and is chockful of the very best reading. It is not saying too much to say that it is the best of all the annuals issued by that enterprising company. In place of the silly prognostications about the weather, customarily found in almanacs, is the date of births and deaths of men and women whose works and words hav been an inspiration to others to better thoughts and better deeds.—Kansas Blade.

To those wishing the various statistics embodied in the subjects written of in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, its value is hard to estimate. These successiv ANNUALS show the growth of the work of Liberalism in America, and, in fact, in the whole world, and will be good to keep as a matter of reference. The illustrations in this book, about twenty in number, are very fine, the most of them being taken from D. M. Bennett's "Truth Seeker Around the World." The work on this ANNUAL is done in the same faultless style in which the Truth Seeker Company does all its work.—New Thought.

The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC for 1887, published by the Truth Seeker Company, New York, contains a goodly array of articles written in a purely Freethinking vein. Among the contents of this number is an intelligent review of the growth of Freethought in the United States for the year 1886; the address on Liberty by Grover Cleveland, on the occasion of inaugurating the colossal statue of Liberty presented to the people of the United States by France; a poem, entitled, "The Coming Dawn," by D. Louis Bodge, is a picturesque and graphic outline of the "wonders that will be" while the majestic sweep of the universe continues through eternity. The following are the concluding verses, which are a fair sample of the poem as a whole:

The world still moves, the clearing sky grows brighter,
Creeds die, kings rot, thrones crumble into dust,
But the great heart of hope is beating lighter,
Inspired by higher works of love and trust.

Slowly before the rising sun of science
The mists that cloud man's intellect move on,
And radiant with conviction's calm reliance
We hail the brightness of the coming dawn.

In this number there is also a very thorough and interesting account of Freethought abroad—in Great Britain, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Spain, Hindostan, and other countries—giving the number of Freethought associations in each, and the persons who most prominently represent them. Freethought is reported as in a state of great activity all over the world. In one instance the customs authorities attempted to prevent the importation of Freethought works into Australia by seizing a case of books of this character at Melbourne, but they failed, and the books were soon circulated and read.—Galveston News.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM. The Present and the Future Republic of North America. By A Capitalist. Same publishers. 12mo., pp. 498. Cloth, $1.50. New York: Truth Seeker Company, 28 Lafayette Place.

A work treating of the vital problems of the hour in a most vigorous manner. The book is not written by a fanatic, but by a clear-headed, logical man, who desires to elevate instead of lower humanity. It may be styled a prophetic dream of that future of man which is to be. Having commenced its perusal, one is chained by the eloquence of its author until the end is reached, and there he sighs because there is no more. His language at times seems to be inspired by higher powers than those of earth, and in the ecstasy of the moment he cries out, not unlike Cazotte before the French Revolution, "My countrymen, we are sleeping upon a volcano, and these half-stifled murmurings continually reverberating are the prelude of what is to come, except we take measures efficient for its prevention." May not the sounds we hear to-day from the oppressed and down-trodden, "those who toil in rags unfed," be prophetic of a greater uprising than that of 1861? This work seems to us to be a most valuable contribution to social science, and we trust it may hav a wide sale and receive from all a most careful reading.—Light on the Way.

"THE NEW GOD" OF S. P. PUTNAM.

For my own part, I see no necessity for any God at all. And so it was with a slight contraction of eyebrows that I opened the little pamphlet of thirty-four pages with the exclamation, "What does Putnam want a God for?" But I had to read it all, every word, before I laid the book down. And I must say the new God is a vast improvement on the old one, and, if we must hold to the gods, the one portrayed in glowing colors, in wonderful and most attractiv word pictures, is the one we would select—"the god of service, of labor, of helpfulness to humanity." His description, his attributes, his usefulness and beauty, are told in Mr. Putnam's vigorous and poetic style, in terse, telling, jeweled sentences. And with such a divinity—or rather humanity, for the new god is shown as most wonderfully and truly human—we must fall in love, or, better still, arise in love at once.

The only objection that one may hav to the new God, as revealed by Mr. Putnam, is that it is shown in an intensely masculin form. It is he—he—he all the way. It should be he and she. The perfect new God must be both masculin and feminin. The world has had enough of the "he" element; now let it be he and she. When Theodore Parker prayed, he addressed the father and mother of the universe. Doubtless this idea of deity is entwined in the harmony of Mr. Putnam's thought of the new God. It must be, though unexpressed, for in no other way can the new God come to our human appreciation. I am tempted to quote largely from the glittering gems to lavishly displayed on the pages of the new God; but no, I will refrain, and ask you to read and judge for yourselvs. You will feel better, nobler, truer, more exalted in mind, more in love with the true, the beautiful, the natural after reading this book, as well as disgusted with the old, the false, the unlovely and unnatural. I thank the author for this last intellectual banquet that he has given, and trust he may liv long to prepare still other feasts of reason for the hungry souls on earth. SUSAN H. WIXON.

No man in the ranks of Liberalism, unless it is Robert G. Ingersoll, is so versatil in imagery and illustration, nor is there a writer among them who makes poetry out of every prosy subject he handles, as does this man, Putnam. "The New God" is not only a dead set argument against the God who has figured so long and done so much mischief in this world, but it is an argument showing all gods are man-made, that nature and her laws must take the place in the future the gods hav occupied in the past. The price of the pamphlet is only ten cents.—New Thought.

"The Origin of the Christian Bible," by Dr. O. B. Whitford, 25 cents. TRUTH SEEKER office, 28 Lafayette Place, New York; also, "A Masonic Vindication of Right," a protest against persecution, by the same author and to be obtained at same office. Price 15 cents. These two pamphlets are works for study, and such are demanded in consequence of the progress of investigation. The latter work was the natural result of persecution for having written the former. Members of the Masonic order had better be waking up to the idea that this ancient order has been monopolized by the Christian church, and has been by them, when it was possible, converted into a worse system of despotism even than the Christian church. We heartily commend these important works, and suggest to Masons who would preserve their order from the Christian despotism to see that Dr. Whitford's "Vindication" has a very wide circulation among members of the order.

"Economic Equities," by J. K. Ingalls, author of "Social Wealth." 25 cents. TRUTH SEEKER office, 28 Lafayette Place, New York. This is a very concise elucidation of a very important question, one of the many outgrowths of the struggles between capital and labor. Political economy as taught in all of our colleges is taught from the capitalists' standpoint, and that is one reason why capitalists sustain the colleges. The donations are the pay they giv for the support they receive in the instruction that is given in a false or usurious system of economics. As the workingman has not access to colleges to see what is taught, he will be able to learn in this little work, and will be taught how to correct the false system of the schools. It is divided into short chapters, each of which it will require but a few minutes to read, but will furnish food for thought while the workingman is in the shop, or at the forge, or in the mine.—American Nonconformist.

The Obsequies of Mrs. Ernest Mendum.

"It is better to die, in love with life, than liv, in love with death."

From the Boston Investigator.

At the funeral of Mrs. Isabel Crowell Mendum, which took place at Melrose, Mass., on Tuesday, March 22, 1887, Mr. L. K. Washburn delivered the following eloquent, sympathetic, and affecting funeral address:

DEAR FRIENDS: We hav met together to perform the last kindness to one who has been kind to others. We bring our last offerings of love to whisper the silent hope of our hearts. At this time we hav left us only the duty of the living to the dead. With bowed heads, with sacred thoughts, with tender feelings, with love that melts into sorrow, we perform this sad duty.

The fair young wife, the loving daughter and sister and friend, is taken away in the spring-time of life with every bud of joy bursting into gladness. The light has gone out in the morning while it burnt bright and clear, and when life was full of the sweet promises of happiness. The curtain of night has been drawn over the eyes of day, and the shadows rest where the sunlight should sport and play.

Our young friend has fallen asleep at the door of her new life, with heart filled with bright dreams of the future. We cannot disturb her sleep. While life was richest and sweetest she bid it good-bye, and perhaps we cannot leave life in a better time than when the sunshine holds us in its clasp, when the air is full of song, and when the skies are painted in fair, warm colors. Where we can not know, let us not decide.

We all love life; and, in our human sympathy, one for another, we would hav life's every hour golden with light, and sparkling with joy. When life is beautiful and living is rapture, it seems cruel to turn our smiles to tears.

If life were an unmixed good, then death might be an evil, but sometimes life's most fervent prayer is that it should cease. It is better to die, in love with life, than liv, in love with death.

We would fain believe that decay is but a fear that holds the hand of grief; that the darkness of sorrow is but the night that precedes the dawn of day, but the mute lips of the dead cannot answer our inquiries, and we question them in vain.

The book is closed before the story of life was finished. The bough is broken off before the blossoms had turned to fruit. The vase is shattered and the flower is gone, but the perfume it shed around it remains. At such a time as this, when remembrance is all that is left us, how precious is every word of love! how rich is every act of kindness! how full of comfort and peace every spoken thought, every murmured desire!

We cannot lessen the grief of this hour. We cannot smile in the face of death. Let us not, therefore, think mourning a weakness. "There is a time to weep," and tears are manly and womanly when our hearts hav been torn asunder with the pangs of parting forever from those we love. But let us remember that the sun shines again when the storm-cloud is passed, and that the eyes will cease their weeping after a time.

In parting with those we love we part with no blessing which they hav brought to our hearts. The pure, noble life, full of sacrifice and self-denial, cannot be laid in the grave. All the fond memories of kind act and loving deed liv in our lives to make us purer and better. We must say farewell to the cold form and silent spirit of her whom we hav known in life.

My friends, let this occasion soften our feelings toward the living and make us truer to one another, nobler in speech and act, purer in thought, and kinder to all, so that when our name is called to go and join "the choir invisible," we may go with less to regret and more to remember with gratitude.

And now, loving and loved wife, daughter, sister, and friend, farewell! In thy grave we drop a tear of regret, upon thy grave we plant a flower of love, and above thy grave we set a star of hope!

Mr. Washburn then read the poem entitled "Oh, may I join the choir invisible!" by George Eliot:

Oh, may I join the choir invisible
Of those immortal dead who liv again
In minds made better by their presence; liv
In pulses stirred to generosity,
In deeds of daring rectitude, in scorn
For miserable aims that end with self,
In thoughts sublime that pierce the night like stars,
And with their mild persistence urge man's search
To vaster issues.

So to liv in heaven:
To make undying music in the world,
Breathing as beauteous order that controls
With growing sway the growing life of man.
So we inherit that sweet purity
For which we struggled, failed, and agonized,
With widening retrospect that bred despair.
Rebellious flesh that would not be subdued,
A vicious parent shaming still its child,
Poor anxious penitence, is quick dissolved;
Its discords, quenched by meeting harmonies,
Die in the large and charitable air.
And all our rarer, better, truer self,
That sobbed religiously in yearning song,
That watched to ease the burden of the world
Laboriously tracing what must be,
And what may yet be better—saw within
A worthier image for the sanctuary,
And shaped it forth before the multitude
Divinely human, raising worship so
To higher reverence more mixed with love—
That better self shall liv till human Time
Shall fold its eyelids, and the human sky
Be gathered like a scroll within the tomb
Unread forever.

This is life to come
Which martyred men hav made more glorious
For us who strive to follow. May I reach
That purest heaven, be to other souls
The cup of strength in some great agony,
Enkindle generous ardor, feed pure love,
Beget the smiles that hav no cruelty—
Be the sweet presence of a good diffused,
And in diffusion ever more intense.
So shall I join the choir invisible
Whose music is the gladness of the world.

The impressiv and affecting services were closed by the editor of the Investigator, who offered an appropriate tribute of esteem and friendship for the departed, and expressed his deep sympathy for the bereaved ones in their great affliction and sorrow.

The casket and the floral offerings were unusually beautifully, and after the last and parting look was taken, the remains were conveyed to the Wyoming Cemetery for burial.

Obituary.

DIED.—March 19, 1887, Mrs. Milton Lamson, of Fowler, Trumbull county, Ohio, of heart disease, aged 64 years.

Mrs. Lamson's death came very suddenly and unexpectedly. She was as well as usual within a few minutes of her death. She left us quietly and without a sign of pain, as she often said she wanted to go when the time came. She was an outspoken Freethinker, and many times expressed the belief that this life ended all. Her motto was, Do right and fear not; and she lived it out to the letter. All the children of the neighborhood, Christian as well as Freethinker, called her grandma, and many a tear trickled down their tender cheeks as they looked upon her for the last time. She was a mother to us all. She leaves a husband and two sons with whom we mourn her loss. J. D. WHEELER.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

News of the Week.

At last accounts the Grant Monument fund was $120,845.

Herr Johann Most, who was sentenced to a year's imprisonment on Blackwell's Island for making a violent speech, was released April 1st.

The Chicago carpenters are striking for eight hours.

Knights of Labor hav voted to boycott the New York Sun.

Spring has at last consented to smile upon this community.

The Keely motor has just been "perfected" again. The results are not reported.

Fifty-eight persons were arrested in this city last Sunday for selling liquor contrary to law.

The high license bill has passed both houses of the New York legislature, and awaits the signature of the governor.

The Cunard steamer Scythia was reported wrecked off Scituate, Mass., last Saturday. Sunday the vessel came safely into port.

The Rev. Mr. Ward, of Englewood, N. J., who shot his wife, was in court last Saturday, where he gave bonds to await action by the grand jury. He will probably be indicted for assault with intent to kill.

People are reported starving in the drouth-stricken portions of Texas.

The body of the young woman murdered at Rahway, N. J., remains unidentified, and there is no clew to the murderer.

Sterry G. Clarke, M. D., of Brooklyn, a strong opponent of vaccination, died last week of small-pox. He was 27 years old.

Charles A. Fairchild, of New York, has been appointed successor to Daniel Manning as secretary of the United States treasury.

The Newfoundland sealing steamer Eagle foundered last week in Buena Vista bay, and of the 260 men on board not one survived.

Captain Kidd's treasure is now supposed to be under the sand at Upper Nyack, N. Y., as a Spanish dollar bearing date of 1769 has just been found there.

John G. Saxe, the poet, died at Albany, N. Y., March 31st, aged 71. For the past five years he has been greatly reduced in mental and physical health.

The Hotel del Monte at Monterey, Cal., was burnt on the night of April 1st. The guests, 300 in number, escaped with their lives, but lost their baggage.

The General Term of the Supreme Court has decided that the Young Men's Christian Association is a religious organization, and as such its property is exempted from taxation.

The members of a Roman Catholic temperance society, composed of Roman Catholics, who held meetings under the vestry of a church in Brooklyn, hav been ousted from their rooms for gambling.

The prohibition amendment was carried at last Monday's election in Michigan. The Republicans carried the state. The first report from Cincinnati, O., gave the Labor party the majority in the city election, but a revision in the count elects Smith (Rep.)

Dr. McGlynn, the recalcitrant priest, lectured last week in the Academy of Music to an audience which filled the vast structure to the roof. He called his lecture the "Cross of a New Crusade." Enthusiasm was unbounded, and the financial returns must hav been quite satisfactory.

Last Sunday was palm Sunday, and religious people walked about with their hands full of palmleaf. No savior riding upon "an ass and the foal of an ass" made a triumphal entry into New York, and if he had he would probably hav been arrested for giving a secular exhibition on Sunday.

THE GENEROSITY OF SARAI.

And Sarai, Abram's wife, took Hager her maid, the Egyptian, and gave her to her husband Abram to be his wife.—Gen. xvi, 3.

Odds and Ends.

The trade dollar trusted in God, and Congress redeemed it. This is mixing religion and politics in a painful manner.

If the Goddess of Liberty could talk in proportion to the size of her mouth, the English language would last her only a week.

At Lenten service—Miss Molly: "Come in our pew, Kate." "Oh, no; come in ours. We've got such nice, comfortable, high kneeling cushions! They dont' strain your polonaise a bit."

It is said that women hav little or no sense of humor, and it must be true. Otherwise she could never get past the love, honor, and obey part of the marriage ceremony without laughing.

Medium: "Whom do you wish to see, madam?" Madam: "My husband. He was allers askin' people in this world, 'Is it hot enough for you?' an' now I want to put the same question to him.'

A Chinese writer says that a man could borrow money in China on the strength of his having a son, the idea being that a Chinaman makes it his first duty to pay his father's debts. Those heathen are simply hopeless.

There is a young woman in Dakota who is successfully working a one-hundred-and-sixty acre farm, and she declares that she could work one twice as large if the men who want to marry her would stop bothering her.

An Illinois paper has the following: "The funeral services of the late William P. Lewis were somewhat hurried, to enable his estimable and grief-stricken widow to catch the 2 o'clock train for Chicago, where she goes to visit friends."

She: "Where are you going, Charley?" He: "Going to the opera." "She: "Ah, I understand. The ballet. But why don't you go to the dog show instead? I think you will like it ever so much better. The dogs, you know, hav four—twice as many as the ballet dancers."

At one t me there was silence in heaven for half an hour, which some men take for a proof that there are no women there. But there are. That accidental silence was caused by the women all happening to be arranging their toilets at the same time, and each had a roll of hair in her mouth.

"I'm laying for that fellow, and will get him yet," said an angry Brooklynite to his Boston wife. "You shouldn't say, 'Laying for him,' Harry," corrected his wife; "you should say, 'Lying for him.'" "I should do nothing of the sort, my dear. I'm no lawyer," he replied; and the lady retired in confusion.

More criminal carelessness. "Julia, did that young man who called on you last evening kiss you just before he left the house?" "Why, mamma, could you hear?" "I heard enough—too much for my own peace of mind. How often hav I told you to beware of these men! Your conduct is inexcusable." "I wasn't to blame, mamma. We were standing at the front door, and his mouth was real close to my face, and before I knew it——" "That will do. I see you hav no excuse to offer." "Yes, I hav," sobbed Julia. "What is it, pray?" "His mouth—was—awful close to my face—and—I didn't know—it was—loaded."

"Are you going to strike, ma?" asked the little boy, as he tremblingly gazed upon the uplifted shingle. "That's just what I'm going to do." "Can't we arbitrate, ma, before you strike?" "I'm just going to arbitrate," she said, as the shingle descended and raised a cloud of dust from the seat of a pair of pantaloons, "I am just going to arbitrate, my son, and this shingle is the board of arbitration."

Lawyer L. W. Wilcox, the grizzled veteran of Titusville, who was injured by stepping from a moving train at Corry the other day, is the leading character of this serio-comic incident, which has never before been printed: Ministers were a trifle scarce in a G. A. R. post, up the creek, of which Wilcox was a member, and he was elected chaplain. His chief duty was to open the meetings with prayer, and, never having set himself up as a praying man, the prayer was printed on a card, so he could get through with it with less mental effort. Wilcox carried the card around in his pocket, along with his tobacco and things, and when he came to use it for the first time the printing was considerably obscured. After the meeting had been called to order, Chaplain Wilcox stepped to the front, took out his card, and began to scrutinize it closely. He regarded it carefully for a moment, and then began to read, deciphering the printing with much difficulty. "O Lord," he began, ho'ding the card so as to get the best possible light on it. "O Lord, we——" then stopping to spell out a dim word—"we thank thee for thy"—another halt—"for thy—dammit, boys, I can't read it!"

A gawky young man and a shy, "hang-back" girl, walking arm-in-arm, attracted much attention as they walked along the street. The young fellow had told a hotel clerk that he lived near Carney Fork and that he was on his bridal tour. "Lou," said the husband, stopping near a fruit-stand, "order what yer appertite is er-cravin' an', blamed ef I don't pay fur it." The wife selected an orange, and the husband, as he handed over a nickel in payment, said: "When I go on a spree uv this sort, I never let expenses skeer me off. Podner," nodding to the fruit-dealer, "this is my wife, an' you bet I'll stand by her. I whupped in erhead uv er feller that had cou'ted her six years, an' jes' nachu'lly took her away from him. Lou, order what yer appertite is er-cravin' an' blamed ef I don't pay fur it." She took a nickel's worth of candy, and as her husband handed over the amount he said: "Is ain't often in er man's life that he gits on sich er sloshin' round spell ez this. Lou, I'm with you, an' I want yer to un'erstan' that I'll lam down the cash fur anything yer order. Ef yer'd married Andy Buckner yer mout stood 'round here with your mouth waterin' fur things. Lou, I'm yore husband, ain't I?" "Yes, Dan." "Then order what yer appertite is cravin'."

Gems of Thought.

The similarity between the Indian demigod and the Judean demigod who, it is claimed, figured much later in Palestine, is most marked. One only could hav been the original. The copy was certainly not the one who came first or who was believed in first.—D. M. Bennett.

The argument for the inspiration of the Old Testament scriptures, derived from the character of their contents, will bear no examination. It is true that many parts of them contain views of duty, of God and of man's relation to him, which are among the purest and the loftiest that the human intellect can grasp; but it is not less true that other passages, at least as numerous and characteristic, depict feelings and opinions on these topics, as low, meager, and unworthy as ever took their rise in savage and uncultured minds. These passages, as is well known, hav long been the opprobrium of orthodoxy and the despair of theologians: and so far are they from being confirmatory of the doctrin of scriptural inspiration that nothing but the inconsiderate and absolute reception of this doctrin has withheld men from regarding and representing them in their true light. The contents of the Hebrew canon as a whole form the most fatal and convincing argument against its inspiration, as a whole. By the popular creed, as it now stands, the nobler portions are compelled to bear the mighty burden of the lower and less worthy—and often sink under their weight.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

[Archbishop Sumner, in his once famous "Treatis on the Records of Creation," after quoting a few sentences from the monotheistic philosophers and poets of Greece, says "these only shine when separated from the dross that surrounds them." If he had not been overmastered by the prejudice of education and by a feeling of ambition—sniffing afar off the air of Canterbury—he could not hav failed to see that the same line of argument would apply to the Bible, as a whole, and especially to the earlier writings of Moses and the prophets. Mr. Greg is by far too generous in his criticism of these books, when he talks of them as containing some of "the purest and loftiest conceptions that the human mind can grasp;" but he keeps within the line of historic truth when he says that the Hebrew scriptures contain and depict sentiments and opinions "as low, meager, and unworthy as ever took their rise in savage and uncultivated minds." By ringing the changes on the few good passages and passing over the low, vile, and bad ones, the priests impose on the people, and they were too sluggish to "search the scriptures" for themselvs up to Sumner's time; and it must be confessed that the bulk of the people on both sides of the Atlantic are still rather slow in asserting the right of independent thought and the duty of speaking out their thought. Let us hope that they will mend, as they get better!—Hylax.]

O thou, whatever title suit thee,
Auld Hornie, Satan, Nick, or Clootie,
Wha in yon cavern, grim and sootie,
Closed under hatches,
Spairges about the brunstane cootie,
To scaud poor wretches!

Hear me, auld Hangie, for a wee,
An' let poor damned bodies be;
I'm sure sma' pleasure it can gie,
E'en to a deil,
To skelp an' scaud poor dogs like me,
An' hear us squeal!

—Burns's Address to the Devil.

The doctrin of eternal punishment for the sins of this life desecrates all sanctities, and sucks us down into an atmosphere thick with inspirations of sacrilege. It is a hideous dream. It was born in heathenism. It is a pagan nightmare, oppressing the slumber of our cowardly Christian thought.—Starr King.

Oh, yet we trust that somehow good
Will be the final goal of ill,
To pangs of nature, sins of will,
Defects of doubt, and taints of blood;

That nothing walks with aimless feet;
That not one life shall be destroyed,
Or cast as rubbish to the void,
When God hath made the pile complete;

That not a worm is cloven in vain;
That not a moth with vain desire
Is shriveled in a fruitless fire,
Or but subserves another's gain.

Behold we know not anything;
I can but trust that good shall fall
At last—far off—at last, to all;
And every winter change to spring.

—Tennyson's In Memoriam.

Others reasoned high
Of providence, foreknowledge, will, and fate—
Fixed fate, free will, foreknowledge absolute!
And found no end, in wandering mazes lost.
Of good and evil much they argued then,
Of happiness and final misery,
Passion and apathy, glory and shame;
Vain wisdom all and false philosophy.

—Milton's Paradise Lost.

THE Rev. Dr. Parker, a famous London preacher, is talked of as Beecher's successor. He has accepted an invitation to deliver an oration in Brooklyn on Beecher's birthday.

THE late Miss Catherine Wolfe left half a million worth of pictures to the Metropolitan Museum of Art, and gave an additional $200,000 to provide for their preservation and increase.

IN the Methodist Conference the other day, Dr. Hatzell said he knew of a colored clergyman who wanted to preach a sermon against the playing of marbles, and took for his text, "Marble not, my brethren."

LADD'S artesian well in Portland, Oregon, is now down 1850 feet. Last week the drill brought up some specimens of tropical timber, among them being almond shells of perfect form, and wood and bark of the sawke species.

THE first news from Michigan last week was that the prohibition amendment had been carried in that state, but later advices contradicted the report. The Prohibitionists will hav to try again, consoling themselvs with the reflection that there are some causes to which nothing could be so fatal as success.

WOMEN voted at the municipal elections just held in Kansas. According to reports, the majority of the female vote was from the negro women, and was scooped in by the Republicans. Report says further that the voting of women did not tend in the least to purify the polls, and tales are related of corruption and bribery. It is possible that the true story of the Kansas elections has not yet reached the East.

THE Rev. Mr. Talmage says he "listens for artillery rumbling down the sapphire boulevards of heaven." If it does rumble, and he fails to hear it, it wouldn't be from lack of ears.—Drake's Magazine.

AN Albany newspaper tells of a tramp who recently asked a merchant for ten cents. The merchant replied: "I do not care to giv you money, but if you will step into this restaurant I will pay for a steak and some hot potatoes for you." He was somewhat surprised when the tramp replied: "Well, sir, I don't want the ten cents for victuals. I want to buy a drink. Another thing, you're no gentleman to ask a man to eat meat in Lent. That ain't my religion."

THE only proofs thus far in life presented to us in support of the theory that man has a soul comes under the head of hearsay evidence. First-class courts generally rule out that kind of testimony. It strikes some people that the tenets of the whole list of religions are founded on neither axiomatic nor demonstrable truths, but something established by tradition, which, by the way, is not a very distant relativ of what is commonly known as superstition.—La Salle Republican.

THE promoters of a certain church uptown are at present selling fifty-cent lottery tickets all over the city. There are fifty prizes to be drawn, from a five-hundred-dollar government bond and a handsome rosewood piano down to prizes of but little value, and the proceeds of the scheme, deducting their expenses, are to be set apart as a building fund. Lottery of this style when not conducted by church people is frowned upon by good people as being prejudicial to the morals of the young.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

CENTRAL Kentucky is the grandest country on the earth. She excels in horses, hogs, mules, minerals, monkeys, in whisky and wines, in climate, coal, and corn, in grass, gambling, and grain, and in tobacco, hemp, and hominy, Mexican war veterans, colonels, and generals. She has more churches and less religion than most countries. She also excels in politicians and potatoes, in brave women and fair men, in law and lawlessness, and in brag and bluster.—Richmond (Ky.) Herald.

GENEROSITY is becoming epidemic among our millionaires. Within the last few days a bewildering succession of priceless works of art, free offerings on the part of distinguished citizens, hav become the property of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, which can now boast of a collection of paintings not unworthy of this great city. It is to be hoped, says the Evening Sun of this city, that the people will not be debarred from looking upon and admiring these masterpieces by a continuance of unwise regulations. Let the picture-gallery, at least, be thrown open on Sunday, that a little brightness may enter into the life of the tired wage-earner. The proposition is advanced in a hopeless and even reckless sort of fashion, but in the belief that it will scare almost to death that holy man, Morris K. Jesup. The chief opponents of opening art galleries on Sundays are the stiff-necked Sabbatarians whose coachmen and footmen find on Sunday the hardest day's work they hav to do in the week.

MRS. C. B. LEMUELS, of Allegheny, Pa., is writing to the editors of newspapers as follows: "Convinced that Infidelity is one of the prime causes of much of the crime so prevalent, and that a knowledge of God and faith in him exerts a powerful influence for peace and true happiness upon both the world and consecrated Christians, I am doing what I can to supply what so many seem to lack—a foundation for faith. Believing that many of your readers would be benefited thereby and bless God and you therefor, I extend to them through your courtesy the following offer: I will loan, free of postal and all charges, to such of your readers as will promis a careful reading and to pay return postage after reading it, a book which in interesting style shows the Bible to be a self-interperter, and its teachings grandly harmonious, viewed in the light of sanctified reason and common sense. I want to put this book into the hands of all the skeptically inclined, as an aid and guard against the growing scientific skepticism. It is not dry, musty reading, but truly 'meat in due season' to the truth-hungry. The light of this precious little volume has made the Bible a new book, a treasure, a mine of wealth to many as well as to myself. And I feel that I cannot better use my means than in circulating this work by the thousand. If any in your office lack faith in the Bible, I shall be pleased to hear from them among the first. Yours for faith and truth." Mrs. Lemuels is hereby invited to transmit her Infidel extinguisher to this office, where there are "some who lack faith in the Bible." The work, she may rest assured, will receive distinguished consideration.

Tales Told Out of School.

DR. JONES'S REPORT TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE CONDITION AND PROSPECTS OF THE CHURCH.

PHILADELPHIA, March 10, 1887.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I send thee the first part of a document which, if published in thy columns, will afford some interesting reading for thy subscribers. The way it came into my possession is as follows: I hav a friend who is clerk in the office where the conference or committee alluded to in the report were in the habit of meeting. One day on a casual visit I made him, the topic of conversation was the great spread which Infidelity was making through the country. My friend himself is a nominal Christian, but he could not resist the temptation to take from a drawer and show me a document, which I read a few pages of, and as it tasted moreish, and was entirely too long to read then and there, I begged leave to take it home with me for perusal. He reluctantly consented, saying with a smile that it would not soon be wanted for publication, for the committee thought that Dr. Jones, the author of it, had made too many honest confessions in it to suit the rest. Debby, my wife, who is a voracious reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and believes in it, when she caught the tone of the document, put in her spare time for more than a week, while I was daily at my place of business, and took a copy of it for use, thinking that, under the caption of "Tales Told Out of School," its publication would do good in showing how some of the orthodox ministers think and feel in regard to the prospects of the church in this country.

If anyone should say that it looks a little like a surreptitious act to do what Debby has done, let two things be remembered: First, that no person is injured either in soul, body, or estate by its publication; and secondly, that the orthodox Christians who some years ago were connected with and had control of the United States mint, located in this city, without the least warrant of authority from Congress, and in defiance of the spirit and letter of the national Constitution, stamped the superstitious and hypocritical motto on the coin of the republic, "In God we Trust."

Hoping thee will jump in judgment with Debby and me, I send the first installment of the copy with the request that, if printed, thee will prefix this explanatory note, so that thy readers may understand. If they should feel any interest in the subject, I will send the rest as Debby shall be able to prepare it for the printers. Respectfully thy friend,

AMOS TOWNSEND.

REVEREND AND DEAR BROTHER: After receiving my appointment to spend a year quietly in traveling around among the churches of the East, and particularly those of our own denomination, with the triple purpose of learning the true condition and prospects of the church generally in regard to vitals, godliness, and sound doctrin; the extent of the inroads which Infidelity has made upon the faith of the people; and ascertaining from the Infidels themselvs, as far as possible, their real opinions, character, plans, and purposes, I now submit the following report. And as the results of my investigation were not intended for the eye of the Christian, much less the general public, but only to remove or confirm the apprehensions of the committee in regard to the actual state of religion, so as to assist in shaping the future policy of the church, I must imitate the fidelity of the true physician, who, when called in to see and cure a patient, carefully diagnoses the case to ascertain the cause and character of the disease, and then prescribes the remedy. In common cases the usual methods of practice will do; but in those which are critical, it is often necessary, in order to save a valuable life, to resort to the "heroic" treatment. This plan I shall adopt in my report, so that neither you nor I will feel that I was sent out on a fool's errand. And that the results of my experience and reflections may hav some order, I shall treat the various subjects concerning which I was ordered to inquire seriatim. And first, for the time has come that judgment, if it has to be rendered after an inquest, should "begin at the house of God."

THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY,

Those of us who hav been in the service of the gospel for forty years, as most of the committee hav been, must often hav noticed, and mourned over, the contrast, in orthodoxy and zeal, between the clergy of this day and those who instructed and led the church in the olden time, when every minister was a shepherd, and his people a flock of sheep. Then there was real faith in the doctrins of the gospel. Whether men did hear, or forbear to hear, these revolutionary truths were boldly preached, in season and out of season, in the highways and the hedges. To the courage and fidelity displayed in that policy the Holy Ghost bore witness, and his blessing filled the churches with living and devout worshipers. A man converted by the truths of the gospel which hav convinced his intellect, and enlightened his conscience, is permanently converted, and his line of life is laid down and fixed by his religion. The modern way of being born into the kingdom, by the Cæsarian operation, suddenly, under the pain-destroying influence of drugs, instead of the quiet agony of parturition in the natural way, has made the church a foster-mother to a set of rickety and effeminate children who, can scarcely stand alone when the wind of temptation blows, instead of the stalwart sons she used to bear. When we examin the hymnology and music of the church, we find both namby-pamby, and quite destitute of the old ring which made sinners tremble, and rejoiced and edified the saints. The sermonizing of today is like performing the play of "Hamlet" with the part of Hamlet omitted. The consequences are inanity and powerlessness on the part of the sermon itself, listlessness on the part of the hearers, and indifference about results on the part of the preacher. The devil, seeing this cursed state of indifference all round, more dangerous to the church than war, sends his agents, the newsboys, along the street with the Sunday newspaper, filled with all manner of trash; and heads of families, and especially the young men, stay at home to read, instead of going to church to hear.

The secret of this is found in the fact that the doctrin of eternal retribution for sin, as laid down by Christ in the gospel, and in all the orthodox confessions of faith, has become a mere transparent bugaboo, capable of producing no fright. It stands like a scarecrow in a field of corn; the crows see the straw stuffing in the human figure and the wooden gun on its shoulder, and, without fear, dig up the sprouting grain. A man who has any logic in the construction of his mind can plainly see that this doctrin is cardinal—the hinge upon which the gospel and the church both turn. It is the foundation-stone on which all the rest of the doctrins of grace repose, and the one which alone givs sense and meaning to them. Redemption by the blood of Christ for his chosen ones is a foolish, wasteful, and unnecessary scheme unless there is in reality an eternal hell fire from which they hav been redeemed. Sanctification by the Holy Spirit through the established means of grace afforded by the church, and the intercession of Christ in the court of heaven, as advocate with the father in behalf of his chosen, are words without meaning if there is no danger of the loss of the soul.

Now, this fundamental doctrin of Christianity is not believed in by one in a hundred of the clergy under forty years of age. To be sure, they hav not struck it out of the Confession of Faith, the doctrins of which they solemnly swore they would preach when they were ordained as ministers of the gospel. But—what is worse—it is entirely ignored by them, and, logically, so are the rest of the doctrins which, like the two walls of a building, unite upon it as the corner-stone. A stranger might listen to such preaching for a year, and never suspect but that he was sitting in a Universalist or Unitarian church. It is not a breach of charity to say of such brethren that, imperceptibly, perhaps, but really, they hav come to disbelieve this radical doctrin of our faith, since it has no effect whatever in giving tone and quality to their sermons. In conversation with the older men in the ministry, I am not surprised to find that for this terrible defection in the church and the people at large they blame, in a great measure, the impudent officiousness of the late revisers of the New Testament, in eliminating from the text of scripture the word "hell," and substituting therefor "sheol." In old times I hav seen an audience stilled into the silence of death by a minister repeating in his sermon the description of hell in Pollock's "Course of Time." But let any one in the pulpit now undertake to do that, and he would be laughed at in any congregation of cultivated people in a city. On the street, in the mart, and in the railroad cars this awfulest truth of our holy religion is made a constant matter of joke. When a Catholic is so far gone in doubt that he can make fun of the idea that the wafer of bread is, by the priest's prayer, transmuted into the body, blood, and divinity of Christ, he is not far from Protestantism. And when a Protestant can deride the idea of a hell, and tip the wink to his fellow-skeptic, as the Roman augurs did to each other, he is on the track, from which he cannot switch off at will, that leads inevitably to the rejection of the whole system which is built upon it. I fancy, therefore, that I see the Angel of Destiny pointing with unerring finger to the next generation as the time when the church will hav to meet the legitimate consequences of all this. The preachers of the sheol school, who infest every denomination of Christians more or less, may well be compared to Buddensiek, the New York builder, who is now in prison for manslaughter because he erected houses with untempered mortar and poor materials, which tumbled down and killed their occupants. The church, with the doctrin of future retribution taken from her creed as Christ taught it, is in a similar condition, and a bill of indictment lies against all the sheol brethren who made a contract when they were ordained of building up the walls of Zion with stones that were squared and dressed according to the rule laid down in the gospel, and not round or angular stones, which fall out under the weight of the superstructure.

To this widespread suspicion among the people that future punishment for the impenitent is only a scarecrow of antiquity may be traced the fact, universally complained of, that there is such a lack of disciplin in the church. Family worship has generally been given up, or, what is worse, performed in such a way that the children either sleep under the exercise or put in no appearance at all. Baptism of infants is so seldom seen in church that a person who examins the records would suppose that all the mothers of Israel had been stricken with barrenness, and that no children were born. The weekly prayer-meetings, which were always considered an indication, like a steam-gage on a locomotiv, of the state of religion in any congregation, are in a most discouraging condition. I made it a point to attend a prayer-meeting every week during my absence, in some church or other; and in a great majority of instances a more sleepy, perfunctory, and dreary performance you could scarcely conceive of, giving emphasis to the lamentation in the hymn which is always sung on such occasions, that the singers were living at a poor, wretched, dying rate. Nothing is left, then, but the observance of public worship on the Sabbath; and we all know what that amounts to. Even in our good city of Philadelphia, whose religious zeal it was that honored God by shutting the doors of the Centennial exhibition on the Sabbath, in 1876, if every seat in our four hundred churches, embracing all sects, were occupied on the Sabbath, there would be now seven hundred thousand of our citizens, who are practically pagans, and who never darken the doors of our churches from one year's end to the other, and never wish to. But, instead of our churches being filled, as I hav supposed in this calculation, we hav learned to be content if they are half, or a third, filled. And yet, we send missionaries, at enormous expense, to convert this very kind of pagan people to Christianity on the other side of the globe! In cities, when the Sabbath comes, the sons of church-members, and even church-members themselvs, instead of reverently taking their seats with their wives and daughters in the sanctuary, spend the day at their clubs, in smoking, and drinking wine, or, if the weather be good, in riding, driving, or boating.

It is the complaint of all the Protestant sects—the Catholics are not troubled in this way—that pious young men are not fired by a holy ambition to serve Christ in the ministry, as was formerly the case, but lose the zeal of their first espousals, and go into other vocations where they can make money and fame, and not be laughed at in the pulpit by the ungodly, who ridicule everything that is sacred. And this leads me to offer some remarks on our

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

I made it my business to visit, spending two days at each, no less than five theological seminaries. Brother L., during the discussions of the committee that led to my mission, alluded to the mental inferiority, as far as his observation extended, of the average candidate for the ministry now, when compared with those of a former generation.

In measuring the intellectual caliber of the students in the seminaries I visited, I found his opinion justified. The great majority of them obviously come from the country congregations, out of which they were gathered by the education societies, simply because they were poor but pious. After they had received their academic and collegiate education as charity students, they were transferred into the theological seminary on the same foundation. In contemplating their look of commonness, I was forcibly reminded of what I once heard a distinguished president of a college say in a meeting of synod, that, in raking over all the country churches simply for pious young men for the ministry, without reference to brains, the education societies were committing the sin of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who debased the church of God by making priests of the lowest of the people. He took the ground that an able bodied young man who could agree to be educated in the academy, college, and theological seminary on contributions made by poor widows and seamstresses, and by charity in general, was, ipso facto, unfit for the ministry. Such charity training, begun when a youth is taken from the shop or the plow-tail, and continued as it is for years, robs him of his manhood, self-respect, and spirit of independence, and makes him a mere truckling slave and parasite, feeding on the body of the church, and in many instances, when failing to be dandled into some congregation as pastor, losing heart, and going up and down the vacancies, saying, "Put me, I pray thee, into one of the priest's offices that I may eat a piece of bread." The sober truth is that the majority of our charity students who go through the seminary, and get licensed to preach, are not fitted either by ability, education, or manners to meet the necessities of the time. They are mere eunuchs of the kingdom of heaven for the sake of the emoluments. They hav no idea of the condition of the churches, and hence wonder that they are not called to settle down as pastors, when so many of our most important and wealthy congregations are vacant and hav to get along as well as they can under the ruinous system of state supplies. A theological student, as we know by experience, concerns himself at the seminary with studies that qualify him simply to preach the gospel didactically. But the literature which the people composing our congregations now read is steeped in Infidelity in its most insidious forms; and when a raw youth is licensed to preach, and emerges from his cloister in the shape of a minister of the gospel, and enters the pulpit, he has no idea at all of the world he is to liv in, nor of the situation, and is surprised and discouraged at the indifference his audiences manifest toward his sermons. The old system of polemics taught in our seminaries, for reasons to be mentioned hereafter, are as useless now as the old smooth-bore musket and eighteen-pound cannon would be in modern warfare between nations. The enemies of the church to-day are not what they were half a century ago. The old arguments they used, and we used, are not the ones in use now. Then, like the English archers at the battle of Agincourt, we had the advantage of having the sun on our backs; but now the ground is shifted, and we fight under the disadvantage of our eyes being blinded by the bright rays of the sun.

The Vedas, or Hindoo Bible.

The average Christian seems to be ignorant of the fact that there are other so-called holy books in existence of as great importance as the Christian's Bible, and possessing superiority in many respects. For the information of such persons, before whose eyes this article may chance to come, we append the following extracts from the Vedas of the Hindoos:

God is one! Creator of all that is! God is like a perfect sphere, without beginning and without end! God rules and governs all creation by a general providence, resulting from first determined and fixed principles. Thou shalt not make inquiry into the essence of the eternal one, nor by what law he governs. An inquiry into either is vain and criminal. It is enough that day by day and night by night thou seest in his works his wisdom, his power, and his mercy. Benefit thereby.

By one supreme ruler is this universe pervaded, even every world in the whole circle of nature. Enjoy pure delight, O man, by abandoning all thoughts of this perishable world, and covet not the wealth of any creature existing.

To those regions where evil spirits dwell, and which utter darkness pervades, all such men surely go after death as destroy the purity of their own souls.

Let my soul return unto the immortal spirit of God, and then let my body, which ends in ashes, return unto dust.

O Spirit, who pervadest fire, lead us in a straight path to the riches of beatitude! remove each foul taint from our souls, who approach thee with highest praise, and the most fervid adoration.

God, who is perfect wisdom and perfect happiness, is the final refuge of the man who has liberally bestowed his wealth, who has been firm in virtue, and who knows and adores the Great One!

Remember me, O OM, thou divine spirit!

How great must be the mortification of the Christian who has set such great store by his Bible upon the discovery that the "poor Hindoo," for whose enlightenment and salvation he has often contributed to the missionary cause, knows as much about God as himself, and already possesses a written Word fully as elevated in tone and sentiment as any portion of the Bible, and surpassing it in point of freedom from the promulgation of obscene stories.

The worshiper of the triune God, uttering curses upon those who recognize many gods, seeks to impress the teachings of the scriptures upon the minds of those whose faith is centered in a book which avers that "God is one."

How intolerant, how foolish, how blindly bigoted, is the man who attempts to interfere with the religious opinions of those who surpass him in moral conduct, and whose lives are measured by a creed less tyrannical than the one which the Christian would hav the "poor heathen" acknowledge!

The experience of the better class of the human race teaches us that belief in a God is unnecessary to a man of upright character, and exceedingly unprofitable to those who seem inclined to go astray, because the former must be acceptable anywhere, and at any time, by virtue of his natural uprightness; and the feigned goodness—hypocrisy—of the latter cannot justly entitle him to a passport to any heaven. It has been clearly demonstrated that those who bow to no God, and follow no creed, make better husbands and better wives, better fathers, better mothers, and better citizens, than those who bow to what they blindly term man's superior.

The fact admitted that belief in a God is unimportant; that men acknowledging no God, and subscribing to no creed, are good men; that men who worship three gods, yea, numberless gods, and ever follow creed, are vile, bloodthirsty, intolerant, and contemptible. The way is open for the acceptance of the fact that the fewer gods we worship the higher we rank in the scale of true greatness; and the Hindoo who believes that God is one, outranks the Christian who worships the triune God, believing that God consists of three. ### Epitaph for an Irascible Man.

Wm. Scott Campbell was a reputable merchant of Johnstown, N. Y., whose chief, if not only, failing was an irascible temper. Squire Frothingham of the same town had a satirical turn of mind. The merchant died, and a fine monument was erected to his memory, surmounted with a cross. Some friends of Squire Frothingham, in a playful mood, asked him if he could not compose an appropriate epitaph. The squire closed his diminutiv eyes, and improvised as follows:

W. S. Campbell he died, he did,
And here is erected a pyramid
With a cross above, intended to show
That the cross old cuss lies buried below.

The latest conundrum: Why is the Rev. Dr. McGlynn like a stray goose? Answer: Because he didn't follow the propaganda.

Our Roman Catholic Paupers.

The following from the New York Times is of unusual interest just now, when the Catholics are endeavoring to divide the school funds for the benefit of their pauper-breeding religion. It was published in the Times of the 7th ult.:

I hav made a careful compilation of certain statistics showing appropriations under the color of law from the city treasury to a certain group of charitable institutions, which, in my belief, are not quite what they seem to be. While it may be true that these organizations are engaged in taking care of the poor and helpless, I cannot believe that the whole of the very large amounts of money they receive from the state and city is entirely expended for the support of these classes. May not these appropriations account, to an extent, for the unprecedented growth of the papal power in this city? To me they account for the presence in our city of many of their churches and parochial schools.

The statistics referred to are startling as to amounts, instructiv to the taxpayer, and suggestiv to those who are familiar with the history of the Roman hierarchy, and are as follows, viz.:

A statement showing appropriations made by the State and City of New York to charitable institutions under the exclusiv control of the Roman Catholic Church for 12 years, from 1875 to 1886, inclusiv; paid from the Excise fund so far as applicable and balance (deficiency) made up by direct tax inserted each year in the annual levy, and chiefly for the support of children committed by police magistrates:

An examination of these figures will show that the average appropriation for each of the twelve years has been $671,044 04; for every week of those years, $12.904 69, and for each day, $1.843 52. If we divide the appropriation for one day by twenty-eight and one-half, we find that these institutions ought to hav had in their keeping each day during the twelve years 6.468 persons, the appropriations being based upon an allowance of $2 per week or twenty-eight and one-half cents per day for each inmate. If we make the like calculation based upon the appropriation for 1875, the result calls for 4 008 inmates for each day of that year, and in 1886 the appropriations were made upon a basis of 10,144 beneficiaries cared for every day of that year.

If the calculations showing these results are correct, they prove not only a remarkable but a most dangerous growth of pauperism among the Roman Catholics of our city, and these liberal donations of public moneys are chiefly responsible for the enormous increase. So long as these institutions can obtain from the public treasury $2 yer week for the support of each child they can capture, just so long will apparent pauperism continue to grow.

The great profit flowing from these pretended charity operations and accruing to the Roman Catholic church became practically apparent during Tweed's reign, for we find by reference to the list of "institutions" while he was in power (1869 and 1870), five of them came into existence and hav been drawing large sums from the treasury ever since, and from 1877 to 1884 nine more, controled by the same power.

To me, the proposition is almost self-evident that, while there may be much charity work performed by the management of these numerous associations, their business is carried on largely in the interest of making money for the Roman Catholic church; and the appropriations from public moneys, to a considerable extent, go for building churches, parochial schools, or other purposes not contemplated by the law authorizing the appropriations. This particular field of industry has proved so unexpectedly profitable that in a bill now pending before the legislature at Albany the parties in interest hav had a provision inserted extending the authority to commit to these institutions under Roman Catholic control, and others, children up to the age of fourteen—the present law providing only for the committal of those under twelve.

The great question involved growing out of this evil is one of far more importance than the loss of money. It is one of morals, and concerns, not only citizens, but the state as well. In view of the fact, often proved, that the Roman Catholics furnish over eighty per cent of the criminals and paupers of the city of New York, is it wise or sensible as a measure of public policy, having a direct bearing upon the welfare of our local society, that these great amounts of money should be paid to institutions which are conducted with special reference to manufacturing more Roman Catholics, many of whom are likely to become criminals and paupers?

There are thirteen other city charitable associations receiving support from the same source as the above, and organized substantially for the same object, but under nonsectarian Protestant or Jewish control. They receive their per capita allowance for each child from the board of apportionment and under the same law that provides for appropriations to institutions under the charge of Roman Catholics; but in the twelve years included in the above statement they hav drawn from the city only the sum of $4,467,310.33. Of late an often-repeated report has obtained credence, that the Romanists claim one-half of the population of New York as belonging to their faith; this claim being well founded, then they admit, by indirection, that they hav a disproportionate and excessiv percentage of paupers. If we base our calculations upon the amounts appropriated to the two classes of intsitutions, we find that the sixteen under the Catholics hav in the same number of years drawn $6,585,218,15 in excess of all the others. Of course there is no way of accounting for this excess except upon the assumption that it was drawn for the support of pauper children at $2 per head per week.

Papal Absolution.

The form of absolution used by Tetzel, the Dominican monk, was as follows:

May our Lord Jesus Christ hav mercy upon thee and absolve thee by the merits of his most holy passion. And I, by his authority and that of his blessed apostles, Peter and Paul, and of the most holy pope, granted and committed to me in these parts, do absolve thee first from all ecclesiastical censures in whatever manner they hav been incurred, and then from all thy sins, transgressions, and excessess, how enormous soever they may be, even from such as are reserved for the cognizance of the holy see; and as far as the keys of the holy church extend, I remit to you all punishment which you deserve in purgatory on their account; and I restore you to the holy sacraments of the church, to the unity of the faithful, and to that innocence and purity which you possessed at baptism; so that when you die the gates of punishment shall be shut and the gates of the paradise of delight shall be opened; and if you shall die at present this grace shall remain in full force when you are at the point of death. In the name of the father, and of the son, and of the Holy Ghost.

The following tariff of the prices of absolution is copied from a reprint at Rome in the last century:

| | £ | s. | d. |
|---|---|---|---|
| For a layman who shall strike a priest without effusion of blood | | 5 | 0 |
| For one layman who shall kill another | | 3 | 3 |
| For murdering a father, mother, wife, or sister | | 5 | 0 |
| For eating meat in Lent | | 5 | 5 |
| For him who lies with his mother or sister | | 3 | 8 |
| For marrying on those days when the church forbids matrimony | 2 | 0 | 0 |
| For absolution of all crimes | 2 | 16 | 0 |

On confession of any of the foregoing sins and payment of the fee to Father Tetzel or any other duly commissioned priest, the penitent was absolved, so that the gates of purgatory were shut against him and the doors of paradise opened. And yet how many intelligent Protestants and even Freethinkers erroneously believe that the priest does not pretend to pardon sins or remit the penalty. The language addressed to the penitent is, Absolvo te ab omnibus peccatis—"I absolve thee from all thy sins." B.

News and Notes.

I am at Los Angeles again on Sunday, March 27th. All the morning in the pleasant sunshine I drive over the beautiful city with my good friend, John Riggin, who out of the reminiscences of a long and happy life, where Secular philosophy prevailed, could mingle nature and humanity with charming felicity—Los Angeles, the Queen of the Angels, it originally was, but, Yankee-like, the "Queen" has been clipped, and for short it is The Angels, or Los Angeles. It is surrounded by high hills, and from the summits the city can be seen in all its glory, with its brilliant tropical foliage and bloom. Far off against the horizon are the dashing billows of the sea, like a sweeping silvery cloud, while the mountains roll away into the burnished blue, and in the shining valley the city greets the sun like the tiara of a queen, a picture of loveliness set in summer's bosom amid spring's eternal joy and autumn's golden feast.

Sunday evening I lecture on "The New Heaven and Earth." The Liberal element in this city is large, and I find many friends and earnest supporters of the cause. I regret that I cannot remain any longer in southern California, or revisit it again this year. The outlook is most promising. Dr. York has labored effectivly since his return from Australia. In Los Angeles and San Bernardino he has had large audiences and awakened great interest, and he has made my own work most encouraging. A good comrade he is. I met him on Monday at Los Angeles, before I went north, and I was delighted with his genial fellowship and vigorous spirit. He has the gift both of eloquence and action. He knows how to arouse people and make them do their best. He is a logical and powerful speaker, and entertaining also: He can weave wit and fancy with telling argument. He is thoroughly sincere and generous, a manly advocate of liberty. After his Australian tour, where he has won new laurels, he purposes to take a trip East, to that Mecca of Liberalism, Paine Memorial Hall. I bespeak for him a cordial welcome. He will go by way of Salt Lake City, Denver, Kansas City, Burlington, Chicago, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, and New York, and I hope that friends will make all the use possible of his services at every available point of his route. This is a rare opportunity to listen to one of our foremost lecturers. Giv him a noble greeting.

Monday, March 28th, I leave Los Angeles. A goodly company I found there, and I bid farewell with hopes of work together again. The Secular Society organized will undoubtedly maintain its ground. It is hoped that the services of good lecturers can be secured for the next three or four months at least.

This is an important point, and a Liberal speaker could be well sustained every Sunday with an audience of several hundred. J. E. Clark, the agent of THE TRUTH SEEKER, is a live man. He has decided to keep on hand hereafter a supply of Liberal literature, the demand for which is constantly increasing. G. W. Owen is another intelligent worker who has just located here from Santa Cruz, and purposes to devote himself to Liberal affairs. I found him of great assistance in my own labors, and much of their success was the result of his generous aid. No more magnanimous friends could be found than John Riggin, Eugene Riggin, I. M. Vost, and others. C. Severance is well known for his bright and instructiv contributions to Liberal discussion. He has written some excellent articles for the papers here, which hav been widely read. R. C. Glover, L. Litchenberger, T. C. Naramore, G. N. Brubaker, H. Martine, John Baker, Lyman Smith, etc., are wide-awake supporters of the movement.

I enjoyed at Los Angeles the acquaintance of Dr. E. Schreiber, the Jewish rabbi, author of excellent lectures on "The Talmud;" a learned and liberal man, in sympathy with our Freethought movement, and an earnest advocate of the Nine Demands.

I was pleased to meet Mr. and Mrs. John Robinett, of San Jacinto, who came ninety miles to attend the lectures, and who hav done good work in their community for Liberalism and the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I was in hopes to see these friends again and lecture at San Jacinto, San Bernardino, Delmar, etc., but I find that I cannot do this. I must press northward and leave southern California for the bright future, when I shall arrange for a longer stay among these most friendly regions. I find it impossible to fulfil the demand for lectures on this lively coast. There is an inquiry for Remsburg and Jamieson and others, and I hope they will find time to come to this Summer Land, where they will hav a right royal welcome and hosts of admirers.

Tuesday and Wednesday I am at Visalia. This is one of the oldest towns of California, the county seat of Tulare county, about ten miles off the main line, and so it has a cosy and comfortable look, very much like a New England village, with its elegance and refinement. It is in the midst of a beautiful belt of timber, lofty and wide-spreading oaks, that giv the landscape a charming variety. The green fields stretch away beneath the intricate arches. The vast Sierras rise with their snowy tops to the eastward—a dazzling scene—peak glancing over peak with glowing foreheads, around which roll the ever-varying clouds. Here I find a happy resting-place, amid rural felicity, in the hospitable home of Mr. and Mrs. James Evans, with their sister, Mrs. Dora Mitchell, all of whom are earnest Liberals. It was through their efforts that an opening was made for the lecture campaign in Visalia. It was very successful. The largest hall in the place was crowded to its utmost capacity for two nights, and I hav not found in any place a more enthusiastic reception. There are hosts of Freethinkers here—Mr. Alfred Daggett, Mr. Zane Stuben, L. V. Nanscawen, Mr. Grant, Oregon Saunders, Judge Wallace, I. B. Smith, the Messrs. Jacobs, Mr. Chisman, Dick Chatten, J. A. Patterson, Professor Orr, G. A. Botsford, T. J. Conley, Dr. L. R. King, and many others. I was sorry I could not stay longer, but I believe there will be a most flourishing Secular Union established here; in fact, Tulare county would giv a good Freethought lecturer a very Liberal support. The Secular thought is predominant, but it needs the voice and pen to bring it forth and make it effectiv.

Time flies rapidly, and Thursday morning, in the bright sunlight and through the radiant groves, I come to Tulare, a rattling railroad town, that has been burnt down three times, and rises from its ruins more magnificent than ever. I delivered two lectures Thursday and Friday evenings to full houses. I find plenty of Freethinkers. What they need is organization.

Mr. Enos Churchill is our pioneer in Tulare. He has done good work for twenty years. I enjoyed the hospitality of himself and family. I here found Mr. E. Moore, a TRUTH SEEKER subscriber and a pleasant comrade, who keeps our flag floating wherever he goes. I was also generously entertained by Mr. and Mrs. Seymour Johnson, of the Spiritualist ranks, but responsiv to all the humanitarianism of this world. I hav not found more agreeable companions. I also called upon Mr. Mackay, of a somewhat theosophical frame of mind, who has read, I guess, about a million books, and is now ranching it for the benefit of his health in a house built by his own hands. He has much learning, but he carries it with Scotch shrewdness. His mother, seventy-six years of age, came from Scotland to America for the express purpose of converting her son from the errors of Infidelity. She read Ingersoll, and that converted her, and then her highest desire was to see Ingersoll, and it was the happiest moment of her life when she shook hands with our noble champion.

I was pleased also to meet E. M. Dewey, formerly of Massachusetts, a schoolmaster, once the teacher of our good and famous Susan Wixon—somewhere about Cape Cod, I believe—and so from California I send to the Children's Corner the benedictions of this old-time mentor, who carries the flag of freedom still. He has a lovely home out here, and his farm sparkles with fruitfulness.

B. F. Moore, I. T. Bachelder, J. L. Bachelder, E. Newell, W. T. Cartmill, A. Fletcher, C. F. Hall, B. G. Parker—who came twenty miles to hear the lectures—Mr. W. J. Caudson, Mr. McMellen—behind whose fleeting steeds I traversed this splendid valley—W. F. Wood, G. H. Castle, Jr., T. Bacigalupi, and others, make up our Tulare legion, which, I am sure, will ever be found in the front ranks of the grand army.

So far California has been not only a land of promis, but of most encouraging results. I am now on my way to San Francisco and Oakland, and I look forward to pleasant labors until April 10th. April 17th and 24th I shall be at San José, and between these dates at Santa Cruz. I shall be at Stockton May 1st and 8th, at Sacramento May 15th and 22d. I hav decided to go northward by way of Chico, Yreka, Ashland, Talent, Jacksonville, Eugene, Albany, Salem, Portland, Corvallis, Forest Grove, Seattle, Victoria, Port Townsend, New Tacoma, The Dalles, Pendleton, Walla Walla, Union City, Baker City, Emmettsville, etc. Friends in these places will please take notice, and do the best they can for a successful tour. Address communications care of W. F. Freeman, Box 499, Stockton, Cal. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Mr. Reynolds in Michigan.

EATON RAPIDS, March 28th.—The train was behind time at Charlotte, which necessitated hiring a team and enduring a very cold jolt of eleven miles, but I reached Eaton Rapids, cold, hungry, and happy, at 7 P.M., and relieved the anxiety of the friends, who had about decided that there would be a big disappointment. Of course I could not bring my trunk. One of the delights of life on the road is the impossibility of seeing the inside of your trunk for from six to ten days at a time. You see its exterior all you desire while arguing against extra baggage charges and fees for leaving it over at stations. I always retain my "grip," but that is filled with pamphlets and TRUTH SEEKERS, precious freight, all that anyone could reasonably desire for the furnishing and adorning the mind, but not available as underclothes.

Mr. and Mrs. Atwood are the very noblest types of the genuin Liberal, and knowing them I was not surprised to find the "Red Ribbon Hall" (a very large one) filled with the best and most intelligent people of the city. On Tuesday, "Why I Left the Pulpit" had been advertised, and friends came, despite the severe cold, seven, ten, and twelve miles to meet me and hear the "why." After the second lecture I had the pleasure of organizing the Eaton Rapids Liberal Society. Twenty-one signed the membership roll, and the following officers were unanimously elected: President, Wm. Miller; vice-president, Mrs. Lizzie Shaw; secretary, Mrs. Rachel Atwood; treasurer, W. S. Henderson; vigilance committee, Mrs. J. Potter, W. S. Henderson, and A. Atwood; educational committee, O. Elmer, Helen Knapp, and May Atwood; social committee, Homer Potter, Mrs. Kent Wright, and Frank Baker.

The regular weekly meetings until further notice will be held at the house of Mr. and Mrs. Atwood on Sunday afternoons at 3 o'clock. The usual schedule of monthly dues, payable in advance, was adopted. It is proposed to form a joint-stock company and build a suitable Liberal hall. It would certainly prove a very profitable investment, and greatly aid the cause.

The great want of the times is a home secretary, at permanent headquarters, to whom all workers could apply and be sure of prompt response, and who could supply by-laws, leaflets containing duties of officers and committees, order of business, hints and suggestions how best to conduct science schools without a teacher, how best to do propaganda work, and obtain subscribers to Liberal publications. As it is now, I hav to write all this out each time, and while on the road it is impossible to do this satisfactorily. New, young, struggling societies are left to flounder along as best they can, without aid, counsel, or sympathy, to liv or die.

I left Eaton Rapids rejoicing with the many good friends at the bright prospects of the Liberal society, and promising to write out and send them such hints and suggestions as I could.

IONIA.—Wednesday afternoon, March 29th, I arrived at Ionia and was met at the depot by a delegation of whole-souled Liberal gentlemen, who gave me cordial greeting and most hearty welcome. I was taken in the carriage of that stanch disciple of Paine, Dr. Bayard, to view the principal buildings of the city, and was deposited at the Bentley mansion. The friends had engaged the now elegant and capacious hall, formerly the Salvation Army barracks. The building was erected for the Salvationists, but they could not save enough to pay for it; they fizzled out, and the building, thoroughly cleaned, renovated, and beautified, I dedicated by the delivery of three lectures to science and Freethought. I had very large attendance at all three lectures; the interest increased each night.

After my last lecture, "The Trial of Satan," twenty-five enrolled their names as members of the Ionia Liberal Society. I united in the lamentations of the friends that previous engagements prevented my remaining longer, especially that I could not hav remained over Sunday and completed the work of organization. The success of my effort at Ionia was mainly due to the Bentley family. Mr. Wm. Bentley is one of those energetic, thoroughly capable, yet unassuming men, that once enlisted in any enterprise and success is assured. Like Elias H. Gault, of Kalamazoo, he is a shrewd business man, ever genial and jolly, delighted to accommodate and make happy all with whom he has to do; yet he never loses sight of duty and the accomplishment of the work or business in hand. Of course, in such hands I could not help but hav grand success. This was greatly added to by a petite fairy possessing wonderful musical genius (the bride of Charles Bentley, son of friend Wm. Bentley, and worthy son of a noble sire. Charles and his fair bride are both earnest Liberals). Young Mrs. Charles Bentley entranced the audience each night with the wondrous sweetness and power of her voice, as with true poetic feeling she rendered the soul-inspiring sentiments of Liberalism. I had the pleasure of forming acquaintance with many worthy, able, and cultured advocates of Freethought, among them the popular physician, Dr. T. R. Allen. Then, as ever, "learn to love only to leave." Stern duty demands on, on, on, to other fields.

Mr. and Mrs. Webster, of Belding, hav arranged for me some eight lectures in their vicinity, and when these are filled I must turn my face east and journey toward the Jersey jail. So mote it be.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

The Liberal Club.

Is the weather rough and wintry—cold enough to make you swear? Wait until you get to sheol; you will find it warmer there?

Comforting himself with the promis outlined in these words, a man wearing a ten-dollar badge-pin with a diamond in it went blithely up Third avenue the other night to a meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club. At that time he did not know that spring was so close aboard, as Captain Clark would say it, and that ere another ten days had passed the young man would be taking account of stock with a view to selecting his summer girl. At the door of the hall, when it was reached, he laid down a new five-cent piece, which was absorbed with alacrity by Treasurer Morris, and as he did so he reflected on how much better it was thus to appropriate that sum than to spend it for lager beer. At the same time he kept another five-cent piece where he could get hold of it handily if he should change his mind.

The speaker of the evening was Mrs. Clara Neymann, who had taken it in hand to point out the "Dangers Ahead." In introducing the lady, Mr. Wakeman said he hoped the audience would behave as well as it could afford to while she was speaking.

Mrs. Neymann wore a handsome rose, and spoke with just enough accent to suggest the Faderland. It appeared from the lecture that the danger ahead is the utter obliteration of our institutions which must result from exclusiv male suffrage. Women demand the suffrage and may be driven to the alternativ of joining the labor party for the accomplishment of that purpose. Women must vote or the republic must go. Mrs. Neymann's lecture lasted a little more than an hour, and contained many arguments in favor of extending the ballot to women.

The Chair gave notice that Leander Thompson would speak at the next meeting on "The Scum of Society." Mr. Thompson probably did not choose his subject with the Liberal Club's members in mind, because they are the élite of the city. The Chair added that the floor was now open for discussion of the lecture, in speeches of ten minutes each. Mr. Wakeman advised the critics not to attempt to elaborate more than one or two points during that limited period. The last man who tried to crowd a lecture into ten minutes did not make a success of it.

After a very long delay, Mr. Flynn went forward in one aisle and Mrs. Leonard in the other. Mrs. Leonard gave way. She said she was only going to take the platform to apologize for the backwardness of the men.

Mr. Flynn announced that he was one of those unpopular individuals who didn't believe in woman suffrage.

Mrs. Britton (from the audience): "Aha! a fossil!"

The Chair: "Order! Don't be surprised at anything you hear now."

Mr. Flynn proceeded to say that politics was outside the domain of women. If women had a domain of their own, it wouldn't be proper for men to encroach upon it. Women can accomplish as much without the ballot as with it. Female suffrage is only a sentimental idea, and the women care more for the means than for the end.

Lawyer Searing was the next speaker. He did not relish the idea of lecturers coming down from the Nineteenth Century Club to instruct the plain, common-sense people of the Labor party and the Liberal Club. The lecturer had said that it might be necessary for the woman suffragists to join the working people, thus implying that she hoped for better things. Mr. Searing doubted the earnestness and honesty of the lecturer and her class. If they thought they could gain their end by joining the Labor party, why didn't they do so at once, instead of reserving that as a last resort? The trouble was they preferred to agitate in a cultured and ornamental manner rather than get down to the hard work and practical methods by which alone their legal disabilities could be removed. Mr. Searing spoke with unusual animation.

Lawyer Levi said that Mr. Searing had illustrated what lawyers called the suppressio veri, suggestio falsi. The reason women want the ballot is because disfranchisment is degradation, and they feel it as keenly as the slaves of the South felt their bondage. Woman suffrage would find its strongest supporters among working women and workingmen's wives, because they know best where the shoe pinches. They cannot compete with men in the labor market, but they know that by means of the ballot they can effect legislation which will help them.

Mrs. Leonard hinted that Mr. Flynn had broken prematurely from the restraint of the maternal apron strings. He would better go back.

Dr. Weeks didn't especially believe in woman's rights. He believed in human rights, which included the rights of women. A visitor who went away at the beginning of Dr. Weeks's remarks said to the writer that by a curious coincidence, Dr. Weeks always commenced speaking at about the time he, the visitor, felt like going home.

Lawyer Chamberlain noted that the fact that the Declaration of Independence was not universally understood had been shown by Mr. Flynn, who had spoken of giving women their rights, as though men had the rights of women in charge, and as though that could be given which is inalienable. Mr. Chamberlain further said that the lower strata of society must be reached and fructified before the idea of universal suffrage would bear fruit.

Mrs. Hallock was glad the enemies were no stronger. Mr. Searing, she thought, had shown too much excitement for a judicial mind. Mrs. Hallock was interrupted by a man, evidently drunk, who in a loud voice demanded to know how Salisbury and Parnell stood upon the Labor question. The Chair warned him that his action was wholly without precedent, and that if he did not come to order the second secretary would put him out. The second secretary, though a man of peace, was very happy over the prospect of an opportunity to oblige the Chair, and laid down his pencil, but the man lacked the public spirit to continue the disturbance, and with a deep sigh the disappointed secretary resumed his official duties. This is the first time a drunk and disorderly person has invaded the club during the present writer's four years' regular attendance.

Mrs. Neymann closed the discussion. From which great profit was derived, the speakers being fair and learned; and when the proper time arrived, the meeting was declared adjourned.

The next meeting, which the writer unavoidably missed, was addressed by Leander Thompson, who dealt with the "Scum of Society" in an able manner. The Hon. Dennis McMahon succeeds on the "Illusions of Legislation."

The all-absorbing topic of conversation at the club is the resignation of President Wakeman, against which a petition of protest is being circulated and numerously signed. On the last of the month Mr. Wakeman will make a speech, in which it is expected that he will reveal the causes which impel him to the separation.

English as She is Spelled.

In a house with a white door knob,
Was a man who came there to krob,
But he left for the West
With a hole in his vest,
Where reside his companions, who ksob.

That householder had plenty of phlegm—
Too much, say those burglars, for phthegm.
Pistol-practice at night
They declare is not right
Just to save from a thief a small phgegm.

And who is to say they are wrong—
These knights of the road and of wsong?—
For our days here below
Are so brief, you must know,
And our stay "over there" will be wlong.

"I hav sent this most gallant of knights
Where jewels and gems are by krights
Used for ceiling and floor,
And not purchased with goor,"
Said the householder, after the kfight.

Now, the "spirits" report once again
That "he says that an old setting hain
Would not peck at large pearls"
Where his wings he unfearls
And flies through the sky like a wrain.

You Fight, and I'll Pray.

Grant Thorburn, the calumniator of Thomas Paine, was a puny Scotchman. He used to visit his nativ country, and on one of the return voyages the captain called on the passengers to help him quell a mutiny. Thorburn turned to a fellow-passenger of large stature and said, "You help the captain, and I will go down in the cabin and pray." The mutiny was quelled, and on the arrival of the vessel at New York an account of it was published in the newspapers, in which the successful result was attributed to the powerful efforts of Grant Thorburn!

John E. Remsburg at the Grave of His Child.

MY FRIENDS: Custom decrees that at the grave a word be spoken, and struggling against the pangs of this deep woe, I hav summoned courage to perform the task. I shall be brief. for in an hour like this words at their best are little more than mockery—sound as hollow as the clods that soon will fall upon this little casket.

It seems doubly sad that on the first day of spring, just as the flowers are getting ready to bud and blossom, our tiny bud should droop and die. Yet here he lies—withered and dead.

On Tuesday evening, while many miles away, a letter reached me stating that our pretty babe was sick, and very sick. But it had been written four days before, and as the wires brought no fresh tidings I believed that he was better. Yesterday morning I was seated at a table penning a word of cheer to his dear mother, telling her that in a week I would be at home again. The thought filled me with joy, and in a dream of fancy I saw our darling running to meet me at the door, ready to climb into my arms, when on the wings of lightning came with staggering force the cruel message—"Gene is dead!"

It is ever so--when least expecting it we stand face to face with Death. At dawn, at mid-day, as well as at life's eve, he comes. His icy fingers dally with youth's golden curls as oft as with the silver locks of age. The patriarch lies down in his last sleep; with bleeding hearts, beside his shriveled corpse we place the dimpled babe, and then, anon, blinded with scalding tears, bend over the mute form of a companion fallen in the very noon of life. All hav witnessed this grim monarch's work—hav felt the bitterness his presence brings. Our sad experience to-day was, yesterday, your own. Within these gates you, too, hav stood as mourners—hav been called upon to deposit on this sunny slope some loved one. I need not tell you that in your hours of grief you had our unfeigned sympathy. I know that we receive yours now, and this will make the burden of our sorrow less.

. . . . . .

Dear Gene, less than a month ago, upon that cheek, then warm with life, I pressed a parent's loving kiss, and said, Good-bye. And now, upon the cold and pallid lips of my dead child I print a last fond kiss and say, Farewell!

Lectures and Meetings.

THE New York State Woman Suffrage Association will hold its annual convention in this city at the Masonic Temple, corner Twenty-third street and Sixth avenue, Thursday and Friday, April 21st and 22d. The public sessions are at 2 and 8 P.M. The convention will be addressed by Matilda Joslyn Gage, Mary Seymour Howell, Caroline Gilkey Rogers, Marguerite Moore, Annie Jenness Miller, Isabella Beecher Hooker, Clara Neymann, Kate Palmer Stearns, Rev. Amanda Deyo, Lillie Devereaux Blake, and others. The admission is free.

J. E. REMSBURG is lecturing to crowded houses in Kansas. In three weeks he delivered twenty-five lectures, speaking in Twin Mound, Heberling's, Burlingame, Fall River, Leon, Andover, Benton, Geuda Springs, Cedar Vale, Mound City, Max, Humboldt, Burlington, and Garnett. He has thirty lectures yet to deliver, as follows:

|---|---|
| Marysville | Sat., Sun., Apr. 16, 17. |
| Haddam | Mon., 18. |
| Concordia | Tues., 19. |
| Downs | Wed., Fri., 20, 22. |
| Logan | Thur., 21. |
| Motor | Sat., Sun., 23, 24. |
| Bavaria | Mon., 25. |
| New Cambria | Tues., 26. |
| Dunlap | Wed., 27. |

| Leon | Mon., Tues., Wed., Thurs., 2, 3, 4, 5. |
| Fredonia | Fri., 6. |
| Sycamore Station | Sat., 7. |
| Neodosha | Sun., 8. |

After his work in Kansas is completed, Mr. Remsburg will return to Illinois.

Business Notes.

ATTENTION is called to the advertisment elsewhere of W. F. Jamieson's Minnesota farm, which he offers for sale.

THE TRUTH SEEKER can be purchased by residents of Grand Rapids, Mich., at 138 South Division street, from Mr. Charles Sach.

THE sixth edition of Helen H. Gardener's "Men, Women, and Gods" is now in press, and will shortly be ready for sale. This edition will be embellished with a new portrait of the writer, which of itself is a thing of beauty and joy forever, because it's just like her. Writing praises of the book, however, is painting a lily, and we accept the best that has been said of it and, like the man who pasted his prayer over his bed, say, "Lord, them's my sentiments."

A Solid Argument for Christ.

From the Milwaukee Sentinel.

OCONOMOWOC, April 1.—E F. Ring, of Starta, an ex-preacher, but now a Freethought lecturer, yesterday offered one of his printed lectures for sale in the store occupied by Joel A. Woodruff and Andrew McKee, in this city, and was ejected from the store by them. Mr. Ring is an aged man, and the father of ex-Senator Ring.

Miracles and Miracle Workers.

Bible miracles are too much of the hocus-pocus kind to really demand serious attention. Everyone will admit that a greater miracle can scarcely be conceived than turning all the waters of a great country into blood. Yet if magicians with their enchantments could perform this wonderful miracle, it will be easy enough to account for the lesser ones.

I do not believe that a scientist can be found in the whole land who believes that the waters of Egypt were turned into blood. And if it is true that no such phenomenon ever occurred, then it has no better foundation than a lie to rest upon. When the world shall have entirely outgrown its childhood, it will be found that all miracles can be accounted for by ignorance, imposture, fraud, deception, or lies.

Many of the so-called miracles are no miracles at all. There is no miracle in curing the sick or healing the lame, deaf, or blind. But it would be a miracle for children to be thrown into a furnace and come out uninjured by fire. Fire destroyed animal tissues three thousand years ago just as it does to-day. Men could lie three thousand years ago as well as they can to-day; and if all would stop to consider how much easier it is to believe that men can lie or be deceived than it is to believe that a law of nature can be violated, there would be an end to the miracle mystery.

Turning water into wine is too silly to talk about as a miracle. It would only be a clever deception for the deft hands of a trickster. I have seen and tasted all kinds of liquors poured from one bottle.

In one of the rejected gospels it is stated that John was thrown into a caldron of boiling oil in Rome. No Christian is asked to believe this unbelievable statement. But if he should express a doubt that certain men were taken up into the air, or that certain other men jumped out of their graves, he would not only incur the displeasure of the church, but the danger of that brimstone country "prepared for the devil and his angels."

But if these stories had been voted out, and the story about John and the boiling oil had been voted in, then that would have been the story which the Christian would have believed. And right here let me state, once for all, that there is not a single statement—including all the miracles—not a single chapter or sentence of the New Testament which has anything more solid for a foundation than the votes of uninspired, fallible men, and some of them very bad men too.

In the discussion of this subject, it seems eminently fitting that the Gospel of the Infancy should receive particular notice.

I want the Christian to know more fully about the stories which were afloat in regard to the miracles of Jesus.

According to this gospel, Jesus spoke to his mother while lying in the cradle, and said, "I am Jesus, the son of God."

When the wise men of the East returned, they took a swaddling-cloth which could not be burnt by fire.

Idols fell down in his presence. Devils were cast out from those who touched his swaddling-clothes. The dumb recovered their speech by taking Jesus in their arms.

Leprosy was cured by sprinkling with water in which Jesus had been washed.

A man was turned to a mule, and then restored back to manhood by placing Jesus on the mule's back.

A sick boy whom Jesus healed was thrown into a hot oven, and was found laughing. He was afterward thrown into a well, and sat upon the water.

When Judas Iscariot was a boy he had a devil which made him bite every one. He sat down by Jesus and struck him, and Satan ran away like a mad dog.

When Jesus was seven years old he made oxen and asses out of birds, and commanded them to walk, and they did.

He also made sparrows which flew away.

When playing with other boys he threw clothes into a dyer's furnace (pretty business for a God), and they were taken out the color desired.

Joseph, the father of Jesus, made a throne for the king of Jerusalem. When done it was a span too short. Jesus took hold on one side and his father on the other, and pulled, and the throne came to the right dimension.

(If Joseph was his father and the Holy Ghost was his father also, Jesus must have been a sort of hybrid, part Holy Ghost and part human.)

Jesus turned some boys into kids and then turned them back to boys again. (Wonder if they ate grass like Nebuchadnezzar?)

He cured the bite of poisonous insects.

A boy fell from a house and was killed. Jesus was accused of pushing him off. Jesus stood over the dead boy and said, "Who pushed thee off?" The dead boy answered, "Thou didst not."

Jesus was making fish pools with other boys (had God nothing of more importance on hand than playing in the mud with other Mugwumps?) and a Jew boy came along and destroyed the pools of the other boys, but when he came to the pool which Jesus made the water vanished. Jesus said, "In like manner shall thy life vanish," and immediately the boy died.

A boy ran against Jesus and threw him down, and Jesus said, "So shalt thou fall and never rise;" that moment the boy fell down dead.

When a boy he was sent to school (why send God to school? he must have known everything), and the teacher attempted to whip him, but his hand withered and he died.

Even in his boyhood days he understood philosophy, could teach astronomy (why did he not know that the earth was not flat?), physics, the powers of the body, the number of its members, the bones, arteries, veins, and nerves, how the soul operates on the body, etc.

This wonderful gospel winds up in this wonderful way: "The whole of the gospel of the infancy, by the assistance of the supreme God, according to what we find in the original."

If the "supreme God" assisted in writing this gospel, why revise or alter it? Did some pious crank think he could beat God in writing a gospel? Why not give us the "original gospel," and not one "according to it?" The one who wrote the "original" should not only have been inspired, but the one who made the alterations, and those who voted to determine which of these gospels were the word of God, and even those who read them, so as to insure a right understanding of what is written, and thus preclude the idea of any mistake.

This gospel lifts the veil and shows not only how one gospel was taken from another, but the workings of designing men in an age when every man of any consideration was writing gospels or working miracles; also how, in an age of superstition, impostors had almost unlimited opportunity to deceive the people.

If the miracles of Jesus as recorded in the "Gospel of the Infancy" are true, is there not an awful responsibility resting upon somebody on account of their not being found in the New Testament? If they are lies, might not the object which induced somebody to lie about them have induced others to lie about those recorded in the New Testament?

Every system of supernatural religion with which I am acquainted has its marvels and miracles. Did God have a hand in working them all? If not, did he have to do with any of them? Remember the miraculous is the impossible. Anything within the realm of the possible is no miracle. JOHN PECK.

Pure Pessimism.

Far better, far better is death than a life
Of wretched, unceasing, and harrowing strife
With the world, for merely a living;
Far better to shuffle this life of care,
With its grinding, withering wear and tear,
Burdens too heavy for mortals to bear,
Than wrestle with fate and her giving.

Life is no blessing, but really a curse,
With fate ever ready its ills to disburse,
And happy the day when rumbles the hearse,
One's corse to the resting-place bearing;
Far better the iron embrace of death,
Than the ceaseless struggle in life for breath,
'Mid the cries of millions despairing.

Of the countless myriads passed away,
Of the legions living on earth to-day,
Who asked for this life with its tasking?
Not one of the host in eternity's fold,
Not one of the living, the timid, or bold,
Not one of the millions and billions all told—
'Twas thrust upon all without asking.

Far better the grave than this life on earth,
With its ceaseless troubles and fleeting mirth;
Far better we never had known the birth
To life, with its miseries certain!
The sleep in the grave is the sleep of peace,
There troubles and sorrows forever will cease,
With never a rise of the curtain.

Napoleon Bonaparte's Skepticism.

Some of Napoleon Bonaparte's biographers hav represented him as almost, if not quite, a believer in the divinity of Jesus Christ. But here is something quite contrary to that, and it is well authenticated. It is found in a monthly publication called the Theophilanthropist, No. 4, April, 1810:

As to Bonaparte's religion, when among the Mohammedans in Egypt, he declared himself a true Mussulman, and on his return to France, and assuming the government, being reproached by Mr. Dupuis (author of the celebrated work entitled, "The Origin of All Religious Worship") for reinstating the Catholic religion, he said that "as for himself he did not believe that such a person as Jesus Christ ever existed; but as the people were inclined to superstition, he thought proper not to oppose them." This fact Mr. Dupuis related to Thomas Paine and Chancellor Livingston, then minister of the United States at Paris [1801–1805], as the former informed the writer of this note.

Mrs. Colman's Reminiscences.

In a little town not far from Ypsilanti there occurred a circumstance among the Baptists, of which I was not the hero, but as I spoke in the church some months later, it will not be trespassing to relate it. This place was the home of our Infidel friend, Henry De Garmo. He had in his employ a fugitiv slave, a very black man, large and good-looking. His wife was also of the same style, very dark, and the children—seven in number—were ditto. The negro was a very pious Baptist, always attended church, and paid as much as he could afford in support of the minister, but his place was always in the negro pew. Mr. De Garmo used to ask if he expected to occupy a pen in heaven, telling him that his brethren cared nothing for him, only that he was a good paying member. This Jimmie as he was called, denied, asserting that they were "all one in Christ Jesus." At length a new church was to be built, and Jimmie, when he had a day that could be spared from his regular work, helped about the new building with right good will, and in process of time the house was completed and dedicated, and the day appointed for the sale of the pews. Mr. De Garmo said: "Wouldn't you like to buy a pew? It's hardly respectable not to own a pew, such a faithful Baptist as you are. Go and bid off the best pew in the broad aisle, and I will find the money to pay for it. You may bid as high as one hundred and fifty dollars, but be sure you get the best seat." So Jimmie, with that amount of money in his purse, bid off "the upper seat in the synagog"—I think be paid one hundred and thirty dollars. Of course his white brethren were glad to sell him the pew, as now some of them could rent it at a reasonable price. Our friend who had supplied the money saw to it that the wife and all the seven children were in good trim for church on the Sunday following—hats and shoes for the children, a new bonnet and shawl for the wife, and all sent to church in proper order. Instead of taking the negro pew, Mr. Jimmie walked up the aisle, followed by his entire family—nine, all told. The consternation was as dreadful as though the dark cloud had been a Western cyclone. The sexton went to the pew, and told the owner that he must leave that seat and take his family and go further back, but the black owner of the pew refused to be disturbed. He had bought the pew and paid for it, and he should occupy it. The services were hurried through, and then the minister, with the leading members, held a consultation, and, as nothing else seemed to hav any effect upon Mr. Jimmie, the minister told him if he persisted in occupying that seat it would prove him not a Christian, as one of the requisits of a Christian was humility, and he was wickedly proud. The negro and his family left the church, fully convinced that that church was a sham, and that for the future they would worship outside the Baptist church.

I went to Battle Creek and vicinity, but everywhere Spiritualism was in the ascendant, and no one cared for the slave.

There is in one of the state prisons of Michigan to-day a woman who, the year following the time of which I am writing, was put there for life for the crime of murder, she having, at the command of spirits, through an unprincipled man, a medium, sent some one to heaven. This woman belongs to a highly respectable family in central New York. She was always respectable, but a little "queer." She lived with her husband on a small farm in Michigan, and when she became a widow had three children. I called on her, and had I been asked to describe her, should hav said she was an ignorant, superstitious woman, expecting a good deal of help from the spirit of her husband, but was trying to support her children. Poor woman! she was surely insane—and for that she wears the prisoner's garb, and has been all these many years shut away from the world. Is insanity a crime?

I do not remember that we were (I had now joined another agent) violently assailed in Michigan, but in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois we were in constant jeopardy. The spirit of slavery was as strong on the north as on the south side of the Ohio river. At some places pepper or tobacco would be put upon the stove, the perpetrators of the insult having fastened first all the windows, so that it was impossible to move them. Our carriage would be robbed of one wheel, or the harness cut. Sometimes the horse would be shorn of mane or tail, and the carriage filled with night-soil or addled eggs; but such things were as nothing to an assault upon us individually. A mob of infuriated men can be compared to nothing but themselvs. Stones, brickbats, and rotten eggs are the weapons, and a tar kettle and bag of feathers was the most to be dreaded. I fortunately escaped the last, though I hav smelled the tar and seen the bag containing the feathers. And who do you suppose were the leaders in these riots? Always ministers and leaders of the Republican party. Do you not see the logic of this fact? We showed conclusivly that "the American church was the bulwark of slavery;" that the holding of slaves was never a hindrance to church fellowship, but Abolition was often a cause of disfellowship, and the new political party was not fond of being told that it was the power that held in bondage four millions of men, women, and children. The Fugitiv Slave law was at this time in full operation, and the officers of the law, whether of one party or the other, were required to act; and we were not slow in giving them the name appropriate to their business—bloodhounds of and for the South. A curious little incident, which, without much meaning, made a good laugh, I am tempted to relate.

Theodore Parker was speaking to a large and enthusiastic audience in the city of Rochester, a short time after the passage of this law by Congress. Mr. Parker drew from his pocket a large handbill advertising a runaway negro, the negro represented by a grotesque figure, and, written upon the bill, some insulting language addressed to Mr. Parker. As the bill was held up before the audience with the words, "We of the North are commanded to become bloodhounds," a large dog, lying just in front of the desk, arose and howled forth his indignation. He seemed furious, but Mr. Parker, in an appeasing voice, said, "No, no; not a respectable four-legged dog like you, 'tis the two-legged ones that are meant." The dog whined out his approval and became quiet, but the audience was some time in regaining its composure.

We had an antislavery dog in Salem, Ohio, who made his home in the office of the Antislavery Bugle. No one knew where he came from, but he was persistent, and when an agent was sent out into some new field, the dog would go also; and when such agent was settled in a friendly home, the dog would return to Salem. And the dog has more than once been my traveling companion. I know not what became of him; perhaps he lived to be emancipated from his work when the slaves were no longer chattels, but, like many a hero of those days, his worth is more likely forgotten.

The Signs.

Has our day one statesman like Henry of 1776, who had "but one lamp, experience, to guide his footsteps?" Before every great revolution its cause, its object, its results, may be read in the conduct of peoples. Before ours of 1776 protests to the British throne, resolutions of colonial assemblies, conventions of the thirteen in union, militia organizations, were the order of the time, foreshadowing resistance, state and general government formations, war. Before the terrible French Revolution, frightful debasement of the masses, cries for bread, new theories of human rights, general disorganization of even village society, separation of orders, general alarm, deep hate by each class against all above it, typified the universal chaos, bloodshed, and terror advancing. Before our late war, sectional discord, the rapid snapping of those bonds of social union between North and South, churches, societies, resolving themselvs into churches or societies North and South; bitter crimnation and recrimnation, struggles between colonies of North and South in Kansas, were prophetic of dissolution and sectional war. To-day are no protests against governments; no sectional hates, no snapping of bonds, are heard or seen. Yet there is a general ferment, a common hatred of monopolies, strikes, combinations of millions of men into unions and orders that are despotic, absolute; contempt of state and national legislatures, bloody riots here and there, hunger, suffering among millions, appeals of threatened powers to government for protection. Can ye not read the signs of the times, O blind, besotted statute makers (not law makers)? The people are courting a responsible representativ ruler, ready to trample to death several hundred irresponsible pretended servants—bribe-takers. What means this union and blind obedience to secret heads, heads that owe a fearful responsibility to the masses, heads whose only rivals are the rich and great citizens, whose sole reliance are the love and confidence of the millions? These signs foretell revolution and overthrow of Plutarchs, and all the humbug of much governing, irresponsible place-holders, blood-sucking leeches, and rest under the people's rule through one responsible head.

Would we could see a recurrence to and respect for state government in the signs! The abolition of the pretended revenue laws, and the building by general government of two great transcontinental railway lines, with double tracks, north and south, east and west, to intersect at the center, with numbers of feeders from all points to points along the lines, to be operated by government at cost (best, perhaps, to be done by states), would in one year place this people where they were in 1850, with the added blessing of slavery annihilated. Like oil upon the raging waters, these things would quiet the wrecking waves. But alas! where is the man in power who has the remotest idea that these troubles in a sparsely-settled republic, where are countless millions of new, rich, cheap lands, are the result of a foolish statute or two? As I heard a man of common-sense—of almighty common-sense, too—say, "Such little causes could not make such great effects;" and he is a fair representativ of our shallow college educations, that breed, not Ben Franklins, not Patrick Henrys, but mouthing politicians, blind leaders of the blind, tumbling into abysms of horror. Lessons of history no more known than as if they never were. No, "they don't apply to this great American people!" American human nature is not like other; American political economy is unlike European. Our multiplication table should be altered, as it differs from that of the effete despotisms, and, indeed, of our forefathers.

The Dictionary and the Bible.

There are two books that the student and thinker hav studied, referred to, and used perhaps more than any other two volumes the world has yet produced. These are the Dictionary and the Bible.

For long ages the Bible has been loved, revered, hated, and despised, according as the acceptance or rejection of its doctrins hav had an influence upon its readers. But the Dictionary has always held a steady and respectable position in all minds that hav recognized its importance. The Bible has stood still, and its believers hav taken a pride in proclaiming its unchangeableness and permanency.

Yesterday, to-day, and forever, it must remain the same. To alter, change, or take from it was one of the unpardonable sins, for is it not the word of God? Is it not perfect beyond all books man ever made or could make? So it has gone on, reprint after reprint, perpetuating all the old absurdities, crudities, and imperfections of a barbarous and unlearned past, binding them upon a higher civilization, and thus chaining the whole race to an effete, degrading, debasing code of morals that perpetuates wars, hangings, murders, thefts, falsehoods, and all manner of evils. Mormonism, Shakerism, Spiritualism, Catholicism, and even cannibalism, are all enabled to find authority for their creeds and mistakes in this old compilation of antiquities.

Now, the Dictionary is just the reverse of the Bible. Carefully compiled at the very first, and revised, improved, and perfected in each new reprint, its admirers and patrons one and all doing their very best to keep it well up with the improvements of the age, and extirpating from it the smallest and tiniest error that is discernible by the best scholar or philologist.

To-day we find the Dictionary consulted by our thinkers and scholars ten times where the Bible is once opened by them.

There is no trouble in defining or pronouncing a word according to Webster, but attempt to define the meaning of certain texts of scripture, and what a muddle you are in!

Pious people proclaim the great age of the Bible as proof of its divinity and value, but if we take this as a standard, the Dictionary will far outrival it, for ever since there hav been books there hav been other books explanatory of the language and terms used in them. Glossaries at the end of scientific works are still in vogue.

I pronounce the Dictionary to be really the book of all books, and one which no other book will ever supersede.

All hail to the glorious old Dictionary!

Book Censorship in Australia.

From the Melbourne Harbinger of Light.

The Age of the 24th ult. contains an able leading article on the espionage and censorship of the Customs officials on imported literature, having especial reference to the recent detention of Emile Zola's works by a landing-waiter of the department. In condemning this interference with trade and the tastes of the public by petty officers, the Age says:

There is great danger in starting an Index Expurgatorius, as, once initiated, there would be difficulty in defining its limits. Faith is considered by most people as important as morals, and our amateur censors would hav a fine hunting-ground open for them in the domain of Freethought. The example set in the Customs would be followed by other government officials, and the importers of certain descriptions of anti-theological literature would hav a hard time of it. We can imagin the joy with which orthodox officers would pounce upon Hume's "Essays," or a volume of Voltaire. Herbert Spencer's works would be fair game. Huxley would be open to confiscation, and Darwin be turned over to condemnation. Books to be found in every enlightened clergyman's library might hardly pass the keen-eyed scrutiny of our new inquisitors, once fairly put upon the scent. Bishop Colenso's calculations could be made short work of, for how would the ordinary reader retain his faith in Noah after the holding capacity of the Ark had been shown to be utterly unequal to the cargo prepared for it; and might not his reverence for the Jews be disturbed when it was demonstrated to him that they were not nearly so numerous as the record affirmed? Even such a harmless volume as "Essays and Reviews," to which churchmen, who hav become bishops, contributed, would, in its day, hav been ruthlessly expurgated by Victorian vigilance. A mass of crude heresy like "Religion without Superstition" would hav no quarter given to it; and if the acts of these heresy hunters were appealed against, might not one of our legal dignitaries find himself placed in the embarrassing position of having to decide on the right to existence of the offspring of his own fertil but erratic brain? The prospect opened out by the establishment of a censorship of literature in our midst is too appalling, and it is well that the attempt should be thwarted at the start. In faith and in morals both, the best judges for regulating the people's choice of study are the people themselvs, and we doubt if they could be much helped in this work of selection by the whole staff of landing-waiters.

Our contemporary is not aware that what he suggests as probable has been going on for some time past, and that scarcely a case of assorted literature consigned to the proprietor of this paper has passed through the Customs for many months past without detention, and examination, and submission of selected books to the higher officials in the hope of getting them condemned as blasphemous. Only a few weeks since a case of books from Colby & Rich, of Boston, was detained till the landing-waiter could examin "Jesus of Nazareth," by Alexander Smyth, and "Jehovah Unveiled," and "Letter to the Bishop of Llandaff," by Paine.

In August last, our mail parcel of periodicals was detained for ten days because a case from the Progressiv Publishing Company was included in the same bill of lading, in which some old copies of the Freethinker had been used for padding to fill up a little space on the top. The heretical nature of these apparently shocked the sensitiv and highly moral landing-waiter, who sent the case immediately to the queen's warehouse. Through neglect of the company referred to we had no advices of this case, so applied for the delivery of the parcel of periodicals, of which we were in urgent need, letting the other remain sub judice; to our astonishment, however, we were informed by the landing-waiter's superior officer that in the event of the objection to the one case being sustained, the whole of the bill of lading was liable to confiscation. The commissioner of Customs, however, would not sustain this interpretation, and, after much worry and loss of time, we were allowed to get the periodicals, and to inspect the other case which we could not at the time identify as fitting with any recent orders. The only possible objection to its contents would be a theological one, as the works were principally Paine's and Ingersoll's, the remainder being of the same class. When some advices and an invoice reached us about a fortnight after, we made a formal claim for the case, but found it and the whole of its contents had been destroyed—to the delight, no doubt, of the religious landing-waiter and his orthodox friends.

It was, doubtless, this officious individual who some twelve months since made a fool of the Age, and caused them to publish the scandalous libel on the proprietor of this journal in reference to the case of books imported by him from the Truth Seeker Company of New York, and the countenance then given to him has encouraged him in his vexatious interference with our importations, and enabled him to giv us a great amount of trouble, besides subjecting us to a monetary loss of nearly £40. The higher authorities of the department hav shirked the responsibility of interfering with their subordinate, passing the responsibility over to the law officers of the crown; but it is to be hoped that now the daily press has called attention to the subject, some steps will be taken to check the officiousness of this self-constituted moral and religious censor before his example is followed by his confrères.

A Shivering World.

The last startling novelty, in the way of surprise, which scientists hav invented, is a machine for measuring the shiverings of the world, and thus another belief of our innocent youth has been remorselessly shattered.

Instead of the world being a great, big, burly, robust sphere—a mammoth cricket-ball swung off through space from the bat of Time in one huge, compact, dense mass—the earth is a sort of jelly-fish imposture.

Its skin of soil—like a plate of blanc-mange in the hands of a gentleman who loves Bacchus not wisely but too well—shakes incessantly. The earth, in fact, has got the ague, and nobody yet knows the cause.

So gingerly susceptible, too, is the world to motion, that if a man, standing firmly planted on a gravel bed, upon both feet, only places his weight first on one leg and then on the other, taking care not to stir his pedal extremities, he causes a perceptible vibration through a radius of thirty-two feet.

Some days the earth is, comparativly speaking, quiet. It does not shiver so much. Suddenly the fit comes on again, and it shakes away as if it had got cold in its very bones.

So far, therefore, from there being any wonder when the shivering gets worse, as in the case of an earthquake, that buildings fall down, the marvel is that they stand up at all.

In the course of a few decades, when science becomes more advanced, we may learn that the streets and edifices, which we deem to be fixtures, are tearing round at the rate of a million or so of miles a minute, and that all that we deem to be materialized solids is imperceptible gas—ourselvs among the number.—Ex.

The Nuisance of Good Friday.

A week ago yesterday was called Good Friday. It is alleged to hav been the anniversary of the punishment of a seditious Jew put to death on the cross by a Roman governor to appease the Jewish churchmen who accused him of blasphemy in attempting to overthrow the Mosaic laws and subvert the true faith. Upon the supposed sayings and doings of this young man has been founded a religion, called Christianity.

Unhappily this religion is believed in by a majority of the people of this country. It used to be believed to such an extent that its influence was felt in all the laws of the land. In New York, now, there are enough Christians to modify the action of many public bodies, and to interfere with the pursuits of all citizens. The public schools of the city are closed, the legislature adjourns, the Stock Exchange shuts its doors, the Produce, Maritime, and the Petroleum exchanges follow suit, and business "down town" is practically suspended.

There are, however, a good many Infidels in New York, and this public recognition of the day is an outrage upon their rights. Take, for instance, the closing of the public schools. Friday there was no school because Jesus is said to hav been crucified; Monday was kept because it follows the Sunday when he is said to hav risen; Tuesday, because the teachers desired a day to recover from the effects of piety taken not wisely but in too great quantities. Here are three days wasted for no earthly reason but that the Christian religion may be emphasized.

As one, and in behalf of all the other Infidel citizens of the town, we protest. Good Friday is nothing to us. Easter Monday is nothing, and as for the "Tuesday after Easter," we hav no respect for the day, and very little for the school authorities who force the children to observe it. Why must we help pay for schools that are closed, and contribute to the salaries of teachers who do not teach? Do not teach, did we say? Aye, but they do teach, and they teach falsehood. The closing of the school does more to instil into the minds of the children the poison of superstition than any words that the teacher could utter. Children must know the reason for the holiday so welcome to the rogues, and they are not apt to forget the day which allows them to play instead of study. With such rewards in view, they learn rapidly and remember well. But to the parent who desires to keep the mind of his child free till such time as the youngster shall develop common sense enough to judge of religion for itself, these object lessons in history are most unwelcome. It is but recently that Good Friday has been observed by the schools, and the observance marks the growing influence of the Roman Catholic church. A few more years—a little more added power to the pope—and we shall hav a calendar studded with pious holidays, and the church will own the people of this land as completely as it once did the peasantry of Europe.

Topolobampo Bay.

Last winter we had the pleasure of a call from Mr. L. H. Hawkins, from whom a letter is here subjoined. Mr. Hawkins was on his way to Topolobampo bay as attorney for the railroad which Mr. Albert K. Owens is under contract to build in Sinaloa, Mexico, and as one of the directors of the coöperativ enterprise. Mr. Hawkins impressed those he met as an honest, straightforward man, and his enthusiasm for the new enterprise was unbounded. His visit chanced to be timed when Mr. J. W. Lovell lectured upon the scheme before the Manhattan Liberal Club. Colonel Hinton, it will be remembered, in criticising Mr. Lovell, disparaged the work, and thought those who went there would be disappointed. Mr. Hawkins hinted to the reporter of the meeting that Colonel Hinton was inspired by ill-will toward Mr. Owen, and that his opinion should therefore hav no weight. An intimation that Colonel Hinton might be right and Mr Lovell wrong was dismissed by Mr. Hawkins as beyond the limit of possibility. Mr. Hawkins left for Topolobampo bay with the good wishes of his friends for himself and the coöperativ enterprise. Beyond a direction to change the address of his paper, we had heard nothing from him until we received the following:

"LOS ANGELES, CAL., March 25, 1887.

"EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: About Dec. 15, 1886, myself and family—wife and three children—moved to Topolobampo bay, Sinaloa, Mexico, and at the same time directed you to send THE TRUTH SEEKER to us at that place. From that time to this we hav received one copy only. Finding that the 'Credit Foncier of Sinaloa on Topolobampo bay' was in every respect a fraud and humbug; that the country was a barren waste, without water, and that it would cost half a million dollars to put water on the land; that the boasted 'city site' was a flat sandbank; that the much-lauded 'inner harbor' was, when the tide was out, a great mud-flat; that the colony did not and do not own over three hundred acres of land in Mexico, and that difficult of irrigation; that, in fact, every statement made by Owen was false; that nothing was as he represented; that the country teemed with poisonous reptils and annoying insects; that there was no shelter for the people, sick or well; that the country about Topolobampo was teeming with disease—small-pox, measles, and fever—and this in the healthy season of the year; and after we had lost our oldest son, a boy of eleven years, with small-pox, and had over and over again been told by the nativ Mexicans that not even an Indian could liv there in the spring and summer, we, with about thirty others, left the place where this Owen and a woman by the name of Howland were going to establish a 'higher civilization.' At Guaymas we received the one copy of your paper, and in it found your editorial on the Credit Foncier. It seemed like a revelation, and I want to thank you for your good advice. I also desire to thank Colonel Hinton, of your city, for his frankness and truthfulness when he so eloquently replied to J. W. Lovell before the Liberal Club last winter. Mr. Lovell has never been to Mexico, and knows nothing personally about the country. Colonel Hinton had; and right here I want to say that every word he uttered in reply to Mr. Lovell was the truth, and I now think with shame of my efforts to dissuade the able reporter of your paper, George Macdonald, from writing up that occasion as he should and did do.

"If you consider this worthy of notice in your paper, publish it. If I can be the means of giving any information to any of your readers who think of going to that accursed place, I want to do so, and I will gladly answer all inquiries if they will address me at No. 29 Morris street, Los Angeles, Cal.—to which address please send THE TRUTH SEEKER, which stands in your books in the name of Mrs. L. H. Hawkins. Respectfully yours, L. H. HAWKINS.

"29 Morris street, Los Angeles, Cal."

Mr. Hawkins writes rather ferociously, and it is evident that he entertains no good opinion of the colony and its managers. But if the facts he states are indeed all true, he has good reason for his opinions. At the same time, and that we may do no injustice to anyone, we copy the following from John Swinton's Paper of the 3d instant:

"We hav a letter from Mrs. Marie Howland, of Hammonton, N. J., in reference to certain recent reports of the unsatisfactory experiences of the Socialist colonists at Topolobampo, Mexico. She says:

"'The stories are the grossest falsehoods. All is fair and honest and honorable in our Mexican colony, which is progressing peacefully and admirably well. The postmaster-general of Mexico has just issued orders for three post-offices in our settlements. You will continue to hear good news from our new home in Topolobampo.'

"Mrs. Howland also favors us with a copy of the Credit Foncier of Sinaloa, which contains letters from colonists corroborativ of her statements. Among other things we find in it a dispatch from Fuerte, signed by Messrs. Owen, Chidester, Peet, and Schellhous, who say:

"'No sickness, plenty of provisions, four hundred and ten persons united and happy. Thirty deserted; peace followed.'

"Whatever may be the prevalent opinion or the final result of the remarkable experiment at Topolobampo, we hav full trust in the honor of Colcnel Owen and those associated with him in its management.

An esteemed correspondent in Ottawa, Kansas, sends us a document on another subject, from which we cut the following lines concerning the new colony:

"'I hav just read a letter from the colony in Mexico, written by a party that left here last December. He tells me that things are going along there in good shape; he says the disturbance was raised by a capitalist, a lawyer, a preacher, and a policeman. There was only one other ingredient necessary to make mcanness complete in this outfit, and that was a saloon-keeper. The correspondent says he would not come back to the States under any consideration. We here all know the writer, and know that he is entirely reliable and honest.'"

The lawyer referred to in the anonymous letter from Mr. Swinton's anonymous correspondent is probably Mr. Hawkins himself. But it is not necessarily true that all lawyers are bad men; and we are acquainted with one or two "capitalists" who are generous, broad-minded, humane, and honest men. Topolobampo bay will not be converted into a paradise by abuse of those who say it is not. The gist of the matter is, Are the statements Mr. Hawkins makes true? If so, the opinions of the interested projectors are subject to a discount. If the alleged disadvantages do not exist, it should be easily shown.

We are interested in the matter for the reason that a great many of THE TRUTH SEEKER family hav thought of joining the colony.

A Churchman in an Executiv Chair.

The following remarkable executiv document emanates from the governor of Arkansas, and is addressed to the Senate of his state:

"To the President of the Senate:

"MR. PRESIDENT: Having had under consideration Senate bill No. 44, allowing butcher and baker shops to be kept open until 10 o'clock A.M. on Sunday, I am constrained to return the same to your honorable body without approval, with a statement of the reasons that prompt me to do so.

"Ours is a Christian civilization and our constitutions, national and state, upon their faces recognize Sunday or the Sabbath, called with emphasis the 'Lord's Day,' and our legislation makes it a day of rest and of abstinence from secular employments.

"It is a day set apart by divine authority for religious worship and by common consent recognized and respected as such.

"It is one of the first and most sacred, tenable, and important institutions of the Christian religion, which is part of the common law of the land.

"All institutions of the Christian religion that do not interfere with rights of conscience are entitled to the most profound respect, and should be protected by legislation.

"Remembering that we liv under a Constitution framed by and for a people whose religion is Christianity, and who hav long lived under and experienced the necessity for laws to secure the observance of Sunday as a day of rest, it does not seem proper to me to make common by legislativ enactment 'a day consecrated from the very birth of their religion and hallowed by associations dear to every Christian.'

"Destroy the Christian Sabbath and what becomes of the Christian religion? The poor beasts of burden would soon find by experience that our laws were no longer tempered by the softening influences of Christianity, and all the social advantages which great and good men hav attributed to the observance of Sunday as a day of rest would be taken away.

"Nothing but charity or necessity should excuse the engaging in the ordinary secular employments on the Sabbath.

"Under the law as it now is, charity or necessity upon the part of a customer will excuse the keeping open on Sunday of a business house. I cannot understand that there can be such a general necessity for keeping open butcher and baker shops on Sunday as to require that the law should be so changed as to permit it to be generally done.

"The farmer might urge that his grain would become too ripe unless he could reap it on Sunday, and the fruit vender that his fruit would decay unless he could be permitted to sell them on Sunday.

"But is it not of more importance that the Sabbath should be protected as a day of rest than that some should be exempted from inconvenience which its observance might sometimes cause? Correct general principles of morality and law should be sustained at the expense of particular consequences or inconveniences. Very respectfully,

"SIMON P. HUGHES, Governor."

Whereabouts upon the face of our national Constitution does Mr. Hughes find any recognition of Sunday as a religious institution? Why is ours a "Christian civilization?" And where is there any authority that Sunday was set apart by divinity? If divinity had anything to do with setting days apart, he nominated Saturday. The courts in the most civilized of our states hav denied that Christianity is part of the common law of the land, and why should Sunday, as a sacred institution of Chriatianity, be respected any more than Saturday, which the Jews and Seventh Day Adventists and Baptists keep; or Friday, which is the sacred day of the Mohammedans? Our national Constitution, so far from recognizing the Christian Sunday, distinctly prohibits the establishment of any form of religion.

There is, however, one sentence in Governor Hughes's veto which explains it all. After writing it, he need not hav penned another word. It is this: "Destroy the Christian Sabbath, and what becomes of the Christian religion?" Therein is the gist of all Christian pleas for the Sunday. Whenever a Christian rises to explain that without the holy Sabbath there would be no morality, no rest for the laborer, he means instead that there would be no work for the priest, and that the Christian religion would be gone. That is the real reason why the Christians defend the day.

But then, was the governor of Arkansas elected to preserve the Christian Sunday or to carry out the will of the people of his state?

Mr. and Mrs. Walker at Liberty.

We hav a communication from E. C. Walker, in which he announces that he and his wife are free. They hav under protest paid the costs of court for which they were detained, and come out of prison to fight the battle of the two Harmans, who were arrested for alleged violations of the postal laws. In the communication referred to—which we shall print next week—Mr. Walker sharply criticises the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER for some things he has said, and as Mr. Walker always writes forcibly, our readers will no doubt enjoy his letter.

We extend to Mr. Walker congratulations upon his attainment of liberty, and the felicity he will now enjoy in the society of his beautiful and heroic wife. May their further career together be one of unalloyed happiness. At the same time, we trust there is no harm done if we assure them that their last act is brimful of common sense. The state is too strong for them, and we do not know that it would be the best part of wisdom at present to overthrow government. There are too many Christians at large in Kansas to make the abolition of law a perfectly safe step.

However, we are heartily pleased that so brave a man and so sturdy a fighter as Mr. Walker is once more free to pursue whatever course shall seem best to him.

Open Letters to Colonel Ingersoll.

Ever since the "Lay Sermon," by Colonel Ingersoll, delivered at Chickering Hall, was printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER, we hav been deluged with open letters to the orator from kindly-meaning people anxious to instruct him in Socialism or Communism, or some other remedy for the country's political ills. Most of the letters begin by calling Mr. Ingersoll's attention to the fact that he proposes no scheme of salvation, and then the writers continue, "Please allow me to tell you how the thing may be done cheaply and effectivly." Our readers will remember several such that hav been printed, and the drawer for those manuscripts that we cannot print is bulging over with others that hav not been printed. One of them covers over forty pages of closely written foolscap.

Now, we cannot believe that Colonel Ingersoll needs all this schooling. Those who hav heard him discourse upon these subjects know that he knows a great deal more about the various sides and shades of reform in political economy than most other folks. He also knows that there is no sudden remedy bottled and ready for use after being well shaken in a political campaign or the columns of the press. All modest men are not great, but great men are mostly modest, and Colonel Ingersoll is a great man. He possesses as much common sense to the square inch as anyone at present living in New York, while his square inches are multitudinous.

What is popularly called the labor question has been, is now, and will in the future be up for the liveliest kind of debate. It is a subject of the greatest importance to the population of the United States. It calls for deep, earnest, serious thinking, and careful expression. It is not to be settled offhand, but awaits solution by the great law of evolution which always makes for the best in the end, though its processes may be full of pain. If any of the very able contributors to THE TRUTH SEEKER can help the thing along, our columns are open now, as they always hav been. But the essays should be brief; it is better to come several times at judicious intervals than to come with an avalanche of manuscript which can hav but one fate, however good our will to use it. And do not let the matter take the form of "An Open Letter to Colonel Ingersoll." That gentleman is a very busy man, and it is doubtful if he would find time to read them—certainly he could not reply to them all. Let the information you hav to giv be direct to the interested, and independent of others, except as ideas may be considered in a general way. Particular criticisms should follow close on the heels of the words criticised, but we cannot always promptly make room for the lengthy articles with which we are usually favored. Therefore, to the writers of open letters to Colonel Ingersoll, let us say, Don't.

These remarks hav been called out by the reception, since we reprinted from the North American Review Mr. Ingersoll's "Interrogation Points," of a number of bulky letters, evidently written with the kindly intent of instructing the world's greatest orator in the tenets and creedal verbiage of the several phases of social philosophy.

Rebellious Priests.

There is a growing discontent among the Roman Catholic priests of this neighborhood which argues well for their capacity to assimilate American ideas of independence. The McGlynn affair brought out expressions from the Catholic clergy which in any other country would hav led to their prompt dismissal from priestly office, and these expressions are multiplying since the ten-days' sentence to a monastery of James Curran for attending Dr. McGlynn's recent lecture. This last exercise of ecclesiastical power over its slaves was the occasion of a New York Herald reporter's visit to several Roman Catholic priests and laymen, whom he found nourishing as deep feelings of resentment as a due regard for their religious welfare admitted. Only one priest was found who would allow name his to be connected with the interview—Sylvester Malone, of Williamsburg. The reporter quotes him as saying:

"Who would not stand by such a noble, such a pure, such a faithful friend as Dr. Curran? He only attended a lecture of his old friend. We all had a right to do the same. The majority of the priests in New York and Brooklyn are in sympathy with Dr. McGlynn. If fifty priests stood on the platform that night with Dr. McGlynn the archbishop would not hav disciplined any one. I fear there will be serious trouble yet in the church. But politics is at the bottom of it all. The archbishop ought to back right down if he wants to save the church in this country."

It is rumored also that Dr. Burtsell, of the church of the Epiphany, was suspended for ten days because he sat upon the platform at Dr. McGlynn's lecture. The other priests who attended the meeting hav received sharp letters of reprimand from Archbishop Corrigan. These accumulated cases are making the laity dissatisfied and the priests rebellious. The course pursued by Mr. Corrigan, they intimate, is not in keeping with American notions. Mr. Malone's assertion that politics is at the bottom of it is no doubt true, and that fact means that Corrigan intends to keep a firm grip on his voters, in order that he may sell them to the politicians for favors, to be returned by way of the public treasury.

Let us hope the rebellion will widen and grow to such dimensions that the church may split. A hundred excommunicated priests in and around New York would do a great deal for freedom.

Mr. Taschereau Takes Water.

Some time ago Cardinal Taschereau of Quebec condemned the Knights of Labor, ordering his priests not to giv absolution to members of the order. Recently Cardinal Gibbons of Baltimore made a plea to the Vatican authorities in behalf of the Knights. He presented several reasons for a recognition of the order, but they might be summed up in one—that the church cannot afford to denounce a body of men who would probably not acknowledge the pope's authority in the premises, but would boycott the church as readily as they would the beer of some offending brewer. As the Catholic church derives its chief support from men who are laborers and Knights, this reason was considered sound.

This defense of the Knights by Cardinal Gibbons has taken effect—good or bad as you look at it—and the Canadian cardinal has taken water. The following letter, signed by Mr. Taschereau as archbishop of Quebec, was read in all the churches of his diocese last Sunday:

"In September, 1884, the holy see, consulted by me on the society of the Knights of Labor, condemned it under pain of grievous sin, and charged the bishops to deter their diocesans therefrom, as I did in my circular letter (No. 131) of the 2d of February, 1885. After representations made by their lordships, the bishops of the United States, the holy see has suspended, until further orders, the effect of that sentence. In consequence, I authorize confessors of the diocese to absolve Knights of Labor on the following conditions, which it is your bounden duty to explain to them, and to make them observe:

"First. That they confess and sincerely repent the grievous sin which they committed by not obeying the decree of September, 1884.

"Second. That they be ready to abandon this society as soon as the holy see shall ordain it.

"Third. That they sincerely and explicitly promis absolutely to avoid all that may either favor Masonic and other condemned societies, or violate the laws either of justice, charity, or of the state.

"Fourth. That they abstain from every promis and from every oath by which they would bind themselvs either to obey blindly all the orders of the directors of the society, or keep absolute secrecy even toward the lawful authorities. (See Disciplin, page 217.)

"In behalf of these penitents only, and by virtue of an indult, I prolong the time of the paschal communion until the feast of the ascension, inclusivly.

Until the issue of this letter the relations of the Roman Catholic church and the Knights of Labor were rather muddled. Across the Canadian line the order was, according to an infallible church which never errs, the abode of all that is wicked, and its members could not be absolved from their sins. On this side of the line, the order was all that is pious and regular, and its chief ruler was not only a good Catholic, freely absolved from all the sins he could commit, but a personal friend of a cardinal. The backdown of the Canadian cardinal brings the church into harmony with itself, but at the expense of its record for consistency.

Editorial Notes.

THE Assembly last week voted $312,000 to extend, improve, equip, and furnish the Metropolitan Museum of Art in Central Park. This makes $712,000 voted to the two museums this session.

THE Interior settles the race question in religion thus:

"As far as possible the two races should keep socially separate. We would admit a colored man to membership in our church without hesitation, provided there were no church of his own race accessible, but if there were, we would advise him to go to his own."

The Independent intimates that the Interior is still in the gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity. There is nothing like having scripture to quote from when an opponent is to be anathematized.

IN the law passed at its last session incorporating a reformatory at St. Cloud, the Minnesota legislature provides for a chaplain at a salary of one thousand dollars annually. If this is not establishing religion it would be difficult to say what is. The chaplain is also required to act as teacher, and will, doubtless, earn his money; but that does not relieve the legislature. He is appointed as chaplain by law, and the Minnesota legislature by so designating him has violated the United States Constitution.

IN an Easter supplement of a Christian journal, intended for children, is this:

"Of all these days Easter is the Crown. If Christ had not been born he could not hav died for the sins of the world. If he had not died he could not hav risen. If he had not risen we could not believe him to be the savior of the world."

But supposing Christ was not born as alleged, and died only as any seditious Jew might hav been punished by the Romans; supposing, too, that the resurrection is a myth—a pagan myth Christianized: what then?

CHAPLAIN SMITH of the Connecticut legislature makes his prayers suit those who pay him. In opening a session of the legislature recently he asked the almighty to take particular care of the moneyed class and to guard well their interests. He also prayed that the "hundred and thousands of toilers in our business places, those that bear the heat and burden of the day, might be contented with their wages, and go to their daily work uncomplainingly." As these words came from the chaplain's lips the labor men in different parts of the house rolled up their eyes and gazed at each other in astonishment. Should Parson Smith enter the race for the chaplaincy again, the Hartford Telegram predicts that he will encounter many obstacles.

AN esteemed correspondent, Mr. F. M. Borden, of Nova Scotia, writes that it gave him pleasure to see the Christian Mr. Grabill admitted to the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and adds: "I would think much more of our Liberal papers if they would afford space each week to representativ Christians, in which they might defend the faith, and be answered by our best writers and thinkers." Mr. Borden misapprehends the position of the Liberal editors if he imagins they would refuse to print the arguments of representativ Christians. The trouble is, the representativ Christians will not use the space. Occasionally we get an article from some common-place orthodox gentleman burning with zeal to convert the Infidel, but he usually lacks the ability to write intelligibly, and we are forced to decline his polemical efforts. But when we find an educated Christian willing to reason, he is made welcome. Representativ Christians, however, are not generally willing to debate Christianity.

Letters from Friends.

BENTON, ILL., April 2, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am in receipt of Helen Gardener's book, which I was glad to get. It is the best book I ever read. Ingersoll's introduction is splendid. Please find inclosed fifty cents to pay for the book. WILLIAM SLATER.

DESDEMONA, TEX., March 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I believe I am the only one who takes your paper at this office. I am delighted with the illustrations, and am very much pleased with your course on the Anarchist question. John Peck is a brick, and I hope he will continue to write of "Christian Absurdities" for years to come. A. C. MARTIN, M. D.

NASHVILLE, TENN., March 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Your communication warns me that my subscription runs out on March 26, 1887. I would not be deprived, in my last days, of the only thoroughly entertaining friend I hav.

I was born in 1816 in a Catholic hotbed, the temple of ignorance and superstition. My conversion dates from 1833, when I was seventeen years old. The main reason was the Catholic neglect of temporal education.

Inclosed find $1.50 for six months' subscription.

J. P. MULLER.

ARENZVILLE, ILL., March 17, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for several years, and hav always thought it one of the best, if not the best, papers published. I hav often told some of my Christian friends that if they would take THE TRUTH SEEKER and read it one year, they would be surprised that they had been so ignorant. The people of this county generally are quite Liberal, and there is a splendid field for a good lecturer. I notice that some of your subscribers object to the pictures. I think it a sure sign that they hav not quite outgrown the old Christian superstition. I cast my vote for the pictures, by a large majority. T. G. SPRINGER.

NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME, VA., Mar. 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Thanking you for sending me your paper over my time, and assuring you that I am most heartily pleased with the paper under its present management, I renew for twelve months from expiration of subscription.

I hav read the paper, through the courtesy of a friend, from its first appearance in New York, but my means being nil it is only recently I became a subscriber. While it was most excellent under the management of the late D. M. Bennett, I must say that under the present management it is superexcellent—all that a Liberal of the most advanced principles could desire—incisiv, cleanly, superb!

Trusting that it may continue to gain in the favor its merits deserve, I subscribe myself, WM. H. MORAE.

WILLOW CREEK, MON., Feb. 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am a regular and appreciativ reader of your valuable paper, and belicve that it fully merits its title, and carries with it a genial and reformatory influence. I observe that occasionally an objection is made to the illustrations. In regard to this, I wish to say that personally I don't admire them, as my taste would call for something more beautiful. But despite this, I am content to hav them appear, for it is a well-known fact that the ideas they are intended to convey are more forcibly impressed by the means employed than by any other. Frequently by an illustration a chain of ideas is awakened that may lead to a result that otherwise would not hav been achieved. Therefore I think, generally speaking, they are advantageous. Long liv Mr. Heston and his inimitable art to strike trenchant blows at the hydra-headed monster, superstition. W. H. BANTA.

CHICAGO, March 16, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 12th I find M. Babcock's second reply to the Young Men's Christian Association, and it is needless to say I enjoyed it as well as I did the first. I am glad he is giving his attention to the Bible-in-the-public-school question. I think it is a question every Liberal father and mother ought to interest themselvs in, for the children are not sent to school to get religion, but to learn something that will do them some good after they become of age.

That cheering letter you received from Mr. Young is almost a story in itself. It is a sort of sketch of his character. The letter also shows Mr. Young's self-restraint in his discontinuing the paper, with its many interesting columns, because it published a certain man's opinion. But I hav hopes of him yet. P. AUL.

STEUBENVILLE, N. Y., March 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The Irish in Ireland are fighting now for Henry George's principle, that the land should belong to the people, and yet our Republican and Democratic brethren, who call him a crank, etc., are hissing them on. It is all right as long as it is not our ox that is gored. I can hardly decide which side to take. On one side I feel they are (though they do not know it) fighting the battle of the mass of the people for a free earth, so that all may enjoy what nature givs—free land, water, air, and sunshine. On the other it will be a victory of an aristocracy that must be crushed before the people can be free. But, then, again, a victory of the Irish will be a victory for the Catholic church, which is worse than any other curse that can be inflicted on any people. It enslaves the mind as well as body. The church is the greatest tyrant on this earth. Could that be abolished, and men's minds freed from superstition, there would soon be an end to other tyrannies. It is the summa summarum of all iniquities. Let it be annihilated, and all reforms necessary to make this world a paradise would come in good time. Mr. George teaches that the land must be held for the benefit of the whole people as the foundation-stone of all reforms, but to accomplish that superstition must first be rooted out of men's minds. What can be done while the mass of the people believe in ghosts or diakkas and are led by the nose by priests, preachers, or mediums? If Mr. George would use his great talents to that end, and work with Colonel Ingersoll and the Secular Union, he might accomplish his ends in time. At least he would weaken the foundation of the most of our evils—superstition.

J. DOWNES.

LONGSTREET, GA., March 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: While on a visit to Brunswick a few days since, I found a good many Liberals and Freethinkers. But although I remained in Brunswick five weeks I did not see a Freethought paper there, except those I take myself, viz., THE TRUTH SEEKER, Pulpit, and Olive Branch. I did, however, before leaving, get from a friend some names of Freethinkers, which I send you, from that place, to whom you can, if you please, send sample copies, or other reading matter, as you may think best.

I am now sixty-eight, perhaps, with one or two exceptions, the only outspoken Freethinker in this county. Yet I find about eight out of ten so-called believers, when brought down to sober thinking, do not believe what they hav subscribed to. I hope to see the day when every man and woman in the land shall feel free to think instead of to believe, and be bold to say what they think is truth based upon human experience and human reason. T. N. MASON.

STILLWATER, M. T., March 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav noticed recently in the press notices of the day that his holihumbuginess, Mr. Pecci, has presented the widow of Riel, the leader of the late Canadian half-breed revolt, with a nail from the true cross. From the amount of nails from the true cross now definitly known to be in existence, there must hav been a nail factory of immense capacity at that interesting period of the world's history, even to hav supplied the nails for the cross; or does his Highgasticutus hav them made to order to satisfy the morbid superstitious cravings of fanatically diseased minds? The latter is the most probable, as the ancient writers make no mention of any nail manufactory, and such an establishment would most certainly hav been chronicled by them if such a thing had existed. It would seem that, if common sense pervaded Catholic councils, this true cross and nail tomfoolery would be discontinued in short order, but consistent common-sense and religious humbugery cannot be harmonized. I would be pleased to hear friend Peck upon this nail question. WM. T. HAMILTON.

DALLAS, OR., March 11, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: As so many are giving their views on the pictures and other matters connected with THE TRUTH SEEKER, I thought it might be well to giv the pictures a little boost from this place. They are the right thing in the right place. Keep right along with them.

John Peck's "Christian Absurdities" are right to the point, and would do our Christian enemies much good if they could be induced to read and ponder them.

I must speak a word of praise for the Children's Corner also. I hav two boys, aged nine and eleven years, who take great pleasure in perusing the Children's Corner, and also reading the "Letters from Friends."

Helen H. Gardener's book, which I got last year, went the rounds, and did much good.

Until the beginning of this year I hav made every copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER do missionary work, by sending or giving them to some one that would read them. With the beginning of this year I hav begun to save them for future reference, as they are quite handy to refer to occasionally when discussing church history. D. A. DODSON.

BURNSIDE, ILL., March 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Some unprincipled person, or perhaps several of them, presumable Christians, so-called, hav given extensiv circulation to a lie about Mr. Thomas Gates (my father), stating that just before his death he retracted and materially changed his views in regard to religious matters. I know that it was his earnest desire in life to appear before men or gods in his true character; and as our county paper, the Carthage Republican, having been furnished an obituary giving a true statement of the facts of his belief, omitted to publish that part of it, leaving the public in possession of that Christian lie intended to substantiate their assertion that a man cannot die without acknowledging that Jesus was his own father, and that the father was his own son, three times one is one, etc., I herewith inclose the obituary as I sent it to the Republican. That part of it inclosed in brackets is what was omitted or clipped; please publish in full.

At his residence, three miles north of Burnside, Thomas Gates, after a long and painful illness with a cancer on his lip, found relief in death on the 8th. Mr. Gates was born in Concord, Vt., August 13, 1815, therefore was in his eighty-second year. He was one of Hancock county's first settlers, having come to this county in 1839. [He was known to be a confirmed Infidel, and died without respect or fear of Bible, Gods, or devils.] Although his suffering was long and intense, he was never heard to complain of his lot.

A few days before father died, I told him of the stories that had been told about him. All he said was, "There will no doubt be plenty of lies told about me after I am dead, as there were about Cheney" (one of our neighbors, who did not get his Balm of Gilead from the extortionate Sunday venders). He "was only surprised that they could not wait till he was dead."

Although he expected death daily, it had no terror for him. He even jested about meeting Jesus and Gabriel, etc.

We thank our father (not God) for educating us out of the fear of "jealous gods" and "wrathful gods," horned devils, fallen angels, and other heathen myths. He also taught us that the ancient gods with three heads, called heathen idols, and the modern three gods with one head, called Christian, were full brothers, children of the same parents, namely, Superstition, its father, and Ignorance, its mother.

His motto was, "Liv for the benefit of the world you are in," and, if you must worship, worship that which to your mind is good and beautiful, and if there is such a being as God, it is just possible we can worry along with the other worlds until you get there. F. D. GATES.

BENWOOD, W. VA., March 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Whenever I hear or learn of anything good, I always like to let others know of it, so they can share it with me. One of the good things I came in possession of lately is "The Radical Remedy in Social Science," an essay in pamphlet form by E. B. Foote, Jr., M.D. The subject he discusses in this essay is second to no other in importance with which the social reformer has to deal, and it is a wonder to me why the remedy proposed by Dr. Foote is not more generally discussed and advocated.

The pamphlet is truly, as Dr. Foote characterizes it, "an earnest essay on pressing problems," and I, for one, thank him for writing and publishing it.

There is another good thing that I wish to speak of, and which may be of benefit to some of the TRUTH SEEKER readers of small means who believe in co-operation. There is a co-operativ association being formed in this state, which, unlike many other enterprises of this character, is based upon perfectly fair and equitable principles, and is officered by the right sort of men. There will be no coupon clippers attached to the association to absorb the profits. The association is to engage in farming, manufacturing, mining, etc.

C. BURSEE.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., March 12, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed the amount due you for the best Freethought paper in the country, the dear old TRUTH SEEKER. Many thanks for your kindness in continuing beyond time paid for. I found it impossible until to-day to spare the money, and yet I could no more liv without it than I could without daily food.

I like the pictures very much, but some of my Christian friends say they are overdone, and there is nothing corresponding to them in the Bible at all. I hav some pretty warm discussions sometimes, and I am also trying to get subscribers, but find it uphill work with my acquaintances. They are all religionists, who can't or won't listen to reason; though they are not to blame, as they hav sucked superstition down with their mother's milk, and are afraid to hear the other side. No one but a coward would be satisfied with only one side of a story.

Success to Mr. Heston and THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I cannot close until I giv "bread and water" Beecher a passing notice. I never took any interest in him after he made that famous speech here in this city some years ago, until I heard he was going to die. I suppose he has a big golden harp covered with flowers before this time.

Respectfully, MRS. E. M. HANSSON.

TROPIC, INDIAN RIVER, FLA., March 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to hav from six to ten families of genuin Freethinkers and truth seekers settle here with me and form a coöperativ society. Land adjoining my place (of ten acres) can be had for from five to twenty dollars an acre now, but in a year, or perhaps sooner, I am afraid it will be much higher. My place is on the long island between the Indian river and the ocean, at the mouth of the Banana river. I am completely isolated from the rest of the world. My post-office, Tropic, is on Merritt's Island, about four miles from my little farm. The southern extremity of Merritt's Island is just across the Banana river. I don't want all my friends in Michigan (my former home) to know that I propose to gather some "congenial spirits" (I am a Materialist, by the way, although, like all truth seekers, I am always open to conviction) around me. I would like to write an article on coöperation for your paper, and then invite any who want to join a society of that kind to correspond with me through your office. I am not interested, either directly or remotely, in the sale of land about here. The man who owns land all around me I am not on friendly terms with even, and I think that by getting ten acres from him we can connect my place with some state land that can be had for $1.25 per acre perhaps. W. A. MOSELY.

CARL JUNCTION, MO., March 14, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hereby hand you postal note to renew my subscription and pay for papers as directed by inclosed order. Up to the present time I hav been the only subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER in this place—a town of about five hundred people, with nearly as many more who get their mail here, who liv in the township. I do not believe that half a dozen of the whole number one year ago knew of the existence of such a paper as yours. I hav done what I could reasonably to advertise and get acquaintances to read my paper. I hav exhorted them, hav reasoned with them, hav done them up in the hardest sort of double-twisted knots, shown them absurdities, contradictions, falsehoods, cruelties, impossibilities, obscenities, inhumanities, and childishness with which their God-book abounds, yet the best I hav been able to do in aid of THE TRUTH SEEKER or the cause of universal mental liberty is the few trial subscribers whose names appear in the order inclosed herewith.

It appears to me the theological poison with which the average Christian's brain is saturated is without an antidote. As a rule, to reason or attempt to do so is a useless agitation of the air. Read they will not, and of thinking outside the contracted, petty groove their preacher has marked out they appear incapable. The promis is bright for universal mental liberty, but the time is not near. The great law of evolution will in time overtake their children's children, when physiology, instead of theology, will be taught in our public schools, and American juries find obscenity the same in the Jew Bible as in "Cupid's Yokes."

WM. M. CARTER.

POSEYVILLE, IND., March 31, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. W. S. Bell, Liberal, of Chicago, and Elder J. T. Purvis, Campbellite, of Enfield, Ill., hav this date closed a debate which has been in progress for the past three days at the court-house in Mt. Vernon. Question: Resolved, That the Bible is of divine origin; that its teachings are in harmony with the teachings of science, reason, and common sense.

The disputants were greeted each day with good audiences, the best of feeling prevailed throughout the discussion, and all Liberals feel highly elated at the overwhelming victory. Of course, as is usual, the followers of "the meek and lowly" pretend that the victory is with the affirmativ, but in this view they are not joined by a single one who walks by reason and not by faith. Considering that the Bible itself teaches that "by reasoning you cannot find out God," the proposition that it is in keeping with reason seems to be the most untenable that was ever advanced by a perverted or paradoxical intellect.

The only evidence offered in support of the proposition was the dictum of so-called Christian scientists who were willing to pervert the teachings of true science "for Christ's sake." On the other hand, it was clearly shown that all the leading scientists and intellects of the day regard the Bible accounts of creation and all other supernatural stories as a child's story, though believed by many who are intellectually but children overgrown.

Elder Purvis also endeavored to prove the oft-repeated claim that the common law of the land was founded on the Bible, but in this he also made a signal failure, it being shown that Sir William Blackstone and Sir Matthew Hale claimed that "the origin of the great fundamental principles of our laws is as much in doubt as is the source of the Nile." Considering that these law-writers were Christians and believers in witchcraft, their testimony should not be called in question by those Christians that hav so long been making the fallacious assertion.

Although this is Posey county, familiarly known as the land of hoop-poles and pumpkins, our people are fast shaking off their old creedbound ideas inherited from their parents and grandparents, and are beginning to think for themselvs. And it is well. "He who cannot reason is a fool; he who will not reason is a bigot; he who dare not reason is a coward, but he who can and dare reason is a man."

KILLARNEY, MANITOBA, March 10, 1887.

DEAR MR. MACDONALD: Inclosed please find $3 to renew my subscription to the good old TRUTH SEEKER. I also inclose a rough translation I hav made of an article published in L'Evenement, of Quebec, which is clear evidence to me that the French Catholics of the province of Quebec are awakening to the fact that the world is progressing. It points to the fact that the faithful are asking explanations from the clergy, and that ridiculing scientific men and their theories will not any more satisfy the masses. Priests are therefore obliged to resort to quibbles and misstatements (as seen in the translated article) to meet these questions. It is great satisfaction to me that this spirit of inquiry is started among the French Catholics of Canada. It will lead to the triumph of reason—in time. The comments on the lecture by the editor of L'Evenement contain much hidden sarcasm between the lines. Hoping that THE TRUTH SEEKER will long continue to instruct and amuse, I am, dear sir,

Yours, L. F. MATHÉ.

TRANSLATED FROM "L'EVENEMENT," OF QUEBEC.

The grand vicar of Laval University, Mr. Hamel, gave last night his last lecture on scientific investigation. As usual, the eminent professor held the rapt attention of his audience to the end.

"Life," said Mr. Hamel, "emanates from God. The theory of spontaneous generation has long ago fallen through, the belief in it having collapsed as a result of repeated experiences by eminent scientists. Besides, we hav evidences that life was gradually started on the surface of the earth, and to explain the perfection it has attained in our age, two theories hav been imagined. The first is that of 'successiv creation,' showing God's fiat at different periods, in giving life to beings specifically distinct, the fossils of which are found in the successiv geological strata of the earth. The second theory is that of evolution, first proposed by Lamarck and perfected by Darwin. Natural selection, and the struggle for existence, the foundation of this last hypothesis, do not prevent the theory from contradicting two well-known and demonstrated facts of science—the immutability of species, and the want of connecting links, which are absolutely necessary to sustain evolution.

"The development of life on earth ends in man, whose origin and nature hav always been a subject of interest and study to cultivated intellects. Where does man come from? What is his nature? When and in what state did he first appear on earth? These complex and important questions can be discussed and answered by both faith and science, without strife, and with complete accord. God, says the church, is the origin and end of man, the author of the admirable mixture of body and spiritual substance, which, being free, is consequently immortal, and that man has called 'soul.' This soul cannot be the result of a simple evolution of an imperfect life—primitiv substance; it received its being by creation—in the same way that it cannot be destroyed but by annihilation. Besides, the church, whose knowledge on creation is unimpeachable and undisputed, is itself the last act of creation. Accordingly, creation is recent. On the question of the antiquity of man, faith is mute, God having created man in a preternatural state, that is to say, with privileges beyond the strict exigencies of his nature. This free and intelligent being rebelled against its creator, and as a consequence was deprived of the gifts bestowed upon him. This is the truth taught by faith on the origin and nature of man, and this truth is entirely corroborated of the theories of pure science. There are undoubtedly many so-called scientific men who seem to enjoy talking and writing about the 'Tertiary man' and the 'pre-Adamite' man. There are also many self-styled scientific men who would rob humanity of the first face animated by intelligence, and replace it by the mask of bestiality—false philosophers who go to the extent of saying that man is but a 'lieutenant in the great army of monkeys.' There are, besides, a few 'truth seekers,' claiming that God is but a dream, the soul a myth, not worthy even of a thought.

"But one-half of these scientists work constantly at destroying the theories 'thought out' by the other half. And, in the midst of these disputes, Truth appears triumphant and outliving the rise and fall of these adventurous theories, Atheistic dreamers, striving to convince themselvs that man and his frailties is but a strange problem."

The editor of L'Evenement remarks that Mr. Hamel in touching upon these complex questions has proven himself skilled and most cautious, which is a proof of learning. He demonstrated that the scientific Catholic can harmonize faith and knowledge. It is the best way of reminding science of the debt she owes the church.

It is well known that there is danger in condemning theories that pertain to the domain of reason.

When one studies the theories of St. Augustine, and those of Monsignor Clifford on the formation of the universe; when one also thinks of the works of "L'Abbé Motais" on the results of the deluge—hypothesis and theory so flatly contradictory to scriptural teachings—and when one further reflects that the church is obstinately silent on these questions, one is far from feeling intolerant to the deductions of science and reason.

HANNIBAL, MO., March 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I want to giv my hearty indorsement to Dr. Higbie's suggestions in regard to curtailing burial expenses. It seems to me that every sensible observer ought to see that the custom of making a costly display on such occasions is a growing evil. If the rich choose to be guilty of this folly, it is nonsense for those in moderate circumstances to ape them, and I think the formation of burial associations, as he proposes, is just the remedy.

Now that I am on this subject, I want to say a few words to Liberals. There are too many who say, "Oh, I don't care what becomes of my body—how I am buried, or whether I am buried at all." This is a mistaken idea. Of course, it makes no difference to the body—or spirit either, if there is one; but it is a disgrace to the cause of Liberalism to hav one of its advocates voluntarily surrendered into the hands of the clergy at death, thus enabling these hirelings to wipe out a life record against church dogmas. On the other hand, there is no individual right more sacred than the right not to be misrepresented at one's own funeral, and nothing that so much tends to overcome the prejudices of honest Christians, and inspire respect for our cause, as well-conducted Secular funerals.

These reasons, viewed in the proper light, are sufficient to cause every true Liberal to resolve that his funeral shall be strictly Secular, and yet there are hundreds of Liberals buried with the meaningless mummery of priests every year, while only here and there a Secular funeral occurs. Obviously the reason of this is that most Liberals neglect to make the necessary arrangements beforehand, and let their will in this regard be fully understood; and even where they do this, if they do not leave it in black and white over their own signature, their Christian families in most cases, rather than offend Mother Grundy, will sacrifice their dead bodies on the altar of superstition. I hav known a number of cases of this kind, and only yesterday I received a letter from Mr. Aaron Davis, of Frederick, Md., stating that some time ago he purchased from you one of my little Secular funeral and marriage handbooks, and that a neighbor of his who was in declining health desired him to officiate at his funeral and forbade the interference of any clergyman; but that as soon as the breath was out of his body, those who should hav been his natural protectors turned him over to the tender mercies of an orthodox preacher, as usual. In order to guard against such calamities, some of the Liberals in this city hav been filling out the following blank, which I commend to your readers, with the information that suitable books for Secular funeral and marriage purposes may be obtained at the TRUTH SEEKER office for a trifling sum:

BLANK.

Being a disbeliever in the dogma of revealed religion, I do hereby express my earnest desire that no clergyman be permitted to officiate at my funeral, but that the exercises be entirely Secular, and in accordance with my known views of religion and morality; and I do hereby appoint my friend A. B. to see that this desire be executed according to my instructions.

Yours vs. priestcraft, A. R. AYRES.

FORISTELL, MO., March 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I want to write ten times as much as I can afford to, or as you can afford to print. But I will try to get off something and yet keep within bounds.

I will first report that you hav lost a good subscriber here by a terrible railroad accident. Mr. S. Burlingame and wife stepped upon the railroad track to go a few rods to a neighbor's, when they were overtaken by a swift train and both instantly taken out of this life, whether into another or not. They were most worthy and respected people, and all of us, their neighbors, without distinction of religious affiliations, greatly deplore "the deep damnation of their taking off."

And, by the way, we don't hav here any of the conflict and opposition between Christians and Freethinkers that I hear and read of elsewhere. The lion and lamb do lie down together here, and the lamb is not inside the lion, either. Certainly the few Infidels of this region (present company excepted) are not the sort of people to be ostracized to any great extent, but candor demands that we acknowledge that our Christian neighbors show no disposition to punish us in any way for our honest opinions. But they show us all the respect they would if we belonged to their churches. And we Infidels, on the other hand, intend to be as liberal as the darkey clown was when he admitted that "a white man is as good as a nigger as long as he behaves as well." Some of my very best friends are Christians, or think they are, and mean to be. But I tell them there really are no Christians. They would do anything in reason for me, as I for them. But it is something astonishing how they hold on to their superstition. Some of them will read THE TRUTH SEEKER and Infidel books to please me, but say the more they read them the less they believe them. So I hav to giv them up and tell them if they had been brought up Roman Catholics there would hav been no help for them, but they would hav had to follow that rut to the end of life. I regard it as one of the most unaccountable things that people of some brains should cling so tenaciously to that barbarous, cruel, and absurd old Hebrew mythology. I point out to them the absurdity of the idea that God talks so familiarly, and of so trivial affairs, with those old semi-barbarians, but now falls back on his dignity, and his most faithful devotees cannot get a word out of him on the most important subject, even in explanation of the meaning of his own reputed word. Too thin, entirely too thin, I tell them, except for dunces and very young children. But about the greatest difficulty I hav with the believers is their inconsistency. They stick for the inspiration of the Bible, and yet repudiate such of its teachings as they dislike, especially the hell part. Like Brother Beecher, they will neither "get offen the platform nor leff go the mule's tail." I remind them that a chain is no stronger than its weakest link; that "whatever link we strike, tenth or ten thousandth, breaks the chain alike," and that it is just as fatal to the inspiration theory to break the hell link as the heaven or any other. But logic, reason, and argument are no match for early bias and prejudice.

Now as to Materialism and Spiritualism. I am glad to see that the advocates of either hav a fair show in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but regret to notice that some of the Materialistic writers exhibit some impatience toward those who differ with them. Now, I am pretty nearly a Materialist myself, and fear I shall yet hav to become quite one. But why in the world anyone should wish to believe that "death ends all," or want others to, is more than I can comprehend, for it is a miserably gloomy view to me, and has a very discouraging and depressing effect upon me, as I hav to acknowledge to my pious friends. And this fact is one of their stock arguments against my unbelief in their superstition. I can only remind them that the effects of a belief hav nothing to do with its truth or falsity, and that I had rather be unhappy than be a happy fool. Whatever be the merits or demerits of Spiritism, one thing is pretty evident to me—it has done more to undermine the old Jew book than all other agencies combined. It did much toward helping me out of the woods, for which I feel under great obligations to it. I hav by me a letter from my dear dead wife (who was a Christian girl, and much younger than myself), written to her sister in the long ago, soon after we were married, wherein she says: "C—— seems a good deal interested of late in Spiritualist papers and books, which I greatly regret, as I fear the consequences." Poor child! her fears were prophetic. And yet, when the worst came, it did not seem to distress her much, as I often told her in the latter days of her life that I believed she had become more Infidel than myself. Now I do not feel nearly as confident as I could wish that I shall ever again meet her and the other friends that hav passed on; but it is idle to tell me that it matters little. That certainly will never "go down" with me.

Now, as regards your course toward the Anarchists. Although I hate Anarchy as the devil is reputed to hate holy water, yet I do not see but that your course has been entirely consistent, for it has ever been as plain to me as the sun at noon that Judge Lynch got into that court and ran it. Still, I don't see how the Anarchists can complain of even that, for, as I understand their views, the only law they want is what the people take it into their heads to make and execute on the spur of occasion. And that seems to be just about what they hav got; but, as usual, it makes a good deal of difference whose ox gets gored. I say, if the Anarchists were ever guilty of publicly advocating the murder of anyone, they should hav been promptly arrested and punished at the time, as unlimited freedom of speech is entirely impracticable. Society can be injured by words as well as by bombs; and if society has a right to exist, it has a right to protect itself. But to allow a lot of blatherskites to preach murder until somebody gets killed, and then gather them in and hang them like onions, a dozen on a string, is something monstrous.

Now, Mr. Editor, a little private talk in public with you, and I hav done. I lately visited our good old Granit state. I went via New York, and had the weather been at all favorable while there, I should hav hunted you up and shook your "flipper" and exchanged a few words. But the weather was so miserable that after wandering around a little in the slush and drizzling rain, I went aboard the only Boston boat out that night, and kept comfortable. But as it was, I caught a cold, that with plentiful replenishment is still doing able service, and keeping me coughing quite lively whilst writing this. I had a fine time in the "old country;" found my friends generally prospering, and, what is better, found many of them had become emancipated from superstition and the priests since I last saw them, ten years ago. And I think I gave more of them a good start in the same direction. I left the snow a good three feet deep in northern New Hampshire. Here in three days found grass well started, and wheat lush and green.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

How Easy It Is.

How easy it is to spoil a day!
The thoughtless words of a cherished friend,
The selfish act of a child at play,
The strength of a will that will not bend,
The slight of a comrade, the scorn of a foe,
The smile that is full of bitter things—
They all can tarnish its golden glow,
And take the grace from its airy wings.

How easy it is to spoil a day
By the force of a thought we did not check!
Little by little we mold the clay,
And little flaws may the vessel wreck.
The careless waste of a white-winged hour,
That held the blessing we long had sought,
The sudden loss of wealth or power—
And lo! the day is with ill inwrought.

How easy it is to spoil a life—
And many are spoiled ere well begun—
In home-light darkened by sin and strife,
Or downward course of a cherished one;
By toil that robs the form of its grace,
And undermines till health gives way;
By the peevish temper, the frowning face,
The hopes that go and the cares that stay.

A day is too long to be spent in vain,
Some good should come as the hours go by;
Some tangled maze may be made more plain,
Some lowered glance may be raised on high.
And life is too short to spoil like this
If only a prelude, it may be sweet:
Let us bind together its thread of bliss,
And nourish the flowers around our feet.

—Watchman.

A Bit of Bird Gossip.

Where do we come from? That is a difficult question for a gull to answer who has never sat for hours studying the surface of the earth from a big round ball or a dog-eared geography, as I know scores of you boys and girls hav to do. Besides, we are only interested in the surface of waters, and only inhabit the land at breeding-times, when my pretty mate wishes to find a snug place for her eggs, so the little baby gulls will hav no trouble when they first see the blue sky and sparkling water. We are a wandering set of fisher-birds, with the most wonderful pair of wings, the power and beautiful mechanism of which enable us to dart so swiftly to and fro, now floating lightly poised in mid-air, and the next moment lost to sight on the far horizon, or cleaving the skies, as though seeking to reach the very heavens. Would not you love to fly, little boy, and you, little girl? Well, if a fairy godmother should ever giv you the chance of selection from all the wings of birds, I, of course, think that the wings of a sea-bird are most attractiv; for are we not beautiful, and can we not endure? Our name, as given us by your scientific men, who seem to know more about us than we do ourselvs, is Larus, "a genus of web-footed birds of the family of Laridae." Some of your audacious tars call us "Mother Carey's chickens." Who Mother Carey is I do not know, nor do I care, but that word chicken sticks in my craw, and makes my feathers stand on end, I get so angry, so I hav to dive three times as deep in the cold, blue water to cool off my proud, free spirit. Chicken, indeed! Where is the resemblance? Do we scratch, and cackle, and strut, and crow like those little land birds you call chickens, and which you keep to supply you with tiny eggs to eat?

Show me a bird our equal! Who can fly straight in the face of a storm and never waver? Who can perform such varied and beautiful evolutions high in the air when the sky and water are both calm and as blue as azure, so you scarce know where each meets the other, when gazing out to sea? Can any bird equal us fishing? Could a cork bob up more lightly on the crest of a wave than one of us trim little sailors?

Suppose I describe one of the daintiest of these freedom and liberty loving little feathered mothers—my mate—and what a splendid first mate she is! She flies at my side just as steady and strong as one of the finest of us male birds; her eyes are as sharp, keen, and fearless as his majesty, the eagle's. Her breast is as white and downy as the fleecy clouds above us, or the glittering foam she dips it in. None is so fascinating or so majestic as this pearly gray gull, with her long, narrow, black tipped wings. One moment far behind you, the next she sweeps past with easy, graceful flight, so close you can see the eyes which never flinch from the wildest, most piercing gale; then, before you know it, she will be far ahead of the swiftest steamer. I hav said so much in praise of her wonderful wings that I will not hav much time to tell you about her two feet, or paddles, rather. She has toes as well as you, but such funny ones, and only three, all fastened together by a web, like your waddling, quacking ducks (ducks are a distant relation of ours). She also has a small hind toe not fastened in the web. Sometimes some of us do not hav this little hind toe at all, but my mate has, for she is perfect, and you should see her lovely eggs. One season she only had two, but last season we had three of the finest, largest ones on the cliff, and our three little ones are now grown large and strong, and hav wandered as far as the Gulf of St. Lawrence—so a big white petrel from there told me the other stormy day when we met on Lake Michigan and dined together off a delicious lot of silvery fish the waves cast up where the water was shallow over a sunken pier. I suppose many a boy has fished for hours off that pier, but I know there was never such fishing going on as we did that March morning. Our family is a very large one; has first cousins way down on the coast of South America, and away over on the other side of the world. We all follow fishing for a living, but cannot dive very deep, so think the smaller fish which swim near the surface the daintiest kind of food, and are very thankful for them, and, in fact, for anything we find fit to eat floating on the water. Do we stay long in one place? Oh, no; we are continually on the wing, and the stormier the weather the better we like it; but this reminds me that I hav stopped unusually long in talking to you of myself, mate, and friends, so as the wind is rising and the waves beginning to put on their white caps, I think you had best run in the house while I fly out to sea. Flap! flap! Good-bye! good-bye!

Correspondence.

MURRAY, IDA., March 7, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you a few lines. I go to school, and learn very fast. My teacher's name is Miss Gilkey. We hav fifty-five scholars. I study reading, spelling, arithmetic, and grammar. I am ten years old. I hav one pet—a cat. I am a little Freethought girl. I hav a little sister; her name is Helen Vera Erwin, and "Helen" is after Helen Gardener, for we hav her book, and think it is splendid.

THERESA ERWIN.

SCOEDER CORNERS, March 17, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I read the Children's Corner: and I saw so many little folks in it that I thought I would like to be among them. I hav the "Story Hour," and papa says that he will get me the "Little Lessons for Little Folks." I am ten years old. I hav four brothers and two sisters. One of my sisters and two brothers are in Kansas City. I would hav written sooner, but I liv a mile from the post-office. EDITH BROWN.

BOZEMAN, MON., March 23, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav seen so many letters in the Children's Corner that I thought I would try and write one. I am twelve years old, and am in the Fifth Reader. I do not go to school, but study at home. Papa does not take THE TRUTH SEEKER, but a friend givs it to him. We hav a dog that sits up in a chair. His name is Fido. I think I am making my first letter too long, so I will close. If you think this fit to publish, I would like to see it in print.

Yours truly, MARY DAVIES.

ELMTREE FARM, W. GLOUCESTER, MASS., March 31, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am very fond of chickens. I hav nineteen hens. Part of them are Plymouth Rocks. Last year, after one of my hens hatched a brood of chickens, one of them got stepped on, and I buried it, and put a shingle by its grave, on which I wrote:

My birdie Bopeep fell fast asleep,
And I had no power to wake her;
I dug her a grave in this lovely place
Without help from the undertaker.

I hope you will think this worth printing in the Corner for a little girl ten years old. Truly yours, MARION BENNETT.

VOLO, ILL., March 20, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav read the Children's Corner in THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since its introduction with much interest. I am especially pleased to see so many letters from the dear little ones. It tells plainly that superstition has lost its foothold, and is fast sliding away. Now, I am an old woman, having traveled the uphill of life without any "ism" or "ite" to shackle my progress; am now, as the old saying is, slipping back into childhood; therefore, I do not see why I am not entitled to a little place in the Children's Corner for an original poem, which I thought perhaps some of those bright little letter-writers might like to read. We will entitle it

HELP EACH OTHER.

Little words in kindness spoken
Fill the saddest heart with joy,
But those of scorn to the down-trodden
May perhaps a life destroy.

We little know how much depends,
For weal or woe, on one another;
'Tis selfishness that scorns the weak
And loudly cries "He's not my brother."

Link by link we're bound together
By one long, electric chain;
'Tis all in vain the tie to sever,
Echo says, "In vain, in vain."

If we are made the stronger one,
Should we the weak disdain?
"No," our conscience answers, "Never!
The strong the weak sustain."

If we would study nature's laws,
True lessons there we'd find,
To fill the heart with sweetest joy,
And purify the mind.

'Tis there the bright and lovely rose,
Outshining any green,
Guards with care the tiny flower
That by its side is seen.

No envy there, no selfish hate;
They sweetly bloom together.
And each, in language pure and strong,
Cries, "Mortals, help each other!"

MRS. E. HOWARD.

DALEVILLE, IND., March 23, 1887.

MISS SUSAN WIXON: As I hav not written to you lately, I will try and write again. I think the pictures are very nice. I like to look at them. I think the United Brethren church at Daleville will play out before many years, for some of them now won't even shake hands with their brethren.

Dear Miss Wixon, I would like to see the day when this country would be ruled by Freethought. I think there would be a most beautiful time. I love to read the children's letters. I think it is a nice thing to hav them write. It teaches them to think what is right. I hope you will still remain thinking those beautiful thoughts and expressing them to the children. It pleases me to think you can. How I wish I could. I would like to be somebody in this world, and I am going to try and see if I can't be. As ever, I remain

Your friend, SALLIE REMEBURG.

OSAGE MISSION KAN., March 6, 287.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav been going to school this winter. I missed two days on account of sickness. On the last day we made a surprise dinner for the teacher. After dinner we had a few exercises, and then the teacher treated to candy. When school was dismissed we all bade our teacher good-bye. I came to town to learn dress-making. I am learning under Mrs. Shepherd, and boarding with Mrs. Shefer. Asa has been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER for over a year. We all like it ever so much. It has been raining for two days, but has now cleared off nicely. If this will do I would like to see it come out in the paper. From your friend, JULIA SIMMONS.

VINELAND, N. J., April 3, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Your printer's poem of April 2, 1887, in THE TRUTH SEEKER, brought to my mind a poem that I read in a Utica paper about seventy years ago, when I lived within eight miles of Utica, and I think they must be from the same author. Can you giv me the author of yours? They both seem to come from Utica, where K T J resided, as they said, about seventy years ago.

Respects for yours and the Children's Corner,

JOHN GAGE.

[We do not know the author of the poem. It was copied from another paper, and there was no hint of its author.—ED. C. C.]

MOUND CITY, MINN., March 7, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am ten years old, and hav never written for the Corner nor for anything else, but I am not going to hav my darling kitty slandered, even by old Mr. Mitchell. I am sure if he had ever seen my kitty he would never hav written such a letter. Talk about clean animals—my kitty would not be seen in the same field with a flock of chickens! I sleep with her every night, and I can walk twenty miles in a day, and if you saw me at dinner you would not think I do anything that is very unhealthy. My kitty is a nice, clean, gray-and-white beauty, and I hav never known her to kill a bird. If she is out hunting when I go to bed, she climbs the house, and comes right over my bed, and scratches on the roof, and I get up and let her in. Now, Miss Wixon, I would not ask you to publish this only on account of Mr. Mitchell's letter, and if you do print it, I will tell you some time about my dog.

Your friend, JENNIE SHUCK.

SPIRITUALISM Sustained By the Bible.

BY COL. JOHN R. KELSO.

CONTENTS:

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE BIBLE.
SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.
SPIRITUALISM A NECESSITY IN GOD'S GENERAL GOVERNMENT.
SPIRITUAL MEDIUMSHIP.
OBJECTIONS TO SPIRITUALISM ANSWERED.

Like all THE TRUTH SEEKER'S publications, the mechanical execution of the work is all that could be desired. Good paper, clear type—in short, a neat little volume.

The primary object of the work, as its title indicates, is to sustain Spiritualism, but the absurdities of the Christian religion, and the abominations of the old Jew book, get a terrible shaking up. The book contains much to interest every intelligent reader. . . . Colonel Kelso has done much acceptable work in the cause of Freethought and Liberalism all over the land. Send for his new book—read it—put it into the hands of every Christian; it will teach him that the way of the fool is foolishness. Every Liberal who reads it will certainly find his "Spiritual" strength renewed.—JOHN PECK.

The Anvil of God's Word.

Last eve I passed beside a blacksmith's door,
And heard the anvil ring its vesper chime;
Then, looking in, I saw upon the floor
Old hammers worn with beating years of time.

"How many anvils hav you had," said I,
"To wear and batter all these hammers so?"
"Just one," he answered; then, with twinkling eye,
"The anvil wears the hammers out, you know."

And so, thought I, the anvil of God's word
For ages skeptic blows hav beat upon;
Yet, though the noise of Paine, Voltaire was heard,
The anvil is unworn—the hammers gone.
—Chicago Current.

A LITTLE MORE ABOUT THE ANVIL.

Last evening, as I passed a joss-house door,
The sanctimonious preacher's voice I heard;
Then, stepping in, I heard him rant and roar
About the so-called "anvil of God's word."

This anvil is unworn, I heard him say,
It has withstood the wicked skeptic's thump
For ages, and will stand until the day
When the archangel blows his awful trump.

The sermon ended, straightway I arose
And said, "O parson, granting it be true
That that old anvil stands all skeptics' blows,
Can it withstand such blowers as Gabe* and you?"
B. L. Z. BUBB.

*The full name, Gabriel, is neater,
But amputation saves the meter;
And though the angel's lost a foot,
He still can soar, and likewise toot.

The Village Bonnet.

Of all the nymphs that e'er were seen
Careering o'er the village green,
There was not one, I wot full well,
Looked half so sweet as Isabel,
With her light village bonnet.

So light her step, so brisk her tread,
So merrily she tossed her head,
That every swain upon the heath
Would strain his eye to look beneath
The same light village bonnet.

A sunny brow that bonnet decked;
A smile that sorrow never checked
Glowed in those eyes of living blue,
While many a grateful beggar knew
That same light village bonnet.

A change came o'er that happy scene;
A priest rode o'er that village green,
And by her simple beauty won,
In evil hour he looked upon
The maid's light village bonnet.

Her eye grew dim, her step grew slow,
Her cheek grew white as Alpine snow,
For tales of goblins, flames, and hell
Had broke the heart of Isabel—
With her light village bonnet.

Her laugh grew wild; o'er brake and dell
Now wanders crazy Isabel,
And weed and flower and thistle down
Are strangely stuck upon the crown
Of that light village bonnet.

Books.

"The New God," by Samuel P. Putnam, is also published by The Truth Seeker Company, New York. The author of "The New God" has written several other works of the same character, being "Problems of the Universe," "Ingersoll and Jesus," "Waifs and Wanderings," etc. The author has, with unstinted zeal and a courage that never wavered, seized bodily upon the fanaticisms and superstitions which still permeate a portion of the civilization of the nineteenth century, and endeavored to expose, by rational reasoning and a host of self-evident axioms, the utter fallacy of certain features of the divine doctrin and its attendant superstitions. In his present work, which givs evidence of clear-sightedness, impartiality, and keen judgment, the author begins by tersely remarking that "it is an open secret that man has always made his gods. He has had the power to consult his own taste, like the artist who paints the picture or carves the statue. If the gods hav been bad, it is because man, the maker, has been a bungler. He has not made good use of his material. It has seemed," continues the author, "in the history of the world, as if man wanted to deceive himself with his own splendid creations. We like to feel that the universe is our friend; that the sun loves us, and because he loves us givs the blessed light; that nature is interested in our welfare, and the winds of summer blow expressly for our benefit, and the seas roll softly in order that our ships may come to land. Just as every man has his hobby he has his pet superstition. Every god that man has made has been at heart a representation of the tragedy of life. It is man's protest against the awfulness of fate. In old times the priest and the medicin-man were one and the same. Their function is similar—so long as there is disease there must be medicin, and so long as there is suffering there must be theology. As Ingersoll says, the best way to make men believe in gods is to increase the number of earthquakes and cyclones. If there was an earthquake every day the churches would be thronged." Such is the manner in which the author opens his subject. He unhesitatingly asserts his belief in the non-existence of a divine being, but believes there is some great and universal creativ power, and in the latter assertion is most discreet, for there are few who are not willing to concede this to be a truth.

There are some who claim that the mighty universe is nothing more than a freak of chance; that not only the earth, but the greater heavenly bodies, were created and fashioned merely through chance. Upon mature reflection, however, those who possess the faculty of clearly reasoning will sooner or later abandon this idea as being absurd. Ships, buildings, great bridges, tunnels, railroads, and cities are not created by chance. They are each and all formed for a purpose, and carry out this purpose until age has rendered them unfit for use, or a destroying element has caused ruin and devastation. The chance theory, in fact, has long been regarded by profound and earnest thinkers as utterly impossible in view of all attending circumstances. The author touches upon this question, but is too wary to commit himself upon one side or the other, and is content with dealing in abstract questions and statements, which, in truth, is characteristic of his whole work. Paradoxical assertions will not tend to enlighten the public on the simplest of questions, and on such a profound question as the existence of a deity they will certainly mystify more than ever. For instance, the author says: "If there really were a God, there would be no belief in God. The fact that there is a belief in God is proof positiv that there is no such being, and the more universal that belief, the stronger the demonstration of Atheism." This sounds very much like chop logic. When a thing is known to actually exist, what more natural than to believe in that existence? If a man was positivly known to be dead, all the arguments that could be brought forth to prove that he was still alive would be utterly fruitless, and vice versa. The most vital part of the question is absolute certainty one way or the other, without which nothing can be expected to take definit shape. "First of all," says the author, "the new God must be a God of law, and not of miracle. In the progress of civilization miracles hav been entirely abolished. . . . So long as this God represents the ideal of humanity—the beautiful, the sublime, the progressiv—so long as it grows better with experience and is thoroughly humanitarian; so long as it is poetic, artistic, rhythmic, evolutionary; so long as it and science will not quarrel, so long will we keep the new God." Thus the author brings his work to a close. It contains many faults and inconsistencies, but likewise contains earnest reasonings and sound arguments, and can be read, if not with profit, at least with some degree of interest.—Galveston News.

WE hav received a copy of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1887, and find it a handsome specimen of the typographic art, beautifully illustrated, and brimful of useful and interesting information. The article on "Sunday, Oath, and Blasphemy Laws" alone is worth ten times the price of the book. "Liberty," an address, by Grover Cleveland; "The Coming Dawn," by D. Louis Bodge; "The Right to Testify," by F. M. Holland; "The American Secular Union," by Samuel Putnam; "The Parson," a story, by Si Slokum, are among the contents. Price 25 cents. The Truth Seeker Company, publishers, 28 Lafayette Place, New York.—Maurepas, La., Gazette.

"Try-Square; or, The Church of Practical Religion." The author says that modesty constrains him to withhold his real name, and to substitute for it the assumed name, "The Reporter." He reports the transactions and discourses at "Uncle Job's New Church," in the rural district of Pinville, which is supposed to be located in some corner of the ample and fertil brain of this "prematurely worn-out court stenographer." ## Obituary.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: With this I send you a paper containing an account of the death of my father, B. F. Kershner. He was an earnest Liberal, and a great admirer of your good paper.

Although he was a great sufferer from a disease which baffled the skill of his physicians, yet he bore all his sufferings with the most heroic courage. Never was he heard to complain, and he died as he had lived, an earnest Liberal; and though we miss him as none can tell, yet we hav no fear for him, for we feel that he is at rest, free from the trials and hardships of this world.

The funeral was held from the house, March 16th, under Masonic auspices. At his request no minister was present at his funeral, but our good friend, H. L. Green, delivered a very appropriate address.

LILLA C. KERSHNER.

Danville, N. Y., March 27, 1887.

From the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle Mar. 15.

The improvement in the condition of B. F. Kershner, of Landay Hill, near Danville, was reported in our columns last week, and it was sincerely hoped his speedy recovery would follow. But it was not to be, and on Sunday morning last, at 3 o'clock, he passed peacefully away after two weeks of intense agony. His difficulty was one which baffled the skill of his attending physicians, who say no similar case ever came under their observation. While afflicted with a severe cold, yet he was otherwise apparently in good health two weeks ago on Thursday last, when he visited Dansville on business. He went to a blacksmith's shop, among other places, where he was suddenly seized with a violent fit of choking, and a large bunch (caused by the violent swelling of the glands), in size as large as a goose egg, suddenly formed on one side of his neck. It was thought he would choke to death there, so serious was his condition. He was carried to the residence of his physician, Dr. Andrews, and Dr. Blake, who was passing by, assisted in alleviating his sufferings, but it was an hour or more before he was able to be carried home. His throat was black inside, and in a terrible condition, which seemed in a few days to yield to the treatment given. But a swelling soon showed itself on the other side of his neck, while little blood sacs formed in his throat, and shortly before his death the swelling on each side of his neck extended to the front, and was so hard and inflamed that nothing seemed to affect it in the slightest degree. On Saturday he had a violent choking spell, and endured agony almost intolerable. He was unable to lie down for days before his death. But a few minutes before he breathed his last he walked across the floor in the most excruciating pain, then went to his bed, and quietly lay down, closed his eyes, and peacefully entered upon his new existence. Mr. Kershner was fifty-seven years old in September last, and leaves an estimable wife and two daughters, young ladies who will mourn the loss of a most faithful and affectionate husband and father. No man in any community was more respected or generally liked than was Mr Kershner, and although not a follower of Christianity as taught in all orthodox churches, in his daily acts he exemplified the precepts of Christ. He was a decided Liberalist in his views, strong in his convictions, and fearless in his expression of them. Yet it would be hard to find a better citizen, husband, and father.

A Ballad of Ancient Oaths.

Ther ben a knyghte, Sir Hoten hight,
That on a time did swere
In mighty store othes mickle sore,
Whiche grieved his wiffe to here.

Soth, whenne she scofft, his wiffe did oft
Swere as a ladye may;
"I'faith," "i'sooth," or "lawk" in truth
Ben alle that wiffe wold say.

Soe whenne her good man waxed him wood,
She mervailed much to here
The hejeus sound of othes full round
The which her lord did swere.

"Now, pray thee, speke and tell me eke
What thing hath vexed thee soe;"
The wiffe she cried: but hee replied
By swereing moe and moe.

He sweren zounds which be Gog's wounds,
By bricht Marie and Gis,
By sweit Sanct Ann and holie Tan,
And by Bryde's bell, ywis;

By holie grails, by 'slids and snails,
By old Sanct Dunstan bauld,
The virgin faire that him did beare,
By him that Judas sauld;

By Arthure's sword, by Paynim horde,
By holie modyr's teir,
By Cokis breath, by Zooks and's death,
And by Sanct Swithen deir;

By divells al'e, both greate and smalle,
And all in hell there be,
By bread and salt, and by Gog's malt,
And by the blody tree;

By him that worn the crown of thorn
And by the sun and mone,
By deir Sanct Blane and Sanct Fillane,
And three kings of Cologne;

By the gude Lord and his sweit word,
By him that herryit hell,
By blessed Jude, by holie rude,
And eke be Gad himsell!

He sweren soe (and mickle moe)
It made man's flesch to creepen,
The air ben blue with his ado
And sore his wiffe ben wepen.

Giff you wold know why sweren soe
The good man hight Sir Hoten,
He been full wroth, because, in soth,
He leesed his coler boten.

A double-page picture contrasting science and theology, showing how the one has labored for human advancement, and how the other has always opposed it.

Price, six copies, 30 cents; one dozen, 50 cents twenty-five copies for $1; one hundred copies for $3. We wish that the friends of Freethought would distribute thousands of these telling pictures.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

News of the Week.

CAPTAIN SAMUELS, who sailed the yacht Dauntless from New York to Cork harbor, losing the race with the Coronet, is back to New York. He explains his defeat on the theory that the Coronet was the better boat and sailed faster.

DR. MCGLYNN has gone West on a lecture trip.

JOHN T. RAYMOND, the actor, died at Evansville, Ind., April 10th, aged 51.

THE season jumped from winter to summer last Sunday, and the thermometer stood at 85 in the shade.

THERE is as yet no clue to the name or slayer of the girl found murdered near Rahway, N. J., a month ago.

THERE is a conference of Latter-Day Saints, or Mormons, at Kirkland, O. President Joseph Smith spoke last Sunday condemning polygamy.

MAYOR HEWITT tried to enforce the liquor law last Sunday, and succeeded in making a good deal of trouble for persons who wanted a drink. One hundred and seven excise arrests were made, and many merchants were arrested for having their stores open.

MR. BLAINE, of Maine, was taken suddenly ill at Fort Gibson, I. T., one day last week, with bronchitis and symptoms of pneumonia. At last accounts he was improving.

CHICAGO carpenters are on strike for 35 cents per hour.

THERE was rioting at Belfast, Ireland, last Sunday, as usual.

THE Democrats carried the Rhode Island State election, April 6th.

THE majority against prohibition in Michigan is now placed at 3,800 votes.

EUROPEAN immigration has set in early at this port. On some days last week there were nearly 5,000 arrivals.

EVANGELIST Sam Small, whom the Cincinnati Enquirer reported dying, is better, and is likely to get well.

JOHN GREENWALL, a sneak-thief, is under arrest charged with the murder of Lyman S. Weeks, of Brooklyn, who was shot in his house by a burglar last month.

THE Grand Jury in the case of Rector Ward, of Englewood, N. J., under arrest for shooting his wife, hav been charged by the judge that they may indict the clergyman for atrocious assault and battery with intent to kill.

THE New York aldermen passed some resolutions praising Peter Cooper, and had them engrossed and framed at a cost of $275, which they charged to the city treasury. Mayor Hewitt vetocd the appropriation, and the alderman passed it over the veto. Hewitt is Peter Cooper's son-in-law.

EARTHQUAKE shocks were felt on Sunday morning at Charleston, S. C., and at Burlington, Vt. As Sunday was Easter, celebrated in commemoration of the resurrection of Christ, on which occasion there were seismic disturbances, an earthquake on the anniversary is quite the proper caper.

A PETITION is in circulation among the priests of this vicinity asking for the signatures of all those who indorse the action of Corrigan in the case of McGlynn. The priests complain that they are bulldozed into signing it. The pope, it is reported, has recently conferred upon bishops the power to remove priests without trial.

CAPT. PAUL BOYTON has just completed a trip from Hudson, N. Y., to New York city in his india-rubber swimming clothes, and the feat has been much talked of in the papers. This week the captain appears as a feature of Barnum's circus, and it is suspected that the swim down the Hudson was one of the still foxy showman's advertising dodges.

TROUBLE IN ABRAM'S FAMILY.

And when Sarai dealt hardly with Hagar, she fled from her face.—Gen. xvi, 6.

Odds and Ends.

IT is believed that Hamlet must hav been reading Howells when he responded to Polonius's query with, "Words, words, words."

INQUIRER (Sunday A.M.): "Can you direct me to a place of worship, sir? I'm from Portland, Maine, and a stranger in the city." New York citizen: "It's pretty hard getting it nowadays, but I guess if you go over and whisper my name—Cooney—in Con Driscoll's family entrance keyhole, he'll let you in."

HE opened the door about two inches and said: "Is the agricultural editor in?" "I'm the agricultural editor. What can I do for you?" "I merely wanted to observe that in the manufacturing of printing-presses the Hoes hav raked in a good deal of money." Then he groped his way down stairs six steps at a time.

THE CHURCH SOCIAL.

Of all wildly exhilarating forms of enjoyment, the church social is most fascinating. It is positivly beatific in its influence. Every face wears such an expression of supreme happiness. And, best of all, it is innocent enjoyment. The unhallowed ballet is not yet an accompaniment of the church social. There is nothing sinfully theatrical about it. It is warranted to be pure, elevating, and instructiv in its tendencies; and the marvel is that men should be so carnal-minded as to forsake the church social for the "gilded dens of vice," in which they are supposed to disport themselvs if they decline its chaste delights.

The minister is the central figure at all church socials. He feels it his duty to hav a smile and a word for each individual present. The smile, deepening often into a benevolent grin, is a fixture on his face all evening as he goes tripping jauntily from room to room, delivering himself of such edifying remarks as these:

"Ah, Sister Blank, so glad to see you! Brother Blank here? Yes? I must look him up. Ah, Brother Simpson, glad to see you! Pleasant little affair, isn't it?"

"Aw—aw—ye-e-s," says Simpson, with a mighty yawn, having been rudely aroused from a pleasant nap by his wife, who has wheedled him into coming to what the wretch calls "one of those idiotic church things."

The minister feigns ignorance of the yawn, and goes merrily on his way.

"Ah, Sister Crane, you here? But we can always depend on your coming. And here is Sister Bloom. How do you do, Sister Bloom? I was sure you'd be here. Brother Bloom here? Ah, here he comes. Glad to see you out, Brother Bloom. Delightful little affair, isn't it? Ah, Brother Baxter, ever so glad to see you. Sister Baxter came, didn't she?"

"Oh, yes: we're all here."

"Ah, that's right. Always glad to see the little folks. This your little girl? Can't you kiss me, little birdie? Lovely child, Brother Baxter. What would our homes be without these little blossoms in them? Well, well, here is Grandma Dean. So glad to see her out. How remarkably well you're looking. Is your rheumatism troubling you much this winter? No? I'm glad of that. Bless my soul if there ain't Sister Peters! How do you do?"

"Real well, thank you."

"That's right. Saw you at church Sabbath."

"Oh, yes; and it was such a privilege to hear your beautiful sermon; it really—"

"Oh, yes, Mr. Lastly, it was such a beautiful—"

"I cried over it."

"So beautiful, and yet so practical."

"We all enjoyed it."

"So many spoke about it."

"Charming!"

"It was really beautiful."

"Oh, yes, Mr. Lastly, it really—"

"I'm glad you liked it," says the pastor, able at last to make himself heard above this babel of delicate flattery. He vanishes aurily in the direction of a weary-looking group of spinsters sitting in a stiff row on a sofa.

"Ah, ladies, enjoying yourselvs, I see. That's right; that's right. That's what we're here for. Having a nice time, Miss Shanks?"

"Delightful!" cries Miss Shanks, to whom not a soul has spoken since her arrival; "I always do enjoy our socials."

"Ah, glad of it. They are happy little gatherings, and I think it does us all good to meet in this way often. How happy our dear little people are out in the other room!"

The "dear little people," happy after the manner of hyenas and wildcats, are yelling and racing all over the house to everybody's infinit discomfort and disgust.

"I don't see what on earth anyone wants to bring a tribe of young ones to a church social for," says Mrs. Bloom, behind her fan to Mrs. Blank. "If I was managing this affair, I'd send about twenty-nine youngsters home in ten seconds."

Behind other fans other persons are saying:

"Awful bore, isn't it?"

"Oh, dreadful! I'm not coming to another one soon."

"Mercy on us, Miss Roarer is going to sing!"

"And Mr. Spouter is going to read 'The Creeds of the Bells.'"

"We shall all die!"

"Hear those brats out in the refreshment room."

"Did you get any refreshments fit to eat?"

"No! Who ever does at an affair of this kind?"

"See old Mrs. Dean stretched out on the sofa, sound asleep."

"Deacon Goode has been fairly snoring all evening."

"Look at Mr. Lastly. He looks utterly tired out. I should think he'd be bored to death."

"Oh, now they're going home."

"Good!"

"Such a delightful time!"

"We really must hav another one right away!"

"Yes, indeed!"

"Such a grand success!"

Gems of Thought.

WHILE from the effects of increased intelligence and civilization the rule of tyranny and persecution has become somewhat lessened, it does not appear that amorousness and sensuality hav yet become obsolete on the part of the Christian clergy.—D. M. Bennett.

IT is becoming a religious duty to enjoy life. A man ought to be ashamed to say in the face of nature that "life protracted is protracted woe." I venture to say that nine times out of ten the man that declares life to be only "vanity and vexation of spirit" would not be the man to start a subscription to buy the winter's coal for a poor widow. The world is finding out that the people who call life so hard and undesirable are the ones to make it hard and undesirable for others. We do not take a man for a saint because he reads the Bible, nor for a sinner because he does not. We no longer weigh men in the scales of orthodox piety. If a man is very good, we do not look to see him go to church on Sunday, but he may take some sick neighbor out to ride. We cannot estimate the religion of men by holding them up by their belief or disbelief of the Christian dogmas. I would prefer to hav men say of me when I am gone, "He helped to make the world a brighter and better place for men to liv in," than to hav it said, "He called the Bible the best book in the world, and believed Jesus Christ to be divine."—L. K. Washburn.

WHY should scientific teaching be limited to week days? Ecclesiastically-minded persons are in the habit of calling things thoy do not like by very hard names, and I should not wonder if they brand the proposition I am about to make as "blasphemous," and worse. But, not minding this, I venture to ask, Would there really be anything wrong in using part of Sunday for the purpose of instructing those who hav no other leisure, in a knowledge of the phenomena of nature, and of man's relation to nature? . . . If any of the ecclesiastical persons to whom I hav referred object that they find it derogatory to the honor of the God whom they worship, to awaken the minds of the young to the infinit wonder and majesty of the works which they proclaim his, and to teach them those laws which must needs be his laws, and therefore of all things needful for man to know, I can only recommend them to be let blood, and to be put on low diet. There must be something very wrong going on in the instrument of logic, if it turns out such conclusions from such premises.—Huxley's Lay Sermons.

IT is useless to try to maintain a Puritan Sunday on the statute books, because the state house is no longer the servitor of the church-member, but of the voter. Sunday must stand or fall upon its merits. It will die out from our civilization exactly in proportion as Christianity does, and this nation will never consent to keep it as a monument of the dead. We shall probably hav, in the near future, neither a Puritan nor a continental-European Sunday, but an American Sunday. The American one will undoubtedly follow the old maxim, that "the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath."—Boston Advertiser.

CHRIST supersedes in the most peremptory manner one of the commands of the Decalog—that as to the observance of the Sabbath, his views and teaching as to which no ingenuity can reconcile with the Mosaic law.—Greg's Creed of Christendom

WHATEVER may hav been the opinion and practice of the early Christians in regard to cessation from labor on Sunday, unquestionably the first law, either ecclesiastical or civil, by which the Sabbatical observance of that day is known to hav been ordained, is the edict of Constantine, 321 A D., of which the following is a translation: "Let all judges, inhabitants of the cities, and artificers rest on the venerable Sunday. But, in the country, husbandmen may freely and lawfully apply to the business of agriculture, since it often happens that the sowing of corn and planting of vines can not be so advantageously performed on any other day; lest, by neglecting the opportunity, they should lose the benefits which the divine bounty bestows on us."—Chambers's Encyclopedia.

I HAV known several Atheists, and never one who seemed to think that the universe was a failure, or to regret that he had come to be a citizen of it. Perhaps they were not real Atheists. Some of them imagined themselvs so, but they seemed to me to hav an implicit faith in God, vastly more honorable to him and reverent in them than the explicit faith of the majority; and others clearly recognized that what they denied was—not God, but the validity of any definition of God current in the churches.—John W. Chadwick.

"BUT the spirit was to lead the apostle into all truth," says the reader. That declaration needs careful consideration. It would teach that the apostles were infallible. But they were not infallible; for they taught that Jesus would come again to earth in their own lifetime, and events hav shown that they were mistaken.—Henry Blanchard.

HOW TAXPAYERS ARE FOOLED.

Notes and Clippings.

In a speech at St. Louis, previous to his illness, Mr. James G. Blaine spoke of Thomas Jefferson as "that great man who, in the annals of American greatness, should stand next to Washington."

There is nobody in Albany, says the personal observer of the New York Sun, that earns money quicker than the chaplains of the Senate and Assembly, who offer every morning a prayer of from two to five minutes in length, at $5 per prayer.

M. Rochefort, the French statesman, has a strong article in D'Intransigeant, of Paris, directed against the pope, who, he says, sacrificed France to Germany in the Chinese missions question, and is now aiding in the work of Germanizing Alsace-Lorraine. The article concludes: "If most of our ministers were not known to fast on Fridays, the government would answer these insults by recalling the French embassador to the Vatican, and suppressing the religious budget."

An illustration of the difficulty attending the discovery of the real condition of the Chinese mind in regard to the progressiv policy obtaining in western countries is contained in the following anecdote, for the authenticity of which a writer in the Boston Daily Advertiser vouches. A bishop of the Episcopal church was returning from China with his servant, whom he thought he had converted to Christianity. Whenever the bishop held services in the cabin of the steamer in which they both were passengers, the servant attended and took part very devoutly in the responses, etc. One day a passenger observed the servant on his knees worshiping an image of Buddha, with candles and joss sticks, and he asked the servant if he was not a Christian, and elicited the following reply: "As I am in the employment of the bishop it is my duty to observe the Christian ceremonies when my master does so, but when I am acting for myself, of course, I worship according to my own Buddhist faith."

One gallon of whisky costs about $3, and contains on the average sixty-five ten-cent drinks. Now, if you must drink whisky, buy a gallon and make your wife the barkeeper; then, when you are dry, giv her ten cents for a drink. When the whisky is gone, she will hav, after paying for it, $3.50 left, and every gallon thereafter will yield the same profit. This money she should put away in the savings bank, so that when you hav become an inebriate, unable to support yourself, and shunned and despised by every respectable person, your wife may hav money enough to keep you until your time comes to fill a drunkard's grave.—Ex.

A remarkable strike is going on in the island of Scio. The population in some of the parishes belonging to the Orthodox Greek church hav been backward in the due payment of tithes or church rates, or some other ecclesiastical due. The priests hav appealed to the bishop of Scio, who has attempted to help his clergy by putting these recalcitrant parishes under the interdict. As a consequence of this extreme measure, with which western Europe was familiar in the Middle Ages, the clergy are obliged to abstain from the regular exercise of their ministry. They may neither baptize, marry, celebrate mass, nor even bury the dead. The laity hav taken the last duty upon themselvs, and there hav been several funerals without any ecclesiastical ceremony. They hav appealed to the secular governor of the island, however, requesting him to compel the priests on strike to return to their duty. The governor has applied to the porte for direction in this delicate question, so that the final settlement of the quarrel between the Christian pastors and their flocks is now resting in the hands of the porte, a body of Mohammedans.

A Mormon bishop from Idaho, stopping in St. Louis, revealed to a reporter of the New York Herald a few hints of what the Mormon church might do if it chose. "The Mormons," he said, "are not politically ambitious; they only want to regulate their own affairs. If we wanted a state, we could hav it. What is to prevent us from capturing Nevada? There are not more than sixteen thousand voters in the sovereign state of Nevada now, of which nearly five thousand are Mormons. What is to prevent the Mormons from dumping eight thousand citizens into Nevada and taking possession of the government of the state in a year? Nothing! And, by the way, this thing is just now seriously considered. If we had three electoral votes on the political market we might hav friends, and plenty of them, in Washington. With two United States Senators to fight our battles, and a full-fledged Congressman in addition to our Utah delegate, we might get a more respectful hearing. Then, too, we might hav influence enough to get Utah admitted, and later Idaho. There is nothing to prevent the Mormons, if they take it in their heads to engage in practical politics, from controling Nevada and Utah, and holding the balance of power in Idaho and Arizona."

The Sporting and Turf Record for April printed a reproduction of Bougereau's famous picture, "The Nymphs and the Satyr," and Anthony Comstock made the publishers tear out the leaf containing the picture before mailing the paper. The original of the picture is in the barroom of the Hoffman House, and may be seen by anyone. The New York Sun of Sunday givs the soapboiler's agent this advice: "We commend to Anthony Comstock a field for his activity that he hasn't even touched. Instead of expending his energies and the despotic power of his office upon suppressing the distribution of works of art among people in moderate circumstances, as in the case of the Sporting and Turf Record, let him go boldly into those far richer repositories of pictures that he wishes to destroy, the houses of the rich, and all loan collections. In numerous New York dwellings there are some of the loveliest creations of modern art or ancient art, the cause of great pleasure and valuable cultivation to a great number of good people, but worthy of destruction by Mr. Comstock's standard. Let him demand admittance there and devote these art treasures to ruin. If he can't get in openly, let him sneak in, under plea of plumbing or fixing the telephone, or any way he likes, so as to get in. Then he may destroy perhaps a dozen canvases in a house. He will be arrested and punished, but a man of his stamp should be happy to stand martyrdom for his cause. It should be his grea est pleasure possible to become a martyr. : would certainly be to fair-minded, sensible people a pleasure to witness such martyrdom.

"Our Lord God."

Canst thou by searching find out God? canst thou find out the almighty unto perfection?

It is as high as heaven; what canst thou do? deeper than hell; what canst thou know? (Job xi, 7, 8).

No man has seen God at any time. If we love one another, God dwelleth in us (1 John iv, 12).

God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him (1 John iv, 16).

God is light, and in him is no darkness at all (1 John i, 5).

God is spirit; and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth (John iv, 24).

How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out (Romans xi, 33).

It may be considered irreverent and sacrilegious to want to know anything more about the "Lord God" than we hav been taught, and what the most religions tell us. But thinking people are not satisfied with much that the ancients believed was wise and true. The spirit of inquiry, the love of investigation, and the aspirations to know the truth cannot be restrained nor suppressed. Science is demanding proof and demonstration for all theories, systems, philosophies, doctrins, and faiths. It has thoroughly exploded and dissipated much that has been considered divine, sacred, and unquestionable. The Bible cosmology, geography, astronomy, and geology are gone. Its anatomy and physiology, its therapeutics, psychology, are gone and going into the vortex of oblivion also. It is not in the divine order, neither is it possible, for the mind to be arrested in its researches after truth. The beneficent influence science is continually bringing to alleviate misery, to rectify wrong and add to the sum of human welfare, givs the motiv and the stimulus for the most thorough and unrestricted prosecution of inquiry. The solemn and reverent question, "What is God, Whence and Where?" can no longer escape the crucial tests of science, but must be submitted to the same ordeal by which all minor questions are decided. Ideas of God hav been a vital, an awful, a solemn, and fearful factor in the past of human history. If we concede some good may hav resulted from them, we must admit there has been an immeasurable flood of evil. Error or falsehood in holy things is just as fruitful of wrong and suffering as mistakes elsewhere. Even more so, for the very divinity or sanctity of the subject has been invoked to justify the infliction of the extremest undeserved cruelty. It is done in the name and by the purported command of God.

The God that is made sponsor for such merciless barbarity must be investigated, tried, and sentenced before the tribunal of human justice. As civilization advances it is gradually improving its God. The God of a people generally represents its average intellectual and moral development. Men and nations always hav made, and will continue to make, a God after their own ideas. This right has been claimed and awarded.

No one has a right to force his God on another. The justice of this toleration is the most fully admitted and guaranteed where there is the most enlightenment.

As men grow in this freedom and exercise of rights, they will become more indifferent about the character and qualities of one another's gods, till they will find they can liv just as well without making or formulating a God. They will feel a manliness, a nobility, a mental and moral luxury, which those under the terror of a tyrant master or ruler never experience. "The truth will make us free," so free that we will refuse to voluntarily make ourselvs slaves to a master, even to one which we may hav the choice of selecting for ourselvs, and after our own image.

What do we really know of the meaning of the words, "Our Lord God?" Where did they come from, how did they originate? They are in the present use of medieval or modern origin. They originated in the barbarism of Europe, are antichrist and heathen. The word Lord is a title bestowed on man; the second, "God," is the title or name of a Saxon idol. Our Anglo-Saxon ancestors first began to mutter these sounds in their efforts to form into a dialect what we now call the English language. In that feudal period the chiefs and warriors were the superiors, and became the landholders; they were the land*lords*, the rulers, guides, and owners of the vassals. They were the lords to be feared, honored, and obeyed. They represented and exercised power and authority over the people. In this way the word "lord," with our English progenitors, became the symbol and synonym of power, authority, government, and rule everywhere in their dominions, on earth and in heaven. So that all teachings, lessons, precepts, principles, and commands that were impressed, administered, or enforced upon them were from the lord or lords that governed among them.

If they fancied anything was extremely good, too good and pure for a common, human, earthly lord, they would naturally ascribe it to a supposed superhuman, a spiritual, or heavenly lord, which their imagination could in that barbaric age as well as we can now, in a more enlightened one, originate. When the Latin missionaries were sent to Britain by Pope Gregory I., A.D. 590, to convert the islanders to Christianity, they impressed upon them the rites, ordinances, and observances of the Roman Catholic church, and cited them to the precepts, the religion, and authority of Jesus; he and his teachings should be their "lord" and guide hereafter. These Latin missionaries found this word among the heathens they were laboring to convert, and adopted it as representing in thought their Jesu Christi. So that in time, by use and association, it became established and written with a capital L as the English name for Jesus and his teachings. Here is its origin in connection with the Christian religion, and we see the devices, the methods, and reasons for our Catholic ancestors taking it from its local earthly origin, and transferring it to heaven as a title for their divinities. The title of the Greek divinity, Apollo, when translated into English, is the same word, lord.

The gods and divinities of all religions are believed by their worshipers to be wiser and better than themselvs. Men look to them as the dispensers of light and wisdom for their government. They pray and appeal to them for direction and guidance. The names of many heathen divinities, if translated into our English, would be "Lord;" and very properly too, because they represent the same thought that our English translators of the New Testament meant to convey to us in the word "Lord" when they translated it from earth and men to heaven and a divinity. And because they did this, and for no other reason, we must pronounce it reverently, think of it solemnly, and worship it humbly.

A lord, then, was originally a human ruler, master, director, guide; and as the term gradually became more universal, and in communities where the people had advanced in intelligence and freedom, and society was enabled by its growth in civilization to abolish the legal relation of serf, slave, and lord, or servant, vassal, and lord, they still retained the word "lord," and having no use for it to represent a class of men as teachers and controlers, they gave to it a more general, abstract, and indefinit application. Those principles and precepts, that sense of right and wrong, that feeling of moral obligation called conscience or convictions of truth, sometimes called in scripture "the grace of God," the "true light," the "Christ," all of which, so far as they became the guide and rule of human conduct, did the same thing as the lords had done, in regulating and restraining the individual, performing the function of the lord, became the lord and were called the Lord. So that now, as was the case when the scriptures were translated, pious or religious people speak of the "Lord Christ," "our Lord and savior Jesus Christ," and "Christ the Lord." Very often the word Lord is used alone, without defining any specific person or thing, as commanding, doing, directing, or guiding; then it represents one's own inward sense as the lord or guide. Sometimes the "Lord God" is used, or the "Lord is our God." In these expressions the lord within us, which means simply our sense and judgment of what is right, just, and good, must be obeyed as a solemn duty, or, in other words, must be honored, reverenced, and worshiped. In regarding it in this serious light it is our "God," it is our "Lord God," or this inward lord is our God.

The New Testament translators represent Jesus as often using the word "lord" in the original English sense. In his parables he applies it to men: the faithful servant of the man traveling in a far country, was addressed by his employer on his return, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy lord." He also called "a man that is an householder" "the lord of the vinyard;" again, "when the lord of the vinyard cometh." Paul and other scripture writers and translators are made to use it in numerous instances in its original proper sense, as it should be; and if its correct use had been adhered to throughout the translation, what a vast amount of delusion and superstition could hav been avoided! Spelling the word with the capital initial L, and urging it on the ignorant as the name of a divinity, was doubtless done with the design on the part of the priesthood of subjugating, through their fears and reverence, the minds of the masses, and exercising control over them through these means.

As a name of one of their idols or heathen divinities, the word gott—now spelled "God"—was used by our Saxon ancestors, in Saxony, while they were yet heathen barbarians and knew nothing of the Christian religion. These Teutons, called Angles and Saxons, were a better governed, a more aggressiv and warlike people, than the inhabitants of Britain. In their expeditions of conquest they invaded the islands, took possession, and enforced on the savage nativs their own habits, their ideas, language, and religion. They intermarried, and produced a race of descendants which has since been called the Anglo Saxon race. The Teuton element being dominant, they succeeded in establishing their faith and the worship of the Saxon Gott. They lived isolated in their island home as heathen idolaters till the Roman priesthood in its palmy days, with the armies of the empire at its command, invaded the islands with a view of converting the nativs to the Christian faith. The missionaries of course had to learn their language. They took Gott, the name of the nativ idol, and gave to it their own definition and character.

These Roman missionaries were themselvs idolaters, for in their own Christian land and in the imperial city of Rome itself, their churches and temples were adorned with the numerous images, idols, and pictures that they had captured from the temples of the heathen which their Christian armies had conquered in their efforts to propagate their own religion. So their affection and sympathy for the Anglo-Saxon Gott readily accepted him as an image of their divinity. They could easily bestow upon him such qualities and virtues as they fancied were becoming to a divinity. They could transfer to him the attributes and powers of their own adopted Hebrew Jehovah.

This they did, and after centuries of perseverance these savages were gradually converted to the Roman manner of worshiping their Gott. They adopted the Roman rites, ceremonies, and faith, retaining their Gott on which they bestowed their homage, and whom they honored with their religious devotions.

Enterprise and civilization are developed by the mixture of blood, races, and religions. England felt the effect of these forces, and through the Latin language and literature was enabled to establish civil government, and promote arts and letters, till the period arrived when they demanded a version of the scriptures in their own tongue. The translators, in changing the Latin and Greek into the crude compound tongue spoken by our Celtic ancestors, retained the names of their divinities and idols; the chief of which was Gott, which for brevity they spelled with a d, instead of two t's.

Where the Anglo-Saxon is spoken, the name of this heathen idol has been preserved; and those who worship the name giv to it a variety of qualities and definitions. They make it represent every degree of superstition, from the grossest fetichism of the barbarian up to the Chaldean conception of a heavenly father. It was to introduce the practical, rational, and only true views of what men should worship that Jesus and Paul placed in man the residence of the Jehovah of the Jews which Moses brought from Egypt, and the heavenly father of the Chaldeans, whose abode was among the planets. Man was the temple in which he resided; the "kingdom of heaven" where he ruled was in man, and he, or it, must be worshiped there. The Lord that was to guide them was intelligence, wisdom, and truth. It must be their "God." So our English translations of these ancient Greek ideas make those early teachers say, "The Lord is our God." "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God."

How simple and real these lessons are when understood! How easily understood when the truth has made the mind free enough to see them in their nativ simplicity!

If we had not been taught to reverence the murmurings and mutterings of these ancient progenitors of our faith, above and beyond the "light and truth" revealed to this age, we would not adhere with such tenacity to words, phrases, and superstitions that can do nothing but enslave and degrade us, and which Jesus and Paul found in their day, according to the record, to be the greatest impediments in their work of spreading that light and truth in the world through which alone it is possible it ever can be saved.

As the term "lord" belonged to the feudal ages, and to a limited class then, it is only by a gross perversion and misapplication of it from where it exclusivly belonged—to a class of men—that it was transferred from the secular to the sacred; and going back in time and history a thousand years, and conferring this title on Jesus—a title he would hav spurned with an indignant rebuke if it had been bestowed on him while living, for he refused even to be called good, or the spirit that animated him—and in thus deifying and personifying it, we hav all been led astray. The capital initial L with which it is printed, and the priestly fraud of elevating it from man to represent a divinity, and with solemn mockery and reverent airs exciting a ghostly halo of supernaturalism in connection with its use as a name, hav completely captured the masses to accept it with a blind faith and with awe and reverence, to bestow upon it a devotion as though it were all a reality.

Must men forever worship graven, or molten, or carved images? If forbidden by high authority to do so, will they, with the wildest ideality and romantic imagination, leave the earthly and material and in fancy traverse the celestial spheres in search of divinities, spiritual images on which to bestow their affectionate devotion, without any regard to the injunction of the first commandment: "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of anything that is in the heaven above, or in the earth beneath, or in the waters?" Such is the credulity, the weakness and servility, of poor human nature.

Our idolatry, if not as gross, is as real, as complete and unquestionable, as was ever that of the ancient Hebrews which Moses so emphatically condemned.

All this and much more was discovered, and is well known, by the committees who lately revised the New Testament, but they had not the courage to reveal it to the public. T. E. LONGSHORE.

How to Get a Free Sunday.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is always welcome to me, especially its columns of news, often worth more than any in the daily papers. Its share in opening the New York museums on Sunday would alone giv it a claim for gratitude on every Liberal. Let me say a word about what is being done to emancipate Sunday in Massachusetts. The House of Representativs has passed a bill which will, it is confidently hoped, be accepted by the Senate, and which would certainly please the governor, as he called for such legislation in his message. There is no doubt, at all events, of our soon getting rid of the law forbidding all amusements, "except a concert of sacred music," on Saturday evening; and its repeal will be due, not to any special agitation, but to the universal agreement of our people to break it openly. I remember when the theaters in Boston advertised that they would giv plays on Saturday evening, in order to prove that this statute could not be enforced. That law has been tried and found wanting, and for this reason will be repealed. The same sentence will, in all probability, be passed against the law prohibiting Sunday travel, and on the same ground. The community has agreed to break that law, and so the legislature is willing to take it away. Such a statute has to be turned into a dead letter before it can be repealed. Then, again, the rule of prohibiting labor and business is to be amended so as to allow us to buy milk, bread, newspapers, and medicin, hire horses and carriages, ride in the cars, send telegrams, and do other things which we hav been in the habit of doing every Sunday, in violation of the statute. I heard these points discussed in the State House. The legislators all agreed that, as the people did these things habitually on Sunday without interference, they ought to be allowed to do them legally. Getting shaved on that day has of late been made somewhat difficult in Boston, but the general habit of the people was so plain that this privilege, too, will be granted formally. It is not in the least a question of principle, but simply one of practice. Some opposition was made to permitting "the letting of yachts and boats," because this would be plainly sanctioning amusement on Sunday. But even here the House of Representativs decided to let the people retain all the liberty they had already taken for themselvs.

All there is to regret is that we hav not done what we wanted to do on Sunday more boldly, and broken the Sabbath more thoroughly. We can afford well enough to let Sunday remain a holiday, if we can be permitted to enjoy just as much amusement as on any other holiday, without having even to step over a dead letter. Of course, there is the same need of exercise and amusement on Sunday as on any other day; and it is our duty to see that those who hav only one day of leisure get a chance to enjoy that in the brightest and healthiest way possible. There ought to be more opportunities of amusement on Sunday than on any other day of the week. If the theater is to be open at any time, it should be then. That this would keep people from going to church is no argument against it, from our standpoint. There is no other demand of Liberalism so urgent as this. For my neighbors to question my right to vote, and to tax me in support of their churches, hurts them more than it does me. But it does hurt me, and wrong me grievously, for them to prevent my getting a book out of a public library, or entering a theater, or playing cards with my neighbors. As for observing fast day, Thanksgiving, and Christmas, that is all right. The only change that could be made for the better would be to observe Sunday in the same way. We need more holidays, not fewer. A great change is needed in public opinion, as well as in the statutes. As soon as we can make Sunday amusement fashionable and popular, we can easily make it legal. After all that can de done this winter to improve our Sunday laws, we shall hav to keep the old clauses fining "whoever takes part in any sport, game, or play, or is present at any dancing, or public diversion, show, game, or entertainment, except a concert of sacred music, unless such game, sport, play, or public diversion is licensed by the persons or board authorized by law to grant licenses in such cases." This last provision leaves, as was pointed out in the legislature, the key in the door of the play-house. That door is locked now; but it is easy to see how to unlock it. There is already a strong demand for concerts of lively music and lectures of an entertaining character. The theaters and halls are often open for such diversions on Sunday evening without interference from the police. As this taste grows, we shall hav dramatic readings and then we shall hav regular plays, first given illegally and finally legally. To help on this reform, it is important that our Sunday lecturers should take care to avoid the pulpit manner, as well as the pulpit's matter. That is the day, of all days, when we should take care not to be merely preaching sermons of unusual length. Ingersoll is a good example in this respect, and many others. Our halls, too, ought to giv just as much amusement on Sundays as our neighbors will tolerate. We ought to keep just as far in advance of the statute and of public opinion as we can without getting fined too heavily. Perhaps our money would go as far in that way as in any other. I am entirely against resisting any of our laws; but I am willing to risk suffering under them, when that is the best way to reform them, according to the men who make them. As to what we ought to do in our parlors and on our lawns, to make Sunday a day of healthy rest for our children and our neighbors, as well as for ourselvs, my readers need no instruction. All we need is courage. F. M. HOLLAND.

HIS COMMENTARIES UPON SOME REMARKABLE PERSONS AND EVENTS OF SACRED HISTORY.

Leaving Cain and Adah, his sister and wife, in the enjoyment of their honeymoon, we forge along into the bowels of the holy polyglot, finding the roughest kind of navigation—the true believer in, or wholesale swallower of, the scriptural Munchausens, with his flat-bottomed boat, that would skim over a light dew, flits serenely over the shoals in a bee-line, laughing at crooked channels, perplexing currents, annoying eddies, sunken reefs, and other impediments—until we reach that period of time when occurred the remarkable rainstorm, known as the "Flood," an uncalled-for piece of monstrosity on the part of the Lord, but which proved a field day for sharks, devilfishes, and other cheerful monsters of the deep. Great Jones! what a picnic those monsters must hav had! How, like the pharisees of the early days—and of today as well—they would hav cried out, had the power of speech been theirs (if snakes talked, why not sharks and things?):

"Great is the Lord! He feedeth us with exceeding quantity of food of the best quality. Verily God is love!"

Passing the flood epoch by a tack to windward, as it were, we come to the romantic story of Joseph, that immaculate paragon of virtue, the like of whom never before or since existed—well, not in this world, I'll bet. We read how, in the beginning of the end which found Joe famous and exceedingly well fixed, he was kidnapped by his big brothers one day and carried off and sold to the Egyptians, his brothers bringing home his coat smeared with sheep's blood, and telling the old man Jacob, their paternal ancestor, that Joe was gobbled up by a bear or other wild carnivorous beast, which pretty nearly broke the old gentleman all up.

We read on, and find Joseph a servant in the household of one General Potiphar, of Pharaoh's staff; we read how Mrs. Potiphar was mashed on Joseph, so dead gone on him, in fact, that she tried her level best, putting forth all her arts and blandishments, and showing off her charms to the best advantage, to inveigle him into the net she had spread for him, but to no purpose, Joseph being charm-proof, and not to be led astray; how, one day, when she had cornered him in a back-hallway, and he started to run away, she caught hold of his coat, which came off, and with which she, resolving to hav revenge for being scorned by a slave to whom she had made improper advances, ran screaming to her hubby, declaring Joseph had attempted liberties with her, showing the coat as proof, which was about as mean a thing to do as any woman of the present day would do to get the deadwood on the man she loves but who won't love back.

We read how Joseph was jugged, and how he was pardoned out by Pharaoh, on account of his interpreting some queer dreams which the latter had; how he was made governor-general of the land by Pharaoh; how he very shrewdly played his hand for all it was worth; how he at last got the old man, his father, and all his brothers, whom he forgave, down into Egypt, where they waxed strong in shekels, sheep, and steers, and where all went swimmingly until Joseph cashed in his checks.

This is about as romantic a story as appears in the polyglot, and we are led to remark that Joseph was a man of a million in the matter of resisting temptation under circumstances that would hav compelled the surrender of the other nine hundred and ninety-nine thousand nine hundred and ninety-nine as surely as Grant compelled the surrender of Vicksburg.

In this matter Joseph stood sui generis. Men like him were scarcer than white blackbirds. They are to this day. I don't believe there is a "Joseph" in the metropolis, unless he be Joseph Howard. Possibly he might act as Joseph of old did under like circumstances, but—well, I don't know. It is a terrible ordeal to subject a man to, unless his virtue is of the A1, copper-fastened variety. I think Joe Howard's virtue is of this grade, but then I should hav doubts about his legs in such a case. I am afraid his legs would refuse to do their office, and would not run away, albeit his virtue urged them to.

If Josephs are scarce, even in these days when the "unco' guid" are thicker than hairs on a goat in the cold season—let the "unco' guid" tell it—so are not the Mrs. Potiphar's. They abound on every hand, and go about seeking whom they may devour, so to speak. The woods are full of them, and the papers are kept busy chronicling their questionable doings. Unlike the Mrs. Potiphar of old, they catch on in almost every instance, causing an immense deal of trouble, all on account of the scarcity of Josephs.

Later on in the polyglot we come to the time when the Jews seceded from the realm of Egypt, and, 600,000 strong, under the leadership of one Moses, set out for a promised land flowing with milk and honey. Pharaoh, roiled at their secession, rallied his boys round the flag and put out after them, chasing them to the boarders of the Red Sea. Here, one night, occurred, as alleged, the most remarkable action on the part of a sea ever recorded. The report unblushingly tells us that the waters parted in the middle, like the hair of a dude, and that the Jews passed through the newly-opened avenue, with its wall of water on either hand, to the opposit shore, not a Jew of them all getting as much as a wet foot!

Then the report goes on to say that Pharaoh, seeing what a soft snap he had, in this new way of crossing a sea, pushed into the avenue with his hosts, and that, when his entire force was between the two walls of water, said walls collapsed, and Pharaoh and his hosts were scooped in at one fell swoop, as it were, by the waters returning to their level.

This is a most remarkable story, or rather a story of a most remarkable happening, and those who believe it, and yet scout the far less astonishing stories of Munchausen, must be very peculiarly constituted as a matter of fact. That the waters of a sea should divide, as stated, would seem to be too much to impose on the credulity of man. And yet they are all about us who profess to believe this yarn. "Oh, it was a miracle of the Lord's," they will tell you, and that settles the matter with them. Most assuredly would these "believers" believe that the moon was made of green cheese, if the book so stated, even though astronomy demonstrated that it was composed of material not differing greatly from that of our earth. Isn't it astonishing that men, too incredulous to believe that an egg can be made to stand on end without breaking, unless they should see it done, will swallow the above sea yarn, a "hand-me-down" from remote antiquity, at a single gulp, as a hungry salmon would a tempting shiner?

What gudgeons these mortals be, Puck might hav said; but he expressed it when he said fools, on the principle that the greater comprehends the less.

After long years and troublous times with his mutinous crew, Moses at length went the way of all flesh, and one Joshua came to the front as the leader of the "chosen people." It would appear that Joshua was a man after the Lord's own heart, for he proved to be a fighter and slaughterer who couldn't shed blood enough. As the waters did for Moses, so they were accommodating enough to do for Joshua, the river Jordan coming to a halt over against Jericho, the lower part of the river running off, allowing Joshua with his crowd to cross dry-footed to Jericho, where commenced his warlike career. And here I may say that Joshua was the Grant of the period. When he "moved on the enemy," he got there, no matter how many of his own men he might slaughter, Grant not being the least concerned with this regard. Josh had more celerity in his make-up than had Ulysses, but then he was squarely backed by the Lord—a dead sure thing, and no belief, as in Grant's case perhaps—and was spurred on by the Lord, who, being given to bloodshed, never at that time procrastinated, but went for the gory fluid without ado, Josh, like "Barkis," being "willin'," because he knew his ally would see him safe through the carnage.

The days and nights not being long enough for this man of "blood and iron," Joshua—"the original Jacobs" in this line—when on the warpath he would command the sun and moon to stand still that he might hav light for the slaughter undertaken; these luminaries actually obeying him, if we believe the old-time legend, which no true Christian thinks of disbeliving.

Believing this, is there anything a Christian wouldn't believe? If the book recorded that the sun and moon danced the can-can after Joshua's bloody victories; or that the sun was poured by the Lord into a pint bottle and given to Joshua that he might always hav light about him, the true Christian would suck it in as an eel would a "bob" of clams.

O credulity, thy name is man, when posing as a Christian! Well, stick to your credulity and rejoice in it if you can—I suppose you do. Believe with Talmage, the Lord's right bower, as he no doubt considers himself, that it is as easy to believe in God's omnipotence as to disbelieve, and be happy. Yes, scoop in and believe, and much good may it do you.

News and Notes.

The scenery within twenty-five and thirty miles of San Francisco, where the railroad follows along the Sacramento river, is indeed fascinating. The waters roll away in glorious beauty, and the undulating banks, rising into gentle and changing declivities, shine with mantles of delicious green, besprent with flowers of crimson and gold, azure, and purple, radiating like immense jewels in the sparkling verdure. For the first time this season I saw the wonderful green of the rain-beat sod of New England that flows upon the senses almost like music, it is so deep and lustrous, of which southern California cannot boast, with all its brilliance of climate, for this vivid color is the gift of many showers that constantly bathe the soil, and with mingling sunlight giv the fields their richest radiance. The great ships, the mighty wharves, the bustle of life, were various indications of approach to the metropolis of the Pacific shore. Just about sunset I arrive at Oakland, and meet my good pioneer friend, A. H. Schow, and go to his pleasant home, comfortable and sociable. Here is where our world-wandering pilgrim, D. M. Bennett, as related in his book, sojourned for awhile amid the delightful scenes of this prosperous land. Like him, I found Mr. and Mrs. Schow cordial companions, who do all that is possible for the entertainment of the Secular soldier, and who themselvs are in the front ranks of the long line of battle. It was by the energy and perseverance of Mr. Schow that there were lectures at Oakland, for this is one of the least promising places, together with San Francisco, that I hav yet visited. It is hard to rally the Liberals. They are so immersed in the multitudinous affairs of business and attractions of every sort that it takes a pretty strong magnet to get them out to Liberal lectures, and so I work in hopes of a brighter future. Desultory effort will not accomplish any result. This can be reached only by long-continued and organized labor. Mr. Schow has the genuin Scandinavian pluck, and he won't giv in so long as there is a chance, and by his generous aid I hav had a chance to do something for the advancement of Liberal fraternity.

Saturday evening my genial host and myself went over to the big city, the wonderful city, where the orient and the occident mingle in such picturesque array. Over the ferry we go, four miles wide, in the palatial boats, that seem like floating hotels in their splendor and comfort, and we come to the many-hilled city, whose blazing ramparts stretch away against the vast horizon, with a thousand lamps that seem to mingle with the stars. We plunge into the sea of activity that ceases not until three o'clock in the morning. Early to bed with the San Franciscans is in the "small hours" after midnight. These impetuous people cannot stop until the glowing round meets the morning's circling fire. We went to the Palace Hotel, where, if one has plenty of money, he can liv in a paradise of beauty. One might imagin that he had Aladdin's lamp, so glorious is the wealth and gorgeousness that is revealed as one traverses these glittering corridors. Beautiful pictures, roofs, walls, and marble and tessellated floors make one forget that there is anything in this world but happiness and luxury. I like to see it, I must confess, this splendid, brilliant world of animation, where the top of life appears in such bewildering magnificence. After all, cannot this glad panorama be the picture of what will be, not for the few, but for everybody, in the "good time coming?" I believe in making all human life a Palace Hotel. Why not? Richness, beauty, grace, art, luster, luxury—are not these blessings, and should not every man and woman hav a taste of them, and be like the gods? I am glad that Eve ate that apple and put this tremendous desire into the heart of every one of her children, to rival heaven in the glory of their earthly dominion. We went to the Baldwin, the Lick, and other elegant caravansaries where the golden key opens to merry feast and royal bed. Then we came across our friend, H. W. Faust, whose energy has pushed the campaign in San Francisco spite of many discouragements. He had his big telescope out, for the moon was riding through the sky in silvery majesty, and we took a look at the shining orb, and seemed to draw it almost to earth as we gazed into the mouth of its ragged, glimmering volcanoes, and could almost see its streets and houses, if it had any. However, I came to the conclusion that there was no Palace Hotel up there, and the "man in the moon" has to take his trips "afoot and alone," without any accommodations from outsiders. I don't think I will extend my pilgrimage to that cold and uncanny region. Afterward we went through Chinatown, and spent an hour or so in viewing the grotesque panorama of this oriental scene; and I didn't feel as if I was in very dangerous company. The Chinese are a good-natured folk. They don't quarrel. They get drunk and gamble in a very placid manner, as if they were half asleep. They make and lose with cheerful quietude. The Chinese are a happy people. They go in for pleasure. Their religious ceremonies are very much like those of the Christians. The priest gets all the fat things, just like our own. Theology is the same the world over. The Chinese go in for bright, nice-looking gods. They hav one in the custom-house now so extensivly decorated that the officials hav called it a "work of art." It is too handsomely ornamented with gold and silk to be a real god, and so Uncle Sam feels called upon to charge duties, which is evidently unfair, for other deities can hav all the regalia they wish. Why shouldn't the Chinese god be allowed to put on style likewise? The "visible" god certainly ought to be permitted as much fashion and splendor as the "invisible" one. Uncle Sam should treat all alike and let the god come in duty free, tinsel and all.

Chinamen like elegance as well as we. They like fine furniture and splendid adornments. They won't liv on rats when they can get chickens. They don't horde money. They spend lavishly, like Americans, and go in for a good time. Their New Year's is a much more splendid and jolly occasion than with us. They devote a whole week to it. They send to China and get all sorts of beautiful things, dresses, ornaments, confectionery, etc. They like good confectionery, and know how to make it. They like fireworks, and go in for a heap of noise. Their music is a marvelous affair. I don't understand it, but it rattles away for dear life with infinit hilarity. Every Chinaman is bound to get a new suit of clothes on New Year's, no matter what the cost, and to liv on turkey and sweet-meats for seven days, at least. The Chinese are perfectly generous, they are always ready to treat. They giv away things, especially to those they like, with wonderful prodigality. They are a careless, jovial people. They are industrious—they work—but when they get through work they play. They save money, and they spend it too. They like this world, and when they can hav luxury they hav it with the alacrity of ourselvs. They liv in a picturesque world. There is wealth and poverty. There is dirt, but also refinement and cleanliness, as in our own cities. There is intelligence and ignorance among them. Human nature is the same as with us, and has the same variety of expression They are a working, economical, gay-hearted, pleasure-loving, and contented people. Giv the devil his due. If we must pitch this Jonah overboard in order to save the ship of state, giv him a fair epitaph, for he deserves it. If he has bad qualities, he has also good qualities; and when the balance is struck I guess he will hav a pretty good credit account.

Sunday evening I lectured at Oakland to an audience of one hundred and fifty. I hope for more next Sunday, and so be able to report progress. I lectured in San Francisco on Monday to about one hundred, and on Tuesday to the same number. On Wednesday, however, we had double. I don't take any credit to myself for the increase. We had an added attraction in the shape of an orthodox crank, an English gentleman, a graduate of one of the universities, and in many respects an educated man, but wofully at sea in regard to Freethought. He rose in quite an excited manner after the close of my lecture on Tuesday evening, and wanted an hour in which to reply. We told him it was impossible to grant that length of time. Finally he subsided to a ten-minute speech. But when I replied to him he again became excited and demanded another opportunity.

In order to hav as much fair play as possible, we arranged to giv this man half of the next evening if he would pay half the expenses. To this he agreed, and so the battle came off, and a pretty good number were present. I spoke for half an hour, and then he made answer to my lecture, "The New Heaven and Earth." For an hour he plunged into all sorts of metaphysics. He quoted from Spencer and Harrison on the religious questions, in blissful ignorance that these writers were at sword's points in regard to the very matter he was endeavoring to elucidate. He quoted them both as in favor of Theism, while all that Herbert Spencer affirms, and all that anybody can affirm, according to his philosophy, is an "infinit energy." I hav no quarrel with the man who asserts that, but an "infinit energy" is one thing, and a "personal God" is an entirely different thing, and especially the "God of the Bible," concerning whose existence there is not a particle of evidence; and if we did prove his existence, it would be the existence of a "devil," and not a "God." This illustrates the incongruous and mixed reasoning of my opponent. However, we had an interesting time, and a number of Christians were present to listen to our argument, and I think an interest has been aroused that will make our closing lectures better attended. But when it came to the settling of the bills, our Christian friend was not willing to pay his share. Evidently he thought he had not got his money's worth. Of course we would not quarrel with him, and let him off on his own terms. That's the way with Christians—they want us to pay all the bills, while they do the talking. I doubt if our English friend ever puts in another appearance. He did not seem to be at all satisfied. Still, he gave us a good chance to express Secular philosophy to those who, without this debate, would not hav heard it at all, and small favors are thankfully received. Discussion is always welcome.

I lecture in Oakland next Sunday evening, and in San Francisco Monday and Wednesday evenings, and I shall hav more to say about my work and acquaintance here in my next "News and Notes." I hav found some royal good friends—few, but with the noble spirit of Liberalism—and I shall write of them hereafter. This is a most difficult field, but I hope on, hope ever, and the favorable outlook elsewhere givs me courage to maintain this position spite of all disappointments.

I came up the beautiful bay yesterday. I went past the Golden Gates, glistering in the evening sun. The waters were gleaming in the brilliant light, and the encircling hills and scattered isles were glowing beneath the effulgent sky. Then I came up the delightful Sonoma valley, with its cultivated land, and lovely dwelling-houses, amid stately foliage. Sonoma is the oldest town in northern California, built in the Spanish fashion, with a plaza in the center. It is somewhat dull; the tide of business does not rush here. It is a retired spot, but pleasantly situated, with the bay on one side and the mountains on the other. I gave the first Freethought lecture here last evening, to an audience that nearly filled the hall. I lecture again to-night, and hope for a larger number, but the rain is gently pouring—much needed indeed by the parched lands—especially to the south. It bears within its bosom millions of wealth to this state. So I am willing it should come, even if it spoils the attendance for this evening, for thousands of acres of wheat would perish but for these wide-spreading showers whose drops are jewels indeed for the dusty earth.

I am at the house of T. H. Cheney, five miles away from the village, in the heart of the hills, overlooking in the sunshine the distant bay and the bright valley. Here I am restful, and take the opportunity to write these notes while the rain and mists descend and the hills look life shadowy forms. Mr. Cheney and his wife and father are stanch Liberals, and I am in the atmosphere of Freethought. The little girl, Irene, and her dolls also make a good Secular assembly and giv cheer to this world. The doll of the little girl I like, but the doll of the theologian I do detest.

I hope to lecture in Petaluma next week, and meet my good friends Philip Cowen, W. H. Pepper, and others. I expect to be there Tuesday, Thursday, and Friday. I shall be at San José April 17th and 24th; at Ukiah—with a thirty-mile stage ride—April 26th, 27th, 28th, and 29th. I shall be at Stockton May 1st and 8th; and at Napa City May 3d 4th, and 5th. I shall be at Sacramento May 15th and 22d. I had the pleasure of meeting Mr. N. D. Goodell, our worker there, at San Francisco. I am going to Oregon by way of Chico, Yreka, etc., and expect to be in Ashland, Talent, Salem, Silverton, Portland, Victoria, Port Townsend, and then Eastward by way of Baker City, Emmettsville, etc. I want friends to be on the look-out and keep the secretary at work. The more done the better. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Liberal Club.

The reporter did not reach the hall of the Liberal Club on the occasion of its 343d regular meeting in season to enjoy the Chair's opening remarks, which are always worth going a good way to hear; but he got there soon enough to affix his signature to a petition urging President Wakeman to reconsider his determination to resign. It was a rainy evening, which had not prevented a fair audience from assembling. Mr. Cohen, in a new spring overcoat that testified to his general prosperity, sat by the secretary's table, and other persons of distinction occupied seats in different parts of the hall.

The five-cent piece which the writer gave to Treasurer Morris as the regular price of admission—barring ladies and Presbyterians, who are welcomed free—did not giv him the benefit of the first part of the lecture by Mr. McMahon on the "Illusions of Legislation." Mr. McMahon had already begun, and was hammering away lustily at what he called his preliminary episode. The lecture was a protest against various fanciful pieces of legislation, among them Prohibition and high license laws. The lecturer did not think these were calculated to aid the cause of temperance, which must be the result of moral suasion and a general diffusion of information as to the deleterious effect of firewater upon the human stomach. Education had already abolished, among the ministers and agriculturists of New England, the habitual use of rum which prevailed fifty years ago. In Ireland the Catholic church has so discouraged intemperance that the Irish people are practically abstemious. Mr. McMahon followed this assertion with the remark that if human law could make men virtuous in a day, it could do what the preaching of God's word and law has failed to do in nineteen centuries. The sale of beer Sunday afternoons should be permitted for the benefit of our foreign population.

Another illusion, said the speaker, is our way of dealing with corporations. Perpetual franchises should not be granted. because the state could not afford to alienate its property, and create corporations which, though having no souls, would liv forever. Land grants are also illusions. On this subject the speaker became very energetic, and prophesied reform or revolution, and gave the desk a mighty thump, which aroused the somnolent audience to the point of applauding. Finding that was the kind of prophecy that took best, Mr. McMahon repeated it at intervals during the remainder of his discourse.

Civil service reform was another illusion and humbug. Under it the farmer's son had no chance beside the college graduate. Nevertheless, if war broke out, no competitiv examination was resorted to to find out whether he could defend the flag; and when the war was over he could not fill any office under the government which his valor had preserved. This, Mr. McMahon believed, would serve to discourage patriotism. George Washington could not hav passed a civil service examination, for he was deficient in grammar; Horace Greeley wrote a bad hand and would hav been rejected; Daniel Webster could not spell. The next illusion is laws for the collection of debts, the repeal of which would bring business nearer a C.O.D. basis, and kill off the dead-beats of commerce. The close of Mr. McMahon's address was vociferously cheered.

The Chair said: "Our business is now the discussion of this interesting and instructiv lecture. The floor is open, members of the club having preference in speeches of ten minutes."

Dr. Foote, Jr., proposed that Mr. Cohen should speak. No resistance was offered, and Mr. Cohen went forward. Mr. Cohen at once attacked the lecturer's statement that the Irish people were abstemious. From observations which he had made, Mr. Cohen was prepared to affirm that the Irish people hav more affection for a demijohn than the average American citizen. Mr. Cohen's forte as a speaker is discussing economic questions, and he likes to turn the drift in that direction. His method of getting upon his favorit theme may be of value to other speakers. Says he, "I understand the gentleman to hav said this or that. Am I right?" If the speaker assents, the way for the favorit speech is opened at once. If he denies having said anything of the kind, the critic may reply, "Then I will say nothing upon that point; otherwise I should hav said"—then proceed with the favorit speech as in the former instance. Mr. Cohen stated that he was a resident of Washington, where he had been able to effect many good results by giving legal advice to judges of the supreme court and others who solicited his opinion upon important matters.

Following, Dr. Kinget pointed out that laws which conflicted with the law of supply and demand would be fruitless.

Herr Moses Oppenheimer, who, report says, has recently been seen upon the street wearing a high hat, was the next speaker. He looked better than usual and spoke as well. In his country all restrictiv laws had been utter failures. Only laws which come from the people can be a success. Before Herr Oppenheimer came to America he was a candidate for the German parliament.

Colonel Hinton gave a bewildering series of statistics to show that all strikes had benefited the strikers. The colonel will lecture at the next meeting on "John Brown and His Men," of whom the colonel himself was one.

Captain Clark was present, but said nothing, an example which was followed by several others who are able on occasion to make good speeches. To all who speak we offer thanks, and tender an ovation; but still the man who can but don't excites our admiration.

Existence.

As is to be expected, there is to be found in THE TRUTH SEEKER much which savors of the neophytic views of nature and of man, and this condition is in the necessary evolution from immaturity to maturity, as from the acorn to the mighty oak. This is to be expected in nature and in art, as well as in philosophy.

Still, as a starting-point, we must not forget the self-evident, and I would recommend to some of the correspondents of THE TRUTH SEEKER that existence is that self-evident starting-point; and, as some of your correspondents seem unable to find the being who is called by the name of God, I would suggest the above word, "existence," as denoting the starting-point of search, and would quote herein from Thomas Paine, whom the New York World has recently discovered to be a very religious man. He answers the Bible interrogation, "Canst thou by searching find out God?" in the affirmativ. "Yes," says he, "because, in the first place, I know I did not make myself, and yet I hav an existence, and by searching into the nature of other things I find that no other thing could make itself, and yet millions of other things exist. Therefore it is that I know, by positiv conclusion resulting from this search, that there is a power superior to all these things, and that power is God."

And from the same standpoint, existence; and, in obedience to the rule, "seek and ye shall find," our author discourses as follows, viz.: "I trouble not myself about the manner of future existence. I content myself with believing, even to positiv conviction, that the power that gave me existence is able to continue it in any form and manner he pleases, either with or without this body, and it appears more probable to me that I shall continue to exist hereafter than that I should hav had an existence, as I now hav, before that existence began." Also herein a very ancient document says existence is one of the titles of deity—I am that I am!

> Livs through all life, extends through all extent,
> Spreads undivided, operates unspent,
> Breathes in our soul, informs our moral part,
> As full, as perfect, in a hair as heart;
> As full, as perfect, in vile man that mourns
> As the rapt seraph that adores and burns.
> In him no high, no low, no great, no small;
> He fills, he bounds, connects, and equals all.

I would recommend to some of your correspondents a greater culture of the esthetic element. Socrates said that the prosaic nearly destroyed his vision, and came to the conclusion, when he overcame the neophytic view of things, that "the soul was modeled after the eternal idea of the true, the good, and the beautiful."

Paine cultivated the astronomic in order to elevate his vision, and this is well. Now, we are all astronomers—star-gazers—and we all daily consult that most wonderful book, the almanac. And, I would inquire, what is the most wonderful fact in this most wonderful book? Is it not that we are the denizens of two worlds, the known and the unknown, of the visible and the invisible universe, and that an interchange and conversion is constantly taking place between these?

Take the objectiv fact, for instance, now universally recognized as true, that the world is bounded and surrounded by an infinitly luminiferous, magnetic, and electric medium provisionally called ether, and that this wonderful medium, as a vehicle of energy (and an invisible vehicle, too), consumes all the light and heat which is radiated by the suns into space, independent of that which enters into and is absorbed by the atmosphere of the different planets.

Verily it is true that the things in the heavens and upon earth are wonderful, wonderful, wonderful. In comparison with these our little systems are very small, indeed; still, in the process of the suns, these hav their day—they hav their day and cease to be!

Lectures and Meetings.

ON April 24th the Rev. S. Miller Hageman and Mr. T. B. Wakeman will debate the subject "Which is Best for the World—Christianity or Science?" The debate will take place at Phœnix Hall, No. 118 South Eighth street, Brooklyn, N. Y., at 3 o'clock.

MRS. H. S. LAKE speaks at New Haven, Conn., April 24th; at the First Spiritual Temple, Boston, May 1st, 8th, 15th, 22d, and 29th; she is reëngaged at Bridgeport, Conn., for June 5th, 12th, 19th, and 26th. Her services may be secured for week-evening lectures and camp-meetings. Address 123 West Concord street, Boston.

E. H. HEYWOOD writes: "Dear Mr. Macdonald, please say that the seventeenth annual convention of the American Labor Reform League meets at 141 Eighth street, New York, Sunday, May 1st, at 10:30 A.M. and 2:30 P.M. R. W. Hume, Col. Henry Beeny, Cynthia Leonard, Dr. C. S. Weeks, E. H. Heywood, and other speakers expected."

W. F. JAMIESON is called to Neligh, Neb., to giv a course of lectures. One lecture will be, "The True Story about Thomas Paine." He will soon enter upon his summer vacation among the Colorado mountains, but before doing so would like to deliver his lecture on Thomas Paine in twelve or fifteen different towns. Address him at once, Denver, Col.

CHARLES WATTS visited New York last week to see his wife safely embarked for England. Sunday, the 17th, he lectured for Friendship League of Philadelphia. He reports good success in the lecture field, and bright prospects for his paper. He proposes to convert Canada from her superstition, and will settle permanently in Toronto upon the return of his wife, who will bring his family with her.

W. S. BELL has recently had a debate with a Campbellite minister, the Rev. J. T. Purvis, at Mt. Vernon, Ind., on the divine origin of the Bible. The discussion was held in the court-house, and from the beginning to its close drew large audiences. The debate continued three days, and created a great deal of excitement in that little sleepy town on the banks of the sleepy Ohio river. Mr. Bell thus outlines his coming work: "In June I shall go to Dakota to lecture, and will take in the following towns and others provided I hear from our Liberal friends there in time to make the necessary arrangements before leaving Chicago. I intend to visit Sioux Falls, Salem, Mitchell, Chamberlin, Kimball, Wessington Springs, Huron Iroquois, De Smet, Manchester, Brookings, Big Stone, and Eaton. I shall not hav much time to make arrangements for lectures after getting to Dakota, and shall therefore be greatly obliged to our Liberal friends if they will write me soon, at 302 State st., Chicago, Illinois.

J. E. REMSBURG delivered his first lecture, entitled "Sabbath-Breaking," before a fairly good audience at Kenesson's Opera House on Wednesday evening. He is a very clear, forcible speaker, and created a favorable impression on his hearers. His oratory is characterized by moderation and good sense, and is entirely free from the rodomontade so common among a certain class sailing under the same colors. He shows a spirit of fairness and evident sincerity of purpose which commands respect, even though it does not carry conviction. It is such men as Remsburg that those who oppose his views must fortify against.—Cedar Vale (Kan.) Star.

WEDNESDAY, April 13th, was the 144th anniversary of the birth of Thomas Jefferson. The day passed unnoticed by the rest of the world, but not by the Society of Humanity, which in its parlors at 28 Lafayette Place held services commemorativ of the event. This society, so far as it goes, represents Liberalism with its good clothes on. It does not claim to be wholly philosophical, like the Liberal Club, and its cards of invitation say nothing about "full dress for gentlemen," as is the case with the Nineteenth Century Club; nevertheless, its members hav a reflectiv turn sometimes, and they can appear in swallowtails and patent leathers when occasion demands. At the same time it is democratic, and makes nativ worth and liberality the test of membership. The cultivation of the social side of Freethought is at present its chief aim. It has this year celebrated the birthdays of three of the fathers of the republic, namely, Paine, Washington, and Jefferson, and would hav honored that of Franklin on the 17th in the same way if it had not come so close to Jefferson's. The Jefferson celebration was a very enjoyable affair. Counsellor F. C. Leubuscher, one of the trustees, did what presiding was necessary. Mr. Magnus Gross, Jr., who serves humanity in the best way all the week as vice-principal of a public school, read a thoughtful essay upon the political services of Jefferson; and Mr. Edward King considered the scientific and religious value of Jeffersonian principles. Before, between, and following the addresses, Miss Weissmantle, Miss Leubuscher, Miss O'Reilly, and Miss McCarthy performed upon the piano or gave recitations, and Mr. Homan read a poem which he confessed to having written himself. The society, though it may as yet be said to be young and struggling, prides itself somewhat upon the musical and dramatic talent which it is able to present, and rejoices not a little in the possession of a new piano. This instrument has been photographed, and a picture of it will be found in Decker & Son's advertisment in this paper. It is a handsome piece of workmanship, and strikes the eye very favorably, but, as every good piano should, it appeals principally to the ear, and all agree that it could not be excelled for the money. Still, the members had to go down pretty deep into their pockets to get it. After the literary and musical exercises, the floor was cleared for dancing. The ladies put aside their wraps, and looked so attractiv it is feared that notions of Jefferson and his principles of religious and political economy for the time being became somewhat indistinct. Philosopher King appeared to hav lost sight altogether of his work as an exponent of the synthetic value of science and humanity to be substituted for an effete theology, and devoted himself with enthusiasm to acquiring an experimental knowledge of the evolutionary developments of the Saratoga lanciers. He expressed the belief that in executing this figure the dancers passed by reversion from a definit and coherent heterogeneity to a state of indefinit and incoherent differentiation. Mr. King will endeavor to classify the varied aspects of these phenomena by the synthesizing process elaborated and illustrated with diagrams in the "Epitome of the Positiv Philosophy." The celebration of Jefferson's birthday was extended into the small hours of April 14th.

An English Opinion of The Truth Seeker Annual.

From Saladin's Secular Review.

The ANNUAL published regularly in connection with our New York contemporary, THE TRUTH SEEKER, has just reached us. The ANNUAL contains a remarkably good calendar for the present year, giving as honorable a distinction to great "Infidel" events and the births and deaths of notable heretics as a calendar drawn up under gospel-shop auspices gives to Palm Sunday and to such gushing notables as Isaac Watts and C. H Spurgeon. On turning to the month of April we find that Edward Gibbon, Mary Wolstonecraft, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Herbert Spencer, and U. S. Grant were each and all born on the 27th of that month. There is an excellent review of Freethought in the United States during the past year, and a lengthy and carefully compiled paper showing the attitude of the Sunday, oath, and blasphemy laws in the different states of the Union. The indefatigable Samuel P. Putnam (when does he find time to overtake all his work?—are there twenty-six hours in his day?) contributes a paper on "The American Secular Union," of which he is the hard-working and self-denying secretary; and the witty and wise Si Slokum of THE TRUTH SEEKER is responsible for a paper entitled "The Parson." The "get-up" is exceedingly good, and there are a number of artistically executed engravings, quite interesting in themselvs, but with little or no relevancy to the text.

THE Roman Catholic Freeman's Journal says that "Protestantism has been imposed by force on every country where it prevails." Well, there is something in that, after all. Everyone knows how England was made Protestant in religious principle; Germany had many religious wars in Luther's day and since; and the Puritan majority of this country made it uncomfortable for Catholics whenever they could. But then, unless history is all askew, the Catholics hav done some forcing too.

Communications.

Expelled for Heresy.

When the secretary of the American Secular Union began his tour last winter, he went direct from this city to Martinsburg, West Virginia, where Louis Wolfes, a substantial citizen of that town, had made arrangements for two public lectures. Mr. Putnam was much pleased with the place, and for two evenings in Feller's Hall, and one evening in Mr. Bohda's parlors, entertained the Freethinkers and instructed the Christians of Martinsburg. "I could not find a better place than Martinsburg for the beginning of my lectures," wrote the enthusiastic secretary. "The work accomplished has done great good. It has stirred the community wonderfully." But how wonderfully, Mr. Putnam could not then foresee.

The lectures were delivered in the early part of last January, and for several weeks little was talked of among the Christians but the audacity of the Freethinkers of the town in engaging a lecturer who represented their own principles and voiced their own sentiments. Mr. Louis Wolfes was considered the head and front of the offending, and though he could not be burnt at the stake, nor drawn and quartered, nor even successfully boycotted, the Christians were determined that something should be done to him. Mr. Wolfes at that time was a member in good standing of the Hall of Tuscarora lodge, No. 24, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and several of his Christian enemies also were members. In February Mr. Wolfes received the following official communication upon the secretary of the lodge:

MARTINSBURG, W. VA., Feb. 12, 1887.

L. WOLFES, ESQ., Dear Brother: As secretary of Tuscarora Lodge I am directed to notify you to appear before an investigating committee Thursday evening, 7:30 o'clock, to answer charges as set forth in specifications herein inclosed.

Yours in F., L., and T., S. L. DODD, Sec.

CHARGES AND SPECIFICATIONS.

Learning that Brother L. Wolfes, a member of this lodge, has been encouraging one Mr. Putnam, an avowed Atheist, by contributing money and passing his hat for others, and that said Brother Wolfes has declared that he is not "a believer in a supreme being, the creator and preserver of the universe," therefore I prefer charges against Brother L. Wolfes as set forth in the following specifications:

1. That Brother L. Wolfes is an avowed Atheist, or holds such belief as is not recognized by our order.

2. That he is, or has been, instrumental in diffusing doctrin other than that recognized by our order, viz., "a believer in a supreme being, the creator and preserver of the universe." S. L. DODD, Secretary.

Mr. Wolfes sent this reply:

MARTINSBURG, W. VA., Feb. 16, 1887.

TO THE OFFICERS AND MEMBERS OF TUSCARORA LODGE, No. 24, I. O. O. F., Brethren: I am in receipt of your communication of the 12th inst. alleging certain charges and specifications as to my encouraging one Mr. Putnam, an avowed Atheist, and in reply will say I don't recognize any authority from any one to dictate to me what I think and believe is right according to the prompting of my conscience. I furthermore will state that it is now thirty-four years since I joined the order. I did not join for God's sake, but for humanity's sake, to do good to my fellow brethren, and if you had told me and made me understand then, or at that time, that I was compelled to believe in Jehovah, I possibly would not hav joined. When I say Jehovah I mean the God that walked in the Garden of Eden some time ago, and talked to Adam and his lady; and, also, thirty-four years ago, when I joined, I was not familiar with the English language; had I been I might hav saved some money.

So far as Mr. Putnam's lecture is concerned, I claim that I hav just as much right to hear a Freethought lecture as to go to hear an orthodox lecture, because the laws of the land separate the church and state, and I, as a citizen of the United States, hav the right to propagate my ideas just as much as you hav yours, so far as they do not conflict with any of the established laws of the state.

I don't write this in defense of my belief, neither do I regret what I hav done. I believe I hav done some good by my connection with the order to my brethren generally. I ask no reward for anything I hav done.

In conclusion, if you think your inquisitiv questions will come in concert or harmony with the principle of friendship, love, and truth by depriving me and my family of the benefits of a member in good standing, then you can do what you cannot leave undone.

As you might want a positiv answer as to a supreme being, I can only say that I don't know.

Yours respectfully in friendship and truth.

LOUIS WOLFES.

When Mr. Wolfes appeared before the examining committee, February 17th, he was questioned as to his views, and the secretary of the lodge makes the following report of the inquisition:

MARTINSBURG, WEST VA., Feb. 17, 1887.

The following queries were put to Bro. L. Wolfes by the examining committee, and his answers are appended:

QUESTIONS PROPOUNDED UNDER SPECIFICATION FIRST.

1. Question. Do you believe there is such a being as God? Answer. I don't know.

2. Q. Do you believe there is a supreme being? A. I don't know.

3. Q. Do you believe the universe is controled by a supreme being? A. I don't know.

4. Q. What rule the universe? A. Matter and force.

5. Q. Do you believe matter and force created the universe? A. It always existed.

6. Q. Do you believe in a supreme being, the creator and preserver of the universe? A. I don't know.

7. Q. Do you believe in a personal God? A. No.

UNDER SPECIFICATION SECOND, THE FOLLOWING.

1. Question. Do you know Mr. Putnam, the lecturer? Answer. I do.

2. Q. How long hav you known him? A. Only since he came.

3. Q. Did you know he was going to lecture here, and how long had you known it? A. Three weeks before he wrote me, and asked me to strike some advertising bills, which I did.

4. Q. Did Mr. Putnam visit your house? How often? A. Two or three times.

5. Q. How often did he lecture in Martinsburg? A. Twice.

6. Q. How often did you hear him? A. Twice.

7. Q. Did he lecture at Mr. Bohda's house? A. Yes; I heard him three times with this.

8. Q. Were you present at Mr. Bohda's? A. Yes.

9. Q. What was the doctrin he taught? A. Universal Mental Liberty.

10. Q. Do you believe the Bible? A. I believe the historical part so far as is consistent with my conscience. I don't believe in a cruel God.

11. Q. Did you contribute money for Mr. Putnam's support? A. Certainly.

12. Q. Did you ask others to do so? A. I tried.

13. Q. Are there any publications that do teach your doctrins? A. Boston Investigator, TRUTH SEEKER, Freethinkers' Magazine.

14. Q. What do you call Mr. Putnam's doctrin, or has it a name? A. American Secular Union, to separate church and state.

15. Q. What do you understand by "supreme being?" A. I don't know; it's unknowable, always was.

16. Q. What becomes of a man after death? A. Ashes, all I know.

Dear Sirs: It was the answers to the above questions, and your written statement that formed the basis for the committee's report, and they recommended expulsion, which report was received, and at a subsequent meeting, held March 12, 1887, the case was formally taken up and discussed in your presence, which upon ballot resulted in your expulsion. Very truly, S. L. DODD, Sec.

As a result of this inquisition, Mr. Wolfe's was served with the annexed notice:

MARTINSBURG, WEST VA., Feb. 26, 1887.

L. WOLFES, Dear Brother: At a meeting of Tuscarora Lodge held Saturday night, Feb. 19th, the committee reported unfavorably on investigation of charges against you.

The following is a copy of minutes as recorded:

"Report of investigation committee of the charges against Brother L. Wolfe was read, and on motion it was laid on the table for two weeks."

You can see by the above that it will be taken up next Saturday night, March 5th, when you would better appear, and if possible hav some one represent you as counsel.

Very truly, S. L. DODD, Sec.

Before the lodge, when asked to defend himself, Mr. Wolfes said:

I hav nothing to say in my defense, because I did not do anything wrong. But while I hav the opportunity, I would warn all, and particularly you brother Odd Fellows, to think before you act, that in the way you are driving, to persecute man for opinion's sake, you would land where the poor peasant farmer was four hundred years ago, who carried some sticks of wood to the stake to make the fire a little hotter for the heretic, in order to please his God. Now, brethren, I know that you do not want to burn me at the stake, and thereby you can see that the world has got better, and so hav you, and that in spite of Christianity. But if you keep on in this way, you will surely land where that poor farmer was four hundred years ago.

It appears from your action that the secret societies of today hav taken up the practice of the church under the rules of Philip I. of Spain, although you profess to liv in a country which guarantees to every man, woman, and child political and religious liberty, and so I maintain that a free man should hav a free mind, and not be afraid to speak it.

LOUIS WOLFES.

Mr. Wolfes was then expelled, as appears by the letter written to him subsequently, but appended by the secretary of the lodge to the list of questions.

Mrs. Colman's Reminiscences.

At a place in Ohio, so near Virginia that you could almost hear the chains rattle, we found one of the Union churches, and a good Abolitionist family in comfortable condition to entertain us. We made our appointments, and with our friends proceeded to the house—a full attendance, but very turbulent. The minister, who was a resident and used the house when it was not engaged to other parties, was, I think, a Presbyterian, and not very outrageous in his language. He was an old man (age does not always enjoy a fight), but we could feel that there were to be demonstrations of hostility. The meeting-house was surrounded on three sides by a large cornfield, and western corn grows very tall. Mr. Foss, who was then at work with me, said to me: "The rioters are in that cornfield, and will throw their missils, whatever they are, from behind those high stalks. If by good management we can get by that field before they are aware that we hav left the house, we shall escape their blows." Mr. Foss was a large man, and very strong. I was a little woman then, not weighing more than a child of twelve years. While our friends were busy trying to defend us by their words (the house was lighted by a few candles), we quietly slipped out. My friend took me upon his hip, and ran past the corn, and we were out of sight. But as the crowd came out, we could plainly hear the hurrah, and "Here they come!" shouted. Then the eggs were thrown in great abundance. The poor old minister was covered with the vile-smelling things, which were intended for us. Our friends, supposing we were in the house, prolonged their stay, waiting for us, and so they escaped the anointing, and the rioters were completely foiled. We were not always so fortunate. Not very far from this place we had a somewhat similar triumph. The rioters were too pious to profane their church, and so made their attack on us at the house where we were entertained. The weather was mild, and the door leading to the street was open. I had been sitting exactly opposit the open door, but feeling a little cold, I had just placed my chair a little back of the door, when there came a shower of eggs that made the air thick for a time, but not one hit me or Mr. Foss. But our host, their townsman, was completely covered. The following day was the state election. Our host appeared at the polls with his garb all besmeared, telling his fellow-citizens what it cost in our reputedly free country to maintain free speech.

Ohio was at this time very pro-slavery, notwithstanding it had an Oberlin College where colored students were received equally with white ones. It was in Ohio where the Margaret Garner tragedy occurred. Margaret, being pursued by her master and overtaken, was put upon a steamer to be returned to slavery. Finding there was no escape, she threw her child into the river, but was prevented from throwing herself by the "bloodhounds" of law. Mr. Salmon P. Chase was at that time governor of Ohio, and the Abolitionists tried very hard to hav him make a requisition on the governor of the state to which the slave, Margaret Garner, belonged, for her, as the murderer of her child, but he refused. I do not remember what excuse he made. He was never a brave man, but very ambitious. He might hav saved the slave by making the requisition, but he would hav lost some popularity. In a town in Ohio which was blessed with a school where Methodist ministers were manufactured, we found an opening for a series of meetings. There was in the same town which held the school one of the Union houses, and a few men and women who did not believe in slavery sent us an invitation to come, providing us with a home while we should stay. As soon as it was known that the friends of the slave were in the region, the president of the school and the professors immediately opened a four days' meeting, occupying the house, with three or four sessions a day. I was in no hurry, and so concluded to stay and attend the meeting. I was not a welcome visitor, but I enjoyed the meeting. God was often informed of my presence, and told of my hostility to him and his earthly church, and the people were informed repeatedly that the Methodist church North had cut itself entirely loose from all connection with slavery. The meeting held its four days, and still the Abolitionist was there. Neither threats nor prayers had any effect upon my stay. I went to hold a meeting to plead for those who were not allowed to plead their own cause, and I could afford to wait their time. Another day was added to the four, and still another. The people were getting weary, and finally the president of the school announced that the next session would close up the series. The people in this closing meeting were urged to pay no attention to any meeting that should be called by me, saying that the attendance on such a meeting would call for action and perhaps excommunication from the church. At last the blessing was pronounced, and on the instant I arose and said I would now open another protracted meeting; I could not say whether it would continue four days or twice four, but that it would hold long enough to giv me time to prove the falsehood of the assertions we had heard made. The minister interrupted me by begging the audience to disperse, commanding those of the school. Most of the people left, but they stopped at the door, looked in at the windows, and at last curiosity triumphed. They all came back, and the minister with them. I stepped to the front of the platform and said to the president of the school, "Will you do me the favor to lend me your church Disciplin a few minutes?" "No, I will not," said he, "and I make the request that no one in the house lend the woman one." I said, "I will not hurt the book. I should think anyone would grant such a small favor." But not one of them dared to do it. We talk about Roman Catholic popes! I hav seen popes—alas that it is so!—even among Freethinkers. After I had tried my powers of persuasion awhile, with no success, I drew from my pocket a new church Disciplin, and, holding it up, said: "I hav been acquainted with Methodist Christians some time, and, judging you from what I hav seen in others, I expected to be refused the use of the book, and so obtained one. If any one of you thinks it is not a bona fide Disciplin, I will let you examin it; but you must first swear that you will not injure it, but return it to me. I can't afford to send to New York for another copy." I wish I could paint for you the expression of the faces of those Christians. They knew that by that book I would prove false all their assertions concerning non-complicity with slavery. The Methodist church North did not leave the church South; it was the church South that left the North, and the North begged them not to leave, and some of their conferences did remain with them. At that time, according to the record of their own book, there were more than three hundred thousand slaves owned by members of the Methodist church North.

Kansas "Law" and Justice.

FRIEND MACDONALD: Referring to your editorial in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 26th, entitled, "The Kansas Supreme Court Decision in the Walker Case," permit me to say: 1. You say that we (Walker and Harman) "are willing to be married legally if the ceremony can be of their [our] own choosing." There was no question of willingness about it. We could hav nothing to say concerning it. Continuous living together constitutes marriage in many of the states, when it comes to the questions of "bastardy," "legitimacy," "bigamy," and inheritance. We simply demanded, when prosecuted, that we should hav the protection of the law, since our living together made us amenable to the penalties and subject to the responsibilities imposed by the law. The decision of the Supreme Court, as well as the special opinion of Chief-Justice Horton, indicates clearly that "words of present assent" constitute legal marriage, in the view of Kansas jurists, although they try to dodge the fact by claiming that that issue was not "directly drawn in question."

Then, in brief, we did not wish to be legally married, but the fact of living together made us husband and wife in the eyes of the law, and we simply demanded that we should hav the rights, as we could not escape the legal responsibilities, of that estate. It is right here that our Anarchistic brethren claim that we tripped, but facts and logic impregnably support us.

2. You say: "The contracting parties first intended to assume the relation in such a manner that if either felt dissatisfied they could separate without resorting to the divorce courts."

A mistake; we knew that we could separate at any time without resorting to any court, and we also knew that if we, either of us, should liv with another person of the opposit sex without having a legal divorce, we should be amenable to the laws against "bigamy," and that whether we were married legally or by assent only.

3. Again, you say: "When this contract was found to be a county-jail affair, they claimed their common-law right to marry by a simple contract."

We knew that it was possible to make it "a county-jail affair," should anyone choose to prosecute, although at common law it was marriage, and we were not legally free to divorce ourselvs. We were not blind to what religious bigotry and provincial prejudice could accomplish, and I wish to say right here that I am not at all surprised at the result. I never was hopeful of a favorable outcome, as Mr. Harman will bear witness, although he was much more sanguin. An electiv judiciary is not likely to regard constitutional rights or natural justice when public opinion is largely against the accused. Again you say:

4. "Hav the people of Kansas a right to make rules governing their own conduct, and to enforce them? Under the Constitution of the United States they undoubtedly hav. If they choose to make marriage a matter of public record, they can do it as legally as they can make the transfer of real estate a matter of public record."

From a constitutional standpoint, which seems to be your point of view, the people of Kansas hav no right to make rules which conflict with the rights of conscience. And all laws should be general in their nature. They should respect the conscientious convictions of all or of none. The marriage laws of Kansas exempt the Quakers from the operation of the statute under which we, as Autonomists, are severely punished. We may not be so numerous as the Quakers, but I am not aware that numbers hav anything to do with the rights of conscience. But, leaving the Constitution to one side for a moment, I contend that the "rules" which the people of Kansas or any other state may adopt must not trench upon the reserved rights of the citizen. What the individual may "rightfully enact" against the lives and property and liberties of other individuals, the aggregate of individuals may enact. No more. I hav yet to meet the first man who will claim it as his personal right to send Lillian Harman and myself to prison for our failure to pay him a fee for a piece of paper giving us permission to occupy the same house or room. What he has not the right to do he cannot authorize any collectivity to do. I cannot admit that the people of any state hav the unlimited right to "make rules governing their own conduct," if by this is meant the right of the actual or caucus majority to impose these rules upon the minority. To admit this asserted right is to admit the righteousness of the Sunday laws and of all the other religious class rules of which we, Mr. Editor, as Secularists, complain. But you will say that these rules violate the rights of conscience. Certainly, but not more certainly than do these marriage rules. The Sunday and blasphemy statutes violate your rights of conscience and mine, but they are not felt by those who think the state has the right to make such rules. These marriage rules violate my rights of conscience, but do not interfere with those who hold that the state has the right to make such rules. It is the minority whose rights of conscience need protection, not the majority.

You hav said that the people of Kansas hav the same right to make these rules regarding the recording of marriages that they hav "to make the transfer of real estate a matter of public record." When they shall make the failure to record a deed a jail offense there will be a force in your illustration that it entirely lacks at present. If a man fails to hav the deed to his farm recorded, he is not liable to arrest and indefinit imprisonment. His title is imperfect, and in case of dispute as to the ownership of the land by his heirs or others, the title must be quieted before undisputed possession can be entered upon. But his failure to record is not made a crime or misdemeanor, so far as I am aware. And is a woman a piece of property, title to whom must be quieted before the second or other subsequent possession can own in peace? But you will say, There are the rights of others, of the children; marriage is made a matter of record for their benefit. But is not this equally true in case of land titles? And yet the failure of the father or prospectiv father to record the deed of his land is not made a misdemeanor or felony. It seems that the desire to provide for the future of their children is held to be sufficient motiv, aside from self-interest, to induce parents to guard their property in all ways possible. And to guard the rights of prospectiv children is the object of these wise lawmakers and adjudicators, so we are told now, but this, of course, is only a strained interpretation of the statute, the last resort of judges lacking other argument to justify our imprisonment. If the argument be valid, there is no possible excuse for the exemption of the Quakers. And how about the Mennonites? But for the purpose of protection of rights of offspring, the registration of births is much more sensible and effectual.

I shall not ask your valuable space now, Mr. Editor, to show how very inadequate are all these so-called precautions for securing the rights of children. Suffice it to say that an increasingly large number of thoughtful men and women, earnest humanitarians, are satisfied that these "safeguards" constitute a very insignificant factor in the problem, and that liberty in this, as in all other departments of human life, will carry with it the needed responsibility.

You conclude by saying: "Whether the Kansas law is wise or foolish is a question of opinion. A believer in the supremacy of society over the individual will say that it is good. Those who contend that the individual's rights are superior to society's will condemn it."

When I turn to my scrap-book and there scan four intensely graphic pen-pictures from the hand of Eugene Macdonald, in which he most graphically tells us of the crimes committed by society upon the individual, and read his terse summing up of the whole question in the words, "The consensus of the competent is the Inquisition," I cannot doubt which side you will take. I am sure that the Eugene Macdonald who wrote these words will agree with me that the individual's rights are good against any claim of society; in other words, that under a proper adjustment of human relations society will make no claims which conflict with the rights of the individual.

On April 4th we paid costs and left the Oskaloosa jail. In so doing, we in no way or degree acknowledged the assumed right of the state to pry into our private relations, and we were the victims of robbery in that we were compelled to yield our earnings to those who had given nothing in return therefor. We were held by a power possessing greater physical force than our own, a power which does not cognize arguments addressed to the intellectual, moral, and humane faculties of man, and so we paid a ransom for our liberty.

We came out because the precipitation of this conflict upon the postal question has shifted the line of battle, the defense of liberty of expression being paramount to all other issues. M. and G. Harman had been arrested for the alleged mailing of a certain copy of Lucifer, and I knew that there was a warrant out for me for the same alleged "offense." Under these circumstances, every day hereafter we remained in jail was a day lost from activ work. Besides this, we felt that the crime of our imprisonment brought no shame to the hearts of our persecutors. They were content to pay for our board so long as they could thereby keep our pens inactiv. We should hav been out some weeks sooner had outside conditions been different.

The accursed church-state monster has separated us, has murdered our happiness, but it has not made us love or respect it, and it cannot. We are pledged by our sufferings and our devotion to liberty and justice to do all that we can through all the years of our isolated lives to destroy it. E. C. WALKER.

What Beecher Preached.

In his sermon, "Development Through Pain," Sunday morning, July 4, 1880, speaking of the mythological fall, Beecher said:

Now we hav read in book and catechism, and we hav heard told in sermon and essay that the race was created upright. The race never was created upright. There never was such a gigantic lie told since the world was created. If you admit the historic verity of Adam and Eve, which I do not; if you admit this was other than a parable (or fable); in the days when as yet the light of the decrees of God was not revealed; before men had come to any knowledge of God as in the whole creation, round about us and in us; in the childhood of thought on the subject, it may not be strange that men held such views. But that they should go on holding them now in the manhood of human reasoning is most pitiful and confounding. I do not believe that the world has been other than what God meant that it should be. I do not believe that he turned it out first an imperfect piece of work which afterward he had to tinker and tinker all the way down through history. I do not believe that he created men upright, that they dodged and got away from him and fell. That he had to take up some compromise between premises and law, training and restoration; that he went down through thousands of years as a miserable botch workman, and then puttied his work and painted it and plastered it forever after. It is not worthy of God and it is not worthy of the world that he made.

I do not hold to the theory of the atonement as it has been held. You will ask me, perhaps, sarcastically, which theory. I hav at home the statement of twenty well-defined and full-fledged theories of the atonement. And one might very sensibly ask which of these. I hold to this, that the divine nature, because it is divine, broods over the whole human family everywhere; and that the innermost tendency of God's administration is to stimulate men to rise from the lower to the highest state. [The angels say, Amen.] These being disposed of, the mythological devil, who has been used, like a sheriff, to make men pay, fell off, as a tadpole or pollywog loses its tail when it has no further use for it.

There is much more of the same sort in this inspired sermon, that has led men from the worship of mythology to lives of love to all.

With the eternal frost that fell upon his familiar face came the eternal spring of love and admiration into the hearts of his countrymen. Great indeed must be the pulsations of that heart whose sudden stoppage arrests the attention of an entire community. Rabbi, priest, rector, revivalist, and Rationalist met for once in a common sentiment of respect, each carrying an amaranth of honest tribute.

How much better men an honest religion develops! The antiquated thelogy of a savage race tends to develop hatred and distrust among men. Let us hav none of it. G. F. LEWIS.

Professor Fiske's Fling.

Professor Fiske, of Cambridge College, has been held in considerable honor among Freethinkers as a man of advanced ideas for one who is a trainer in the ranks of misty conservatism. But while he was chastising theologians, he has stultified himself by giving Atheists a stab.

The professor says:

If there exists a personal creator of the universe, who is infinitly intelligent and powerful, he cannot be infinitly good. If, on the other hand, he is infinit in goodness, then he must be lamentably finite in power and intelligence. Theology cannot reconcile the fact of the existence of evil with the hypothesis of the infinit power and benevolence of a personal deity. . . . If goodness and intelligence are ascribed to deity, it must be such goodness and intelligence as we hav some knowledge of as manifest in humanity. Theologians, in order to reconcile their ideas of deity with the teachings of science, resort to the most illogical methods, and thus drive earnest seekers after truth into Atheism."

The points that Professor Fiske has made are precisely those that Atheists hav always insisted upon. The method he has used in stating his theses looks as though he had been taking lessons from Bradlaugh. If Professor Fiske is not himself an Atheist, then he must believe in a much abbreviated deity. Indeed, there cannot be much left of his God but the heels and ears. After having shown at length that theology is incompatible with common sense, what can he mean by "driving into Atheism?"

Atheism is the logical conclusion of every attempt at reasoning upon theology, and having come to that conclusion himself, why should Professor Fiske not either hold his peace, or else own the name that his principles entitle him to?

What if the inadequate and contradictory methods of theologians do drive people into Atheism? Since he has shown it to be impossible for theologians to do otherwise, what would he ask of them? After himself having figured it out that a respectable God is impossible, what can Professor Fiske want of any other possible sort of a deity? A weak deity, a fool deity, a base deity, surely Professor Fiske can not desire for himself, and must we suppose that he wants the belief in an impotent and disreputable deity reverenced by others?

Professor Fiske, and all who speak like him, say too much, not to say more. It is time to quit sophistries, to stop saying and unsaying. Being and not being is getting played out. If you think Atheism is so awful, then do not lead up to it by an argument that admits of no other conclusion; and if Atheism is the conclusion of science, then say so, or do not pretend to be the exponent of science. The Christian scientist of every stripe sits on two stools, and his supports are hourly separating. Professor Fiske and all his ilk hav soon to choose which seat they will abide by, or they will suddenly find themselvs completely floored. Yours for consistency,

JOHN PRESCOTT GUILD.

Historical Statements.

In his St. Patrick's day speech the Rev. Dr. McGlynn made the following statement:

"The people to whom St. Patrick preached were living under a just and equitable system of laws evolved by the wisdom of their seers and sages, and inherited largely from the earliest days of the human family, when certain great self-evident principles came into practice as a matter of course. The Irish people were living under what are known as the Brehon laws, in fraternity and equality. The masses were not oppressed by classes; they all were equally entitled to God's bounties; the land of the people belonged to all; no privileged man could forever fence in the land and exclude the rest of his brethren; men possessed land only as tenants of the community, giving a fair equivalent to the community, and under such equitable conditions as were prescribed by the community."

The New York Sun calls this a "remarkable historic error," and, after a thorough consideration of the matter, quotes authority as follows:

"In ancient Ireland private land holding was the marked and significant feature. 'From such individual ownership,' says Dr. Sigerson, 'seven classes derived the dignity of their grades of nobility.' The mensal or office lands were for the support of the office and the supply of the table of the chief. 'The masses were oppressed by the classes.' 'The land noble kept a portion of his land as demesne land. This he had cultivated by laborers or villeins of three kinds who possessed no political rights. The other portion of his land was distributed among two classes of tenants.' One of these classes, called free tenants, rendered to the land noble military service an annual tribute, 'helped him to bear the burden of the tribe'—that is, pay his taxes—'paid his mulcts, and fines, and ransomed him or any of his family who might be taken as hostages.' The other tenants were known as 'base,' and their state was still more abject; while below them were still other grades of workers whose condition, political and civil, was essentially that of serfdom. Compensation for improvements was allowed on yearly tenancies. Security of tenure was recognized under certain circumstances; and under certain circumstances rents could not be capriciously raised. But individual ownership was the rule; the classes did oppress the masses; there was 'no fraternity and equality.'"

"There was nothing in the ancient laws of Ireland differing materially from the ancient laws of other Aryan nations. Historical investigation of the origin of institutions has settled that beyond doubt. The researches of philologists establish it quite as distinctly as the labors of legal antiquaries."

Doubtless upon the points touched the Sun is correct, and Dr. McGlynn is wrong. It is well known that priests sometimes diverge from the straight line of historical accuracy. Ireland has been for centuries an unfortunate country, the object of alms and commiseration. Overburdened with Catholicism, and ridden by Catholic priests, she could be nothing else. This is more than half admitted by Dr. McGlynn in the following assertion from the same address:

"The miseries of the Irish people, apart from certain faults of their own, are largely shown in history to be due to their inalienable fidelity to what they believe to be the highest religious truth, and to certain patriotic and economic principles which they know to be true—that God gave to no nation the right to enslave another, that God gave to no individual man the right to enslave his brother."

The truth contained in the first half of the foregoing sentence has been made familiar to readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, though what Dr. McGlynn calls the "highest religious truth," being the dogmas of the Catholic church, would be better described as the lowest religious superstition. Concerning Irish fidelity to political liberty, the Sun again contradicts the priest:

"It is unfortunately true that, in more moden times, when the race which, contrary to Dr. McGlynn, has suffered nothing by its fidelity to this principle, had a splendid opportunity to apply it toward another race, also the victim of a stronger power, they failed to make any remarkable application of it."

So far truth is with the newspaper, but when the editor makes the next assertion he is plainly and inexcusably in error. Says the Sun:

"It is quite true that God gave to no nation, to no man, the right to enslave another."

It is maintained by Christians that the Bible is the word of God, and it is difficult to see how Dr. McGlynn and the Sun can maintain their position in the face of the plain teaching of that book. In Leviticus, twenty-fifth chapter, verses 44–46, we find this commandment:

"Both thy bondmen and thy bondmaids, which thou shalt hav, shall be of the heathen that are round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids. Moreover, of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you; of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they beget in your land; and they shall be your possession. And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession; they shall be your bondmen forever."

Again, Ex. xxi, 2–4:

"If thou buy a Hebrew servant, six years he shall serve, and in the seventh he shall go out free for nothing. If he came in by himself, he shall go out by himself; if he were married, then his wife shall go out with him. If his master hav given him a wife, and she hav borne him sons or daughters, the wife and her children shall be her master's, and he shall go out by himself."

And again, Ex. xxi, 5, 6:

"And if the servant shall plainly say, I love my master, my wife, and my children, I will not go out free, then his master shall bring him unto the judges; he shall also bring him unto the door, or unto the door-post; and his master shall bore his ears through with an awl, and he shall serve him forever."

Of course God did not giv one man, or one nation, the right to enslave another, because no god, if there were one, could hav the power to confer such a right; but it is plain that the Hebrew lawgiver not only permitted but commanded the Jews to hold slaves. It is only a few years ago that it was discovered that slavery was not a divine institution, and many former slaveholders are still unconvinced.

We do not see that historical accuracy has been materially promoted by the Sun, which, while it detects Dr. McGlynn in an apparent fabrication, itself falls into an error just as gross. It is better to be accurate even on the subject of religion.

Society and the Individual.

There is very little in Mr. Walker's letter upon Kansas law and justice to which we care to take exception. What Mr. Walker and Miss Harman intended by their course, we are willing to allow, he has a better chance to be informed of than the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. We put the matter as it seemed to us, and perhaps it would hav been wiser to qualify the statement by that word. But Mr. Walker shifts his ground when he claims the rights of Quakers. His opposition to recording his marriage we understood to be because he denied in toto the right of the state to hav anything what ever to say about his relations to Miss Harman When he claims that he should be protected in his conscience as are the Quakers, he admits the existence and authority of the state, and is not a consistent Anarchist. That, however, is his business, not ours. In the realm of belief, theory, or any mental exercise, a man has a right to claim and hold any opinion he chooses, and be as inconsistent as the Protestant church. Not only must everyone hav the unquestioned right to think right, but also the right to think wrong. The right to hold an opinion, to utter an opinion, to publish an opinion, must be, as many of the state constitutions put it, forever guaranteed. And further, everyone has the natural right to act as he or she pleases, unless the action invades some other person's right. These two propositions hav become axioms among logical reformers.

Actions, therefore, are all that law can rightfully cognize, and society derives its just authority to make rules from the fact that a good many people desire to so act that other people are thereby deprived of their natural rights to act. In truth, we may say that a majority of the human race would infringe upon others if not restrained. If every man were left to protect himself, he would build a castle, hire retainers, and we should hav feudal times over again, with serfs, vassals, slaves—and robbers known as "lords." For one, we recognize as right the fundamental rules, or the Constitution, upon which our government rests. It is because tyrannous churchmen disobey this Constitution, and enact laws that violate its spirit, that we protest. Sunday laws and other religious legislation are plain violations of the Constitution, because they recognize a religion. And they violate, too, the natural right of every man to think as he pleases, and to not be obliged to help pay the bills of those who hav their thinking done for them.

As for recording marriages, some states require it; some do not. But if Mr. Walker admits the right of Kansas to require records of real estate transfers, he must admit its right to also require a record of other transactions; those requiring record being, of course, the transactions which affect the affairs of others besides the parties directly interested. Granted that the state has the right to make a rule, it has an equal right to enforce it. That a penalty is inflicted in one case and not in another has nothing to do with the right to make the rule or to enforce it.

The personal argument used by Mr. Walker in his eighth paragraph is fallacious. He must admit that a person has a right to protect himself, and not only to protect himself and his property, but to protect himself against having to pay taxes to support other people's children. If every one were left to do this for himself, we should, as we hav said, hav feudal times again upon us. Instead, man delegates this right, which he naturally possesses, to some one chosen by himself and others like him, and he says to a woman, "Here, if you are going to get married, just record the name of your husband, so we may know whom to look to for the children's support. Experience demonstrates that your marriage may affect the pocket of every person who pays taxes, and we hav a natural right to protect ourselvs against the possibility." And this is a wise precaution. If the authorities of this state could only get hold of the fathers of the pauper children it supports and make them care for their offspring, the churches would hav a less substantial fulcrum for their thieving lever which pries open the state treasury. In the case of an honest man a record is not necessary. He will fulfil all his honorable obligations without the law. But there are too many dishonest men in the world—men who if they could marry and conceal their obligation would do so—to make it safe to repeal all laws; and, as Mr. Walker very justly observes, "all laws should be general in their nature." We thoroughly agree with his protest against exempting Quakers from the operation of the law.

Mr. Walker cites an article that we wrote some years ago, and says, "I am sure that the Eugene Macdonald who wrote these words will agree with me that the individual's rights are good against any claim of society; in other words, that under a proper adjustment of human relations society will make no claims which conflict with the rights of the individual." Mr. Walker is right. Under a proper adjustment of human relations there will be no need of laws. If the world were so far along in its evolution that every one were honest, charitable to others, and exactly just, laws would be unnecessary. The individual's rights are good against any claim of society so long as the individual does not invade others' rights. But just where that line can be drawn no one knows. The line is here to-day and there to-morrow. It moves just as fast as progress moves, just as fast as civilization civilizes, just as fast as man becomes honest and tolerant. The line is different in different states of society, different in every community—in almost every family. No man is so poor, so lonely, so isolated that his actions do not affect some one, and none can be so great that he is not bound to consider the effect of his actions upon others. The "consensus of the competent" is an arrogant claim of bigoted intellect or intolerant sentiment, and Mr. Walker may well snap his fingers in the faces of those who set it up, and ask them if they hav from some almighty a certificate of their competency. The perfect man in this world is scarce.

The Saturday Half-Holiday and the Museums.

The Christian at Work says:

"If those who are so persistently advocating the opening of museums and libraries are really sincere in their efforts to benefit the working classes, they can show their sincerity by cultivating the virtue of patience; and they will only hav to do so for a few weeks. The Senate has just passed a bill making Saturday afternoon a legal half-holiday. It will pass the Assembly soon. Then the excuse that the workingman cannot visit the museums and libraries in the afternoon will fall to the ground. The fact is, this approaching half-holiday law—soon, we trust, to be extended so as to make the entire day a holiday—will do away with many of the pleas which hav gone up for Sunday recreation. The movement unfortunately comes late—after Sunday excursions hav been established and hav found their palliation in the confinement to their work and their unlovely tenements of half a million of our people for six days in the week. Is it any wonder that under such circumstances they should long for green fields, smiling skies, and the fresh sea breezes? But as to museums and libraries, which are not yet opened on Sunday, let us bide a wee. That Saturday half-holiday law will be here with the June breezes; and surely the laborer, the citizen, the clerk, whoever he may be and whatever his calling, can wait till then for a privilege which, extended now, will only be at the cost to other employees of that very Sunday labor which he so stoutly rejects for himself. The Golden Rule comes in with added force here; and it would be well if those who insist upon Sunday opening of museums and libraries would giv it a personal trial."

Such talk as this is simply rot. The Saturday half-holiday will not afford the benefits claimed, for the reason that the workers will not be afforded sufficient time by it to visit the museums. The museums are far up-town, the workers are down-town. When the mechanic has reached his home, cleaned and clothed himself, made the usual Saturday preparations for Sunday (now perforce made in the evening), he will find no time remaining for travel to Central Park. But if he could go, his wife could not, for her household duties keep her confined and busy long into the evening. Sunday morning the family is ready for its pleasuring, the trip to Central Park is made, and then it is that the museums should be open.

The Saturday half-holiday is a beneficent measure that should speedily become a law; and it probably will, because the bank officials who defeated it last year hav apparently made up their great minds that it is bound to come sooner or later, and this year is as good as any. The leisure it will afford is necessary for the proper preparation for Sunday, which is the holiday enjoyed by nearly everybody. Let us hav the Saturday half-holiday, the museums and libraries open on Sundays, and then make the most of them. Pleasure and happiness are none too plenty in this world, and should be scattered with lavish hand by all who can in any way control them.

The Case of Mr. Louis Wolfes.

The expulsion of Louis Wolfes from a lodge of Odd Fellows, reported in another column, presents some curious aspects. The primary object of the Odd Fellows is benevolence—"to visit the sick, relieve the distressed, bury the dead, and educate the orphan." Their motto is, "Friendship, Love, and Truth." They profess to seek "to improve and elevate the character of man, imbue him with proper conceptions of his capabilities for good, enlighten his mind, and enlarge the sphere of his affections." They believe in a "Great Author" of man's being, and an applicant for membership must say he believes in a "Supreme Being, the Creator and Preserver of the Universe," all beginning with capital letters. There is nothing in the ritual, however, which forbids a man to change his mind, or prohibits his engaging a Freethought lecturer and listening to his speeches. Religion, beyond the simple and primitiv Deism expressed by a belief in a supreme being, is not supposed to necessarily constitute a part of an Odd Fellow's equipment.

The Hall of Tuscarora Lodge, No. 24, of Martinsburg, West Va., has therefore gone far beyond its jurisdiction in expelling Mr. Wolfes because during the thirty-four years he has lived since he joined the order he has changed his mind and has besides encouraged the activ officer of an organization for the separation of church and state. To be honest with himself, Mr. Wolfes is obliged to say that he does not know whether a "supreme being" exists. There are a good many other folks in the same mental predicament, though it would probably be absurd to suppose that any of the Martinsburg Christians hav the intelligence to doubt it. To them Jehovah is a real, big man, and the serpent a genuin snake on legs, gifted with vocal organs. For doubting the existence of such a "God" it may be within the power of a lodge to expel a member, but it is difficult to see where the authority is derived upon which the second specification is based. A belief in immortality and the Bible is not set down as necessary to membership, and nothing is said in any of the books regulating the conduct of a member toward Mr. Putnam when he lectures in town. The questions put to Mr. Wolfes are irrelevant and ridiculous, and serve best to show that his fellow-members were desirous of but one thing—to punish him, so far as they could, for his heresy. The inquisition was a disgrace to the lodge, and the lodge's action a load of infamy for the order to bear.

The Intention of the Churches.

It cost E. C. Walker and Lillian Harman one hundred and thirteen dollars and eighty cents to obtain their liberty from the Jefferson county officials after serving more than their sentence of imprisonment. They consider themselvs to hav been robbed by superior physical force. Mr. Walker has also been rearrested and held to bail upon the same charge brought against Moses and George S. Harman. Of this triple-headed indictment Mr. Walker says:

"What will be the outcome of the United States prosecution, of course we can do no more than guess. Even though it be the worst possible, it will not plunge us into despair and it will not murder the cause of free press and mails. And—more important than our individual fates—it will not kill Lucifer. When one man falls a victim to the Comstock kidnappers, another will step into his place and do his work. Now is the time to be awake and to labor night and day for the cause made glorious by the heroes and martyrs of the generations gone, the cause our fathers loved, the cause it should be our highest joy to serve, the cause which is the hope of the truest and noblest of earth—the cause of liberty. And we appeal to the Freethinkers of America to join hands with us as they did with D. M. Bennett, of revered memory; as the Secularists of England did with Bradlaugh and Besant; with Foote, and Ramsey, and Kemp, and help us to roll back this assaulting army of oppression, help us to keep the torch of Lucifer brightly blazing in the van of the battle, help us to keep the stainless folds of its flag in the pure upper air, help us to make this indeed a land of freedom and justice. Each can do a little, and all together can do much. Let each do his or her little, and the much will be accomplished. The forces are aligned for the mightiest conflict of the ages. Be not deceived, ours is not an isolated case. We are an outpost, and the enemy means to drive us back, preparatory to an attack upon the second line, that of the purely Infidel press. If you doubt, read the church organs, read the daily papers, read the records of congressional, legislativ, and municipal legislation."

Mr. Walker is, we think, accurate in his reading of the signs. We do not know, of course, whether the Kansas prosecutors of the people connected with Lucifer are in communication with the agents of the society for the propagation of vice in this city, but certain it is that the last-named scamps hav been very activ the past winter, in both national and state legislativ bodies. In the United States Senate the postal law was very broadly amended, but the amendment failed in the House of Representativs. At the capital of New York a bill is still pending under which about one-half the editors of the state and nearly all of the medical writers could be sent to jail. Of what has been done in other state legislatures we possess no knowledge.

These things indicate that the church societies desire the power to throttle their opponents, and they hav chosen a good tool to work the screws that will do it. Fortunately, the people are beginning to find him out, and his race is by no means a walk-over. We doubt if any new legislation in Washington or New York can be credited to him this winter. But the three indicted men in Kansas should hav the open aid of all friends of freedom. Prejudices should be smothered in this as in the case of D. M. Bennett, for it was clearly Mr. Harman's right to print what he did, and no strained construction of Mr. Markham's article, upon which the prosecution of Messrs. Harman and Walker is based, can "confound it with those obscene publications, the effect and object of which is to excite the imagination and inflame the passions." And it was Attorney-General Devens's opinion, when he wrote these words of the book for selling which Mr. Bennett was imprisoned, that unless a work could be so confounded the Comstock statute could not apply to it.

One of those bucolic legislators who like to sleep late on Sunday mornings has introduced a bill in the Assembly of this state providing for the suspension of traffic on the Erie Canal on Sundays out of respect to the farmers adjacent to the great water thoroughfare, who object to the noise of the canal-boat men. The bill should be amended so that the canal men shall go to church and be locked in all the time they are forced to "lie to," otherwise the farmers will miss more than they will gain by the bill. Canal boatmen are a good deal like a certain reformer who went about Judea—they havn't much respect for cornfields on the Sabbath day.

Philip H. Bruck, the new mayor of Columbus, Ohio, is an outspoken Freethinker, and his majority over his Christian opponent was eleven hundred and ten votes. He was nominated by the Democrats.

A Jersey City Roman Catholic woman has publicly apologized to the priest and congregation of St. Paul's church, of which she was a member, for marrying a Protestant. This was done under a law of the Baltimore council of prelates. It is astonishing how closely some slaves hug their chains.

Dispatches from Rome announce that the Catholic church will recognize the Knights of Labor, and hereafter the priests cannot refuse the rites of the church to members of that order. This is a wise step for the church, and will giv satisfaction to many Knights. Others, however, will not care two straws.

The Christian at Work is troubled over the problem of whether, under the new Interstate Commerce law, delegates to religious conventions can obtain reduced railroad fares. It is a great question, and should be settled at once. Otherwise the religious conventions of the coming summer may be slimly attended.

The Denison, Texas, Sunday Gazetteer suggests that the Unitarians, Universalists, Spiritualists, "Freethinkers," and others of Liberal religious views in that town organize a stock company, purchase an eligible lot, and erect a building for a public hall and reading room. A good lecture hall that will not cost the receipts of a night's lecture to pay the rent, it says, is sadly needed in Denison, and the means to provide it could be raised very readily if a few enterprising men would take hold of the matter. The Gazetteer agrees to render a little financial help to such an enterprise.

John Swinton shoots very wide of the mark in this:

"The Knights of Labor of New York, or rather all our labor organizations, should prepare to offer a grand reception, as soon as he reaches this port, to Cardinal Gibbons, who has made such a memorable defense of advancing labor, before the pope in the Eternal City. . . . No other dignitary of the church in America has ever spoken for labor as Cardinal Gibbons has."

Cardinal Gibbons really defended his church before the pope. He spoke to retain his clientelle, their patronage, his own official position, and to benefit his own pocket. The office of cardinal would be of no dignity and less use without the thousands of prostrate slaves now owned by Rome. Cardinal Gibbons saw that the pope was in danger of scattering his flock by too stringent rules, and he gave him a little advice for his own good. Mr. Gibbons is a shrewd dealer in Catholic intellect, and knows about what the traffic will bear.

The funeral of the late Michael A. Morrissey, the well-known Freethinker of Troy, N. Y., occurred on Tuesday, the 5th instant, from the Trojan Hook and Ladder House, which had been suitably draped for the occasion. The fact that the deceased died an Infidel, says the Troy Observer, the knowledge that the ceremonies would be of unusual character, and the great popularity of Mr. Morrissey among firemen served to attract a very large number of people, many of whom were unable to gain admission. The services were of a fitting character, arranged by Mr. Morrissey himself previous to his death, which was caused by cancer of the face. Bryant's "Thanatopsis" was read, a quartet sang, "Why Should We Fear?" and J. J. McCabe, of Albany, delivered what might be called the sermon, though it was very different from the usual lachrymose discourses of such occasions. The address is published in the Troy Observer of April 10th. The interment was in Oakwood cemetery. Mr. Morrissey was a public spirited citizen, and his place of business in Troy was the recognized headquarters of the heresy of the town. Liberal lecturers found there a cheering welcome.

Henry George finds in the colossal income of Archbishop Corrigan substantial reasons why that gentleman's sympathies lean toward the wealthy. In the first place, Mr. Corrigan is provided by the church with a marble palace, furnished for him and maintained free of cost. Second, he receives from the cathedral funds a salary of five thousand dollars per annum. Third, he receives from each church in the diocese what is called a cathedraticum, being an annual payment of $200 a year each from all but the poorest parishes. This cathedraticum, says Mr. George, probably aggregates not less than $15,000 a year. The fourth source of income is the fee of one dollar paid Mr. Corrigan for every interment in Calvary cemetery, the great burial-ground of the Catholics of New York. According to the official statistics there were in Calvary cemetery last year 14,374 burials from New York city alone, while from Brooklyn and other cities the interments in this vast cemetery during the same time must hav aggregated at least half as many more. Thus the income of the archbishop from this source alone must be over $20,000, which, added to the two previous items, givs him at leart $40,000 a year—the income, calculated at four per cent, of a millionaire. Added to this, the archbishop is continually in receipt of large gifts and fees from his wealthy parishoners, bringing his personal income up to thousands more. And yet Mr. George has no word of censure for the system of ecclesiastical imposture which givs rise to this robbery, but only denounces the personality of the robber. Had Dr. McGlynn stood in Archbishop Corrigan's shoes, the Standard would never hav made war on the wages of the pope's lieutenant.

Letters from Friends.

NORTH LAKE, WIS., March 14, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I expected that I would hav got a couple of new subscribers besides myself, but I find it impossible at present, though I hope that the near future will swell the subscription list of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I would not like to part with it. I like its policy—full-fledged Infidel. I belong to the class of people that are termed uneducated, and for that reason I will hav to take the back seat, and would hav been left altogether if common sense had not set me thinking.

I tender my thanks to THE TRUTH SEEKER and its editor for benefits received the last year, and I will remain yours for another year. AMBROSE SORENSEN.

LONGMONT, COL., Feb. 27, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Will you, or some one of your readers who is able to do so, please inform me in whose writings the following language is to be found, and whose death it describes?

He died forlorn and forsaken of God, blaspheming to the very end. . . . He died of scarlet-fever, overrun and eaten up by ulcerous abscesses, the stench of which drove every person away. He gave up the ghost, despairing of salvation, and evoking devils from the abyss, and uttering oaths most horrible, and blasphemies most frightful.

I wish the name of the work in which this is found, the page, etc., and would like to hav the whole paragraph of which it is a part. Yours truly, JOHN R. KELSO.

BEOKTON, WYO., March 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of Feb. 26, 1887, I notice wherever the verb have occurs, you hav omitted the final e, spelling it hav. Now, I am curious to know what is your reason for so doing, as I am sure you must hav some good reason, as it could hardly be a typographical error, occurring not only once, but throughout the edition wherever the word is used.

Trusting you will enlighten me on the subject, I am,
Respectfully yours, THOS. W. FISHER.

[The e is dropped from hav, giv, and liv because it is unnecessary. This form of spelling was adopted by the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER several years ago.—ED. T. S.]

BAPTONIA, IND., March 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I was in conversation with a minister the other day and quoted, as I supposed, a passage of scripture: "The imagination of man's heart is evil from his infancy." He said there was no such passage. I hav not been able to find it, but I certainly hav read it in substance if not in form. Will you please inform me through the columns of your paper of any such passage if it exists, and oblige,

Yours truly, T. S. KENNON.

[The minister is not a Bible student. Genesis viii, 21, says: "And the Lord smelled a sweet savor; and the Lord said in his heart, I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake; for the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth: neither will I again smite any more everything living, as I hav done."—ED. T. S.]

TALENT, OR., March 21, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 to renew my subscription to your valuable paper. My wife says she cannot keep house without it. My boy, seven years old, counts every day in the week till Saturday, and he calls it TRUTH SEEKER day.

Since you illustrated your paper it is the best educator for the young children I ever saw. They take in the pictures at a glance of the eye, and if the parents will only do their part, and explain them to the children, then good-bye, superstition. No sky-pilot will pull the wool over their eyes and make them believe that one is three and three is one, and so on through the whole catalog of Bible foolishness. I am in sympathy with your paper in all things, and admire the fearless stand you take on all unpopular questions.

May THE TRUTH SEEKER liv till it has demolished all bigotry and superstition. WM. H. BREESE.

SUTTON, PA., March 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I received a letter of inquiry and solicitation, and hasten to answer. I am past eighty-seven years old. I feel it. I loaned D. M. Bennett $25 to start THE TRUTH SEEKER with, the best, really most needed, paper in the world, A.D. 1874. I hav tried to interest the people of Richford, Berkshire, Montgomery, and Sutton, Canada, but never could get anyone to take it over three months. I am glad to hear of the good success of our lecturers. I hope sometime people generally will think that truth is more valuable to us than falsehood. I reject all systems of superstition. The only true religion is the religion of humanity. This left out, all superstition is a curse. Until children are educated to be honest with themselvs, truthful and just to others, we shall hav a world of misery and woe, because education forms the common mind. Children could as easily be trained to go to heaven on the theory of justice, goodness, and truth, as faith in fifty or one hundred differing creeds. Why did God write: "The dead know not anything" (Eccl. ix, 5); "Man has no preëminence above a beast" (Eccl. iii, 15-21); "Man dieth, in that very day his thoughts perish" (Ps. cxlvi); "If a man die shall he liv again?" (Job xiv, 14.) God did not write this. Who did write it? We don't know! If the world is as bad as the New York Sun makes it—and the Bible also, why should I believe there is a God?—only priestcraft. But humanity is here, and in deep trouble, being falsely educated. If there was such a superhuman entity as the Jewish and Christian God, he would make himself positivly known to mankind as he is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works. I cannot get folks to read THE TRUTH SEEKER, "Champions of the Church," "Sages and Thinkers," Kersey Graves, Morris Einstein, Lord Amberley, and a large number of other smaller volumes. It seems that Judaism and Christianity were gotten up to torture, murder, kill, and damn all who do not believe as the pope does. I deny a God that makes popes of millions of selfish dishonest, fallible men. I want a God that is pope himself, and attends to his own business, not giv his honor to hypocrits. Some are sending selfish, lazy drones to preach immortal soul and endless punishment after death to the heathen. Truth seekers are sending men to say that our Bible, on every page, is proof positiv that it is a priest's fabrication! God made man to eat the forbidden fruit, then made a Christ to die to atone for the crime; then God made a pope to pardon every one's sins for a little money per head, if they all will support the pope's hierarchy, or all be endlessly damned. "God alone hath immortality" (1 Tim. vi, 16).

JOSEPH NOYES.

FORT CUSTER, MONT., April 2, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $4 95 for publications. There are a few Liberals in this wild country. Four of us at Fort Custer meet every other night in a little room and discuss Liberalism and Freethought. We intend to organize a Liberal club. We hav not decided what name we shall giv it. We think the army needs Freethought just as much as Boonton, N. J., does. I must giv you the names of those in the good work here: Frank Heric, Willard Fields, W. Littleton, and myself. We intend to make this club one of the best in the territory. Although we are only four, four determined men can do a great deal. We send you only a few dollars this time, but it shall not be the last, for you will hear from me again soon. I like your paper more and more. It is truly a grand and great paper. May the editor liv long to spread the gospel of truth for a good many years to come.

CHAS. SOHWAAB, Band, 1st Cavalry, Fort Custer, Mont.

INGALLS, KAN., March 26, 287.

MR. EDITOR: I see the name of R. Butterfield, of California, in my last paper. I wonder if his father was a preacher, as was mine. He says he takes nine papers. I take only seven. I take THE TRUTH SEEKER because I hav to. The children are all taken up with the pictures, and now they are beginning to tease for paper and stamps to write for the "Children's Corner." And then my wife always has a sick spell if THE TRUTH SEEKER does not come on time. I like to read it myself. I sent you three new subscribers last week, and now I send you some thirty names to send sample copies to. I hav the promis of two more subscribers. And let me say to all Freethinkers who hav the cause at heart, cultivate in yourselvs all those ennobling principles you love to see in others. I used to attend church and the old Methodist class-meeting, and tell what great things the Lord Jesus had done for me, parrot-like; but I slid up to a higher plane of thought some ten years ago, and I hav been a better and a happier man ever since. A. BUTTERFIELD.

TALENT, OR., March 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: While so many are having their say about the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will say I think they are just the thing, none of them so shocking as one I saw in an illustrated Bible of some men stoning another man to death.

The Baptists of this place hav been holding revival meetings lately, several conversions are reported. It is said a wealthy citizen of this place formerly gave the elder $1 each for converts, but has gone back on them lately. I suppose the preacher will be a little less zealous since there is less money in it now.

There are quite a number of Liberals here, also a Liberal hall where we meet every Sunday; hav a club now that is run on a plan somewhat like that of the Manhattan Liberal Club.

We are in hopes Mr. Putnam will stop here on his way through Oregon.

I inclose $3 to apply on subscription. WM. TERRILL.

SAN BERNADINO, CAL., March 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The friends of Liberalism and Freethought hav enjoyed the rare treat of listening to three of the characteristic lectures of Dr. J. L. York.

The doctor has been at Los Angeles for several weeks past, where he has organized a Liberal League. As S. P. Putnam was booked for the last two Sundays of this month at Los Angeles, the doctor concluded to come here and stir us up. He spoke at the Opera House on the evenings of March 20th and 22d; and as O. S. Fowler had the place engaged for the 27th, the doctor lectured in Liberal Hall on the afternoon of the above date. The doctor is well known to the old residents, having been here some twelve years ago. He had large audiences at the Opera House, but a smaller one at the hall. The Spiritualists own this hall, and hav a society, but are almost completely run down. As in some other places, some of them hav been more intent upon aspersing and maligning others than in working for the establishment of Liberalism. They hav apparently succeeded, in this vicinity, in convincing the mass of the community that Spiritualists are the meanest people in the world; and their place of meeting is shunned as a moral pest-house. This explains the reason of his smaller audience at the Hall.

Dr. York is, in the language of the West, "a full team and a horse to let." He holds an audience for two hours, and yet they want more. His lectures are models of accurate, scientific thinking. He blinks no question, and evades no position. In precise and eloquent language he presents the most radical positions of L beralism. Others, perhaps, may do this as well as he, but there is a perpetual breaking out of the most inimitable humor, which keeps an audience in a state of constant exhilaration. The wants of the logician are fully met, and there is more laugh than in a circus.

Dr. York will leave the Pacific coast, via Salt Lake and Denver, for the East, some time in May, and it is unnecessary to ask for him a cordial reception, as it will be accorded him wherever he goes. J. S. LOVELAND.

AYER, MASS., March 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Will you please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 3, 1886? The number I hav is too badly worn to be bound. I shall get the entire Volume XIII. bound so I can lend it without losing any of the numbers. It is doubly valuable for its illustrations. They speak volumes.

If the old stories and the present acts match the pictures, whose fault is it? If the pictures are spirited or foolish, and fit the stories, and are distasteful, then "let the dead bury the dead," and let the living, the progressiv, furnish better subjects for the efficient artist.

I trust many will preserve the illustrated volumes in bound form. They are destined to grow in favor as the people become enlightened, as they will if they take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and see and read what dupes they hav been, and might continue to be. But "now that light has come into the world" they hav no excuse for this ignorance. How long will people be led by the nose and listen to blind guides—tombstones telling of the dead past? How long be content to wear the yoke and collar, or even the marks of either?

Fraternally yours, E. MYRIOK.

NEW BEDFORD, PA., March 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: We are having a little excitement here just now. The clergy hav talked very insultingly of the Infidels, speaking, of course, from the coward's castle, the pulpit; and in order that a little light might be elicited on the subject we appointed a discussion of the following resolution in the town hall and invited the preachers to participate in the discussion. This they not only refused to do, but did their utmost to prevent people from attending the discussion. In this they failed, as there was a fair, attentiv, and intelligent audience, and the absurdity of the church's position in connection with the subject was fully shown. The resolution was: "Resolved, That the Bible teaches the doctrin of salvation by good works."

On the first Tuesday in April we discuss the question: "Resolved, That the principles of the Prohibition party are sustained by the Bible." The platform is free to all. We expect the clergy to affirm, or stand justly branded with cowardice before the community.

For the inclosed please send me E. C. Walker's "Bible Temperance." W. W. WALKER.

WALNUT GROVE, KAN., April 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Your notice of the 12th of March is at hand, and I will respond at once. Inclosed please find amount to pay subscription; use balance as directed. Those cartoons are dead-shots to the church-people, more so to those sky-pilots who teach the people something that they do not know themselvs. We hav a very strong set of fanatics; some are perfect; they cannot sin, but they can lie just the same. I hav had a hot time in this nest of hornets, but they hav lost their sting, so that they cannot come to the front as they used to. The pastor of the Methodist church held a protracted meeting this winter for over six weeks, but only converted four or five old backsliders.

My daughter's little infant, five weeks old, died, and her husband's father and mother wanted its funeral preached, so they employed the Rev. George Rarick, of the Methodist Episcopal church; but instead of preaching the baby's, he preached my funeral, and I was there to hear it, alive as usual, and he must hav forgotten the baby, for several of the church-members laugh at me and say that I got a free fun eral sermon. It finished him up here, and did the church much harm and us some good. W. H. NOAH.

LINCOLN, ILL., March 25, 1887.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: I notice that the secretary of the treasury has decided that Chinese gods, fashioned, as all gods, by the imagination and hand of man, must pay a duty at the custom house! Wonder if this is an entering wedge to tax all other gods, their supposed tabernacles, paraphernalia, images, etc.? If our gods, with all their "pomp and circumstance," are to hav a recognition at the hands of the state, and be protected by the strong arm, without tax, where is the famous liberty that we accord to religious worship? The little Joss is, presumably, as sacred to the "heathen Chinee" as our cross, holy water, statues of virgins and saints, fine churches, stained windows, flummery, flapdoodle, organs, bells, hog-wash, memorials, nunneries, prisons, racks, boycotts, persecutions, and blood-letting are to us; yet they must be taxed, although "Congress shall pass no law respecting the establishment of religion nor preventing the free exercise thereof." Where is there any more idolatry in worshiping a little wooden image than in counting beads, kneeling at a confessional, or crossing the face with a tip of the finger in holy water, to say nothing of day worship, priest worship, and countless other observances that are nothing more than idolatry, or a giving away of reason, and putting our right to think and act into the hands of possibly some "ordained" rascal? If our gods are not taxed, why impose a burden on Juggernaut or Joss? Of course, the thing to do is to let everything that receives protection pay its just proportion of the expense that the state is required to pay to guard and preserve it from the ruthless hand of robbery and anarchy. Tax a Joss—tax a church. Let those who want idols bear all expense, and not require me to support, by law, a system of what I think the most absurd, useless, and mind-debasing nonsense ever perpetrated upon credulous man, and "consequently" woman too.

It will never be possible for one person to ride two horses going in opposit directions, without at least losing foothold on one or the other. It is amusing to see a certain class of mythological acrobats trying to make the "Book" quadrate to the facts of science and geology. For instance, the days consumed in the wonderful creation were geological periods, possibly of millions of years; yet the account says the evening and the morning were the first day. The sun was to rule the day, the moon the night. That part of the program still goes on—twelve hours for each. Countless cases may be called where the mythologist takes refuge in his horse-back exercise.

And then that story about the genealogy of our savior! In the two accounts in the "gospels" there is such a wonderful difference in the names in the line of descent! Then, too, the genealogy is of Joseph, and Joseph not being the father of Jesus, the genealogy is just no genealogy at all. The two-horse act comes in again by saying that Joseph was the father by divine appointment—by adoption, as it were, to carry out prophecy. That kind of parentage is not very popular to-day, but the Jews were of such easy virtue that almost anything was respectable. We drop these few thoughts for the brethren. SLO HYOUM.

MIDDLEBURY, IND., March, 15, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 25 for THE TRUTH SEEKER one year and the ANNUAL for 286. Your paper is now ahead of all the journals of Freethought published. I hav been interested in its advancement from the first, having watched its evolution from its embryotic state in Illinois to ts present condition of maturity in the great metropolis of America. The illustrations mark an epoch in its history. Watson Heston is to-day doing as much to free the mind from the old, rusty, galling chains of mental slavery as any man in the United States. His influence for good will as certainly reach down through all coming ages as will that of Pythagoras, Galileo, Copernicus, Newton, Paine, or Ingersoll. It is encouraging to see how fast the human race are evoluting. Reason will eventually become enthroned the supreme king of our world. Yet we occasionally hear from some old fossil who belongs way back in the Dark Ages. Such antiquated, fossilized old remains are not altogether worthless. We should remember that all fossils hav a geological interest, serving to show what things formerly peopled the earth. They should be kindly taken care of, for they are somewhat scarce, and usually, on account of their antiquity, are in a condition more or less decomposed. The town of Mapleton, Kansas, is able to support just one of these curiosities—the Rev. J. W. Caldwell—who can be found in a large "untaxable museum" every Sunday.

Yours very truly, ISAAC IVINS, aged 81 years.

SOLDIERS' HOME, WIS., March 29, 287.

MR. EDITOR: I send you a few quotations from this most marvelous tale in Genesis. Of course, it has been repeated time and again in THE TRUTH SEEKER and elsewhere, yet it may interest new subscribers. It is a singular fact that the most devout Bible-worshipers are those who know the least about it, and those who are constantly yearning to die a martyr in its defense cannot read it or anything else. "And the Lord God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: but of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it, for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die" (Gen. ii, 16, 17). "And the serpent said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die: for God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil" (Gen. iii, 4. 5). "And unto Adam he said, Because thou hast hearkened to the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree which I commanded thee saying, Thou shalt not eat of it: cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life" (Gen. iii, 17). "And all the days that Adam lived were nine hundred and thirty years, and he died" (Gen. v, 5). "And the Lord God said unto the serpent, Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field: upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life" (Gen. iii, 14).

These passages from the book that Christendom has sworn by for centuries need no comment from me. The five-year-old boy in Sunday-school will readily and correctly answer all plain questions about snakes and gods. Now, Johnny, speak up loud, Which lied, this God or the snake?

SALINA, KAN., March 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Is it any wonder that the church of Christ, or rather, the Christian church, has fallen into bad repute with the world's people, when the history of the church is so full of such incidents as the refusal of some Western ministers to pass resolutions of sympathy for the family of the late Henry Ward Beecher? Just because Mr. Beecher, who has for many years stood head and shoulders above the ministers of the United States in intellect, did not believe in that consoling promis of a future place of torment recorded in the holy book, they refuse to extend sympathy to the heart-broken family in this their darkest hour. Just because Mr. Beecher did not believe as they did, they are glad he is dying. Just because Mr. Beecher possesses a brighter and a more progressiv mind than his fellow-preachers, they will be glad to hear of his death. For shame. Is it any wonder that the world has become disgusted with these ranting preachers—these sky-pilots? Is it any wonder the church is losing its influence?

This Chicago body of ranting sky-pilots, in their failing to pass resolutions of sympathy for Mrs. Beecher and family, certainly manifested the same feeling that existed in the hearts of the early persecutors of the past ages. The same feeling pervaded the heart of John Calvin when he burnt Servetus at the stake, also the hearts of those who nailed Jesus Christ to the cross. This same feeling will last till every man, woman, and child is accorded the God-given right of Freethought—the right to free expression of one's views upon all subjects pertaining to the past, present, and future.

Friend Macdonald, I hav neither written nor spoken on the subject of Freethought since I was forced by continued bad health to giv up the publication of my paper, the Thinker, till I read this article this morning, when my indignation knew no bounds. I offer this as my excuse for writing this letter. Yours for universal mental liberty,

C. W. STOWE, M.D.

CLARA, PA., Feb. 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $5 to renew my subscription, and to pay for a new subscriber, Truman A. Barnes, a Liberal who, I hope, will be a permanent member of the TRUTH SEEKER family. Where Mr. Barnes livs (Millport, Pa.) is a hard place for orthodoxy. Sky-pilots of nearly every denomination hav tried, but all alike fail, to make converts. The meetings are quite well attended, and the people contribute quite freely to support the preacher, though it is mostly done by those who do not belong to any church; but when they are told that sinners will go to sheol, they don't seem to realize that it means them, and don't get scared as they ought to to be converted.

The subscribers of THE TRUTH SEEKER about here were of the mind of H. Clay Luse as regards the cartoons. Like the Methodist girl who said, when she "found that her hoops and jewelry was drawing her soul right down to hell, she took them off and gave them to her sister;" so, if we don't like the pictures, we can take them out and giv them to our Christian friends.

An old subscriber wants me to ask you to reprint what was published in THE TRUTH SEEKER years ago as the Cathartic creed, a sort of burlesque on the Athanasian creed. It is a good thing to render the absurdities of the latter conspicuous. I. L. ALLEN.

[The Cathartic Creed will be found on another page of this issue.—ED. T. S.]

NATIONAL CITY, CAL., March 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In regard to my renewing my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I must say that as long as I liv and can find money enough to pay for it I shall be a subscriber. I could not possibly get along without it. My dear friend, it is the grandest paper that ever was printed. It contains absolute truth and common sense. I cannot express my appreciation of all the splendid men who write their convictions and show us the truth against ignorance and superstition. There is one man amongst all others (of course I except our great and glorious Ingersoll), that is, John Peck. Oh, that we had thousands of such men with his brilliant abilities! How I should like to shake him by the hand and call him friend—not forgetting all the rest—Mr. Reynolds, Putnam, and others. I feel very glad the Boonton superstitious idiots are ashamed of themselvs. I think, with you, they will never bring his case up. Ignorant and superstitious as they hav proven themselvs to be, they must hav enough sense to know the world would condemn them.

As you see by the post-office order, I hav got two more subscribers. I hav been lending THE TRUTH SEEKER to them, and they are like me—can't get along without it. When my time came to renew my subscription, I said to them: "Look here! the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER can't afford to supply three of us on one charge; won't you subscribe with me? We can hav three copies for $7. I am willing for us to pay equal." The critters jumped at the chance. I am in hopes of getting more subscribers. I will do my best, for I am one that would like to see the truth spread and accepted by the entire world.

Yours till death, JAMES WORKMAN.

RED OAK, MO., March 13, E.M. 287.

MR. EDITOR: I hav received the first copy of your splendid paper, and I can say that I am more than pleased with the sample. I intend to be a regular subscriber as long as I can find the money. This place is almost petrified in the rock of ignorance and faith. Almost everybody knows my views on orthodoxy, and they do not say much to me on the subject. They undertook to convert me by storm last fall, but the guns of the devil, as Sam Jones says, kept them at a safe distance. One old preacher came into my shop for a talk. He said he never had talked with an Infidel, and he wanted to hear what they could say in defense of their disbelief, or against Christianity. I told him I could not say much, but would do all I could for him. "Well," said he, "I will ask you a question, and, perhaps, that will lead to another. Can you tell me," said he, "what makes so many different languages in the world?" I said, "I will answer your question by asking you one, or, in other words, your answer to mine will likely be my answer to yours." Said I, "Can you tell me what makes so many different shades of color in the human race?" "Oh!" said he, "that is the effect of climate, diet, conditions, and surroundings." "Very good," said I, "that is a good answer to your question. One is just as much the effect of climate as the other." Well, the way I got out of that bothered him. Of course he attributed diverse languages to the old Babel lie, but I got the start of him, and I held him down all of the time for about an hour. I got him so excited that he took off his hat and squared himself, and preached a regular old hard-shell sermon. I listened and worked away at my bench, and once in a while I would giv him a shot from one of Bob's guns, and I never missed him, and every time he would get worse. He said that he knew that he had a life eternal beyond the grave. Said I, "Do you know positivly what is going to happen to-morrow?" Of course he did not. "Then if you cannot tell one day ahead in life, how can you tell what will be after death? If you do not and cannot know all on this side of the great river that rolls between us and eternity, how can you tell what is on the farther shore? After all," said I, "are you not mistaken? Do you think that you positivly know that you will liv forever after you are dead?" Well, he said, he did not exactly know it, but he had faith in the promis of God. Said I, "Did everything you ever had faith in turn out just as you thought it would?" "Well," said he, "I am bothering you from your work, I will talk to you some other time. Good-day." "Good-day, parson, call again."

One preacher who got up a big excitement here last fall told two falsehoods about Ingersoll. He said he sat in the vast audience of thousands a few years ago, and heard the greatest Infidel of the nineteenth century make his first lecture against Christianity, which you know was his lecture on the "Gods," and he said that Ingersoll declared in that lecture that there is no God. You know he does not make any such declaration in that lecture. Then in order to make his truthless point, the preacher said he heard him again two or three years after, and he used the language of this book (holding up the Bible), "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God." These assertions are both false, I am assured. He wanted to make a false impression on the people. He wanted to make it appear that such men as Ingersoll are not capable of telling their honest thoughts, or, in other words, that they would say a thing and then get afraid and take it back. S. P. WOOD.

EUBANKS, KY., March 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Having been educated in Bible theology, having embraced the Christian system and preached it for a number of years, you may well know how hard it is for me to giv up the Christian's hope of immortality and promis of eternal life. I cannot do so without being convinced that the Christian scheme of redemption is the production of men. I hav ever noticed and thought much on the reason that so many doctrins, creeds, and churches existed, claiming the Bible as their teacher. I hav earnestly sought to learn whether those differences were caused by human ignorance of the Bible or the obscurity of Bible teaching. My hope has been that a true knowledge of the Bible would destroy Christian sects, and that all believers in Christ would be of one mind and one creed. I am, however, becoming discouraged in this hope. I find a theory prevails that denominational sectarianism is not derogatory to Bible teaching; that the Bible is a kind of scapegoat to uphold all kinds of doctrins to suit the mental capacity of all kinds of people. When I turn to the book we call nature, I find uniformity in human experience; and why is it the case that the Bible is so obscure as to leave the world divided about what it teaches? Are the things of eternity of less importance than man's short animal life in this world? Evidently there is a loose screw somewhere in Bible theology. Whether this loose screw is in the Bible itself, or the brains of its professors, is a question to be settled by future developments. That the differing sects can sustain the divinity of the Bible in their divided condition is simply impossible. No book can claim universal adoption that contains five or six hundred different interpretations. If the book ever is successfully defended, a better system of interpretation will hav to be adopted, and sectarianism nailed to the wall forever. I hav become absolutely disgusted at the sects in their abuse of each other, and cry against Infidelity. In my honest judgment, I believe that sectarianism is doing more against the Bible than all the outspoken Infidels in the world. All outspoken Infidels hav ever been philanthropists, and not a class of hypocrits. They neither hav deceived themselvs nor others. Bible sects hav no certain road to heaven, and but little charity for those who do not embrace their creed. The result is, they become untrue to themselvs and others. Their creed takes the place of true reason, and they strike at shadows like blind snakes. The day has about passed when clerical authority can keep the people in ignorance, and successfully meet Infidelity by mere abuse. If the clergy ever expect to sustain the Bible, they must admit all it teaches, directly or indirectly. When they are asked if the Bible teaches or permitted polygamy, slavery, and acts of inhumanity, let them admit the facts, and not dodge behind popular prejudices with personal abuse. If the Bible, as we hav it, is all divine, then it must all be admitted and defended. If one writer of the Bible was inspired, then all writers of the Bible were inspired. It takes all the writers and what all the writers of the Bible hav written in the Bible to make the Bible. Anything less than what is written in the Bible would not be the Bible, but part of the Bible. To scrap the Bible, Infidels and Bible sects hav an equal chance for a theory. But let it be understood by all whom it may concern, that the age of a conflict between science and reason on the one side, and the claims of the Bible on the other, has arrived. Theology of all kinds must bear the test of free discussion. The human mind must and will be free. The superstitions of the past are lessons written in human carnage that will find a better day. It has ever been our opinion that the combined elements of sects, human interpolations, and the developments of science and history, would never destroy some marks of divinity in the Bible. Even after the admission of all the common objections to the claims of the Bible, we still hold that as an inductiv system, with its moral code for human conduct, it is not all the work of men in any age. The writers of the Bible hav all the attributes of credible witnesses, while the facts of the Bible are corroborated by profane historians. When the question arises as to whence came man, what is he, and what will be his future, the Bible is the most intelligent answer we hav seen. The Bible writers seem indifferent as to the results of recorded facts concerning the conduct of good or evil men. As to marks of justice and mercy in the Bible system, I think the same marks are developed in the book of nature. If I take the book of nature to dethrone the Bible, I shall then, for the same reasons, take the book of nature and dethrone the God of nature, if there be one. Under all circumstances, we conclude this with the hope that free thought and free discussion will march onward. W. BAKER, M.D.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

On Prairie Lands.

The north wind sinks to whispers low,
The sunshine drinks the melting snow,
The wild geese hail from southern seas,
While brown buds burst from all the trees,
And larks sang lond this very morn
Where farmers plow their fields for corn,
And golden millet, rye, and cane
That sweep their billows on the plain,
And walnut-trees whose boughs are wet
Drop dews to rose and violet,
That pierce their lowly prison strands
On prairie lands.

The happy children haste away,
Forbidden grounds are free to-day,
So many shades of tender green,
Deep hidden in each low ravine,
Are beck'ning them to come and see,
And tassels on the willow-tree
Are waving now. The wild bees hum,
And sheltered thickets of the plum
Are dotted with the whitest sprays—
The birthright of these waking days.
And hearts are full as well as hands,
On prairie lands.

The May unbinds her banners green
Where wary wood-birds hide between,
And timid rabbits crouching down
Behind the last year's tassocks brown,
Where mother-birds may build and brood,
Each grove be then a "holyrood,"
And not a harvest near or far
Be sweeter than her birdlings are.
A thousand summer sweets hav we
Upon this Western emerald sea,
And wise men once called "desert sands"
These prairie lands.

Frenchtown, Neb. MARY BAIRD-FINCH.

Correspondence.

CANAJOHARIE, N. Y., April 10, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I saw so many letters from boys and girls I thought I would write, too. I am ten years old, and I am in the fourth room in school. I think the Children's Corner is very nice. I must close. Wishing you success, I remain, your little friend, LAURA BIGLOW.

NEWPORT, March 30, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I shall be eight years old next May. My father is an Infidel Spiritualist, and takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I read the Children's Corner. I like it. I hav two sisters and four brothers, one of my sisters is a rapping medium. As this is my first time I ever wrote for the Corner, I will close for this time. Yours truly, ADDIE NOSON.

OPHIR, CAL., March 31, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I took notice of my first letter in the Children's Corner, of THE TRUTH SEEKER, dated March the 26th, 1887, and was truly delighted in reading it in print, but I am sorry to say that I noticed a mistake made near the head of the letter, where I stated that my mother sent me to my grandmother at Sacramento when I was four years old. The letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER reads as follows: "Four months old"—instead of "years." Dear Miss Wixon, if you will please correct this mistake I will be a thousand times obliged to you, and I will ever remain, Yours for truth and humanity.

MRS. ROSA KAISER.

SAN BERNARDINO, CAL., March 28, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Being a Freethinker, I will write you a letter to put in the Children's Corner.

Dr. York has just left here, after delivering three lectures that would hav made any Christian shake. All that heard him were well pleased, and he had quite large audiences, considering the number of Liberals there are in this place. I'm sorry to say the Young Men's Christian Association Hall is always full, when they hav a lecturer. I know of several people who hav lately turned Freethinkers and are now taking THE TRUTH SEEKER. All of our folks like this paper very much, and would be pleased to hav others do so.

I must tell you that I read "The Story Hour" some time ago, and think it a delightful little book, which it would do all children good to read.

If this meets with your approval, I'll write to you again.

Your friend, ANNIE B. GILBERT.

CEDAR LAKE, N. Y., April 2, 1887.

DEAR AUNT SUSAN: For you said I might call you aunt in my other letter. The snow is six feet deep here in April. Can you beat that where you liv? When the crust is hard I slide down hill in a tin pan. I can go as fast as any sled. It would make you laugh to see me go. A cousin of mine has a cat that is almost as smart as Becky, Dinah, and Dick in your pretty story. Her cat will get upon the sewing machine and pull the needles and pins out of the cushion and throw them on the floor, and will go upstairs and bring down what she can find that is lying around, and will fight if you point your finger at her. I named her Daisy, after my calf. I don't go to school much in winter. It is too far away, but I read and write at home, and we hav spelling-school three nights each week—my pa and ma are old school-teachers. I like to draw the best of anything. I hav drawn President Cleveland and Abraham Lincoln from their pictures. If you can send me your picture I think I would try to draw it. I wish some of the children of the Corner would write to me and I'll answer their letters. ELDA S. BILLINGS.

[Sometime when we hav some new photographs taken we will send you one.—ED. C. C.]

CALISTOGA, CAL., March 20, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON, and other friends of the Corner: Please accept our heartfelt thanks for your expressions of sympathy. I hope that Walter's dear mother has long since recovered, and that Frances's Grandpa Powers is quite well again.

'Tis said, "The Lord chasteneth whom he loveth." If that were so, he loves many people a deal too much. I do not believe the saying. It seems an unnatural way of expressing love. There was a passionate man lived near where I was born, by the name of Fleming Wright, who seemed to believe in that way of expressing his love for his wife. He used to whip her, and on one of those occasions some of his neighbors spoke to him about it. He seemed to think it no harm to do so, and said, "I love her better every time I whip her."

Well, the end soon came. In a fit of chastening love he hit her on the head with a heavy fire shovel and killed her. He was in jail a long time, until he was nearly blind. At last his Masonic friends got him out and took him off, but few knew to where until many years afterward. He lived retired and sad the remainder of his days in southwest Missouri. Fleming killed one, but if it were true, as some Christian people believe, the Lord has killed many.

But such sayings are very often untrue, and many who read them hav little idea of their logical effect. I know of no better way than to allow others all the liberty their hearts may desire, so long as that liberty does not injure others. Children still dependent upon their parents should usually obey them. Parents are not always right in their control of the little ones, and for that reason should not be too exacting.

With a cheery good-bye to all the Corner friends, I will step aside for a little while.

Respectfully, UNCLE JOHN.

CHAT WITH CORRESPONDENTS.

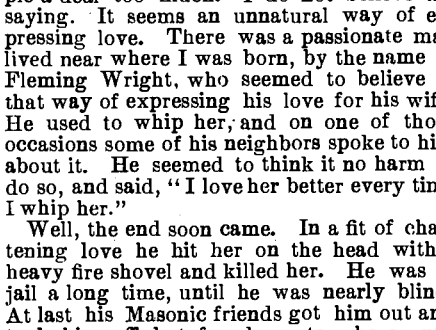
FRANK V. DRAPER.—Your story is keeping for some convenient opportunity. It is all right.

LILLIE C.—When you write for the press, write on the lines, with ink, and one side of the paper only. You should punctuate properly, and spell correctly. It is kindess to the writer to reject some manuscripts.

W. L. TRULL.—We sympathize with you, certainly. But be patient, and hope always for the best.

MILLIE WRIGHT.—Your note received, but nothing else has come to hand as yet Possibly it has been missent.

MARIE STEWART.—The story is received and will appear in time. It is nicely written.



O. B. R.—Life has its ups and downs. We hav to take them as they come. Look for a letter by and by.

OLD BOY.—You must laugh and grow fat. "Throw physic to the dogs."

E. M. D.—Stick to farming.

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—REBUS.

Why is this bit of ill-fortune like a man endeavoring to reduce his expenses?

2.—ECCENTRIC CHARADE.

Here's cunning, wisdom, wit combined—
Deep penetration of the mind.
To solve this, too, the whole you need,
As from the center out we read;
To left a substance light and rare,
Like oxygen or common air;
A vast collection, to the right,
Of houses greets the puzzler's sight,
Where wealth in luxury resides,
Where pinching want in woe abides,
Where science beckons to her schools,
Where superstition blinds her fools;
Where people sell till all is gone,
And then their very virtue pawn;
And virtue gone, still in the streets
The moral skeleton one meets
Disguises half its shame and sin
And all its emptiness within.
The first (reversed) may shed its light,
And turn to-day a final night;
But only whole our steps can guide
To shun last's evils spreading wide.

Irwin, Ia. J. K. P. BAKER.

3.—MAGIC PICTURE.

YOUTH AND OLD AGE.

The two old friends together meet,
Advancing slow, with faltering feet;
Across each mind there flashes, fleet,
A vision of the bygones sweet,
When they in blushing youth did meet.

4.—SQUARE.

1. A leguminous plant.
2. A mineral used in polishing.
3. Moderately warm.
4. One who makes proclamation.
5. A fabulous monster with many heads.
